LITERATURE in all countries has preceded journalism, and the colonists of Georgia produced a crude literature before they had a newspaper of their own. The sturdy pioneers who came over with Oglethorpe were few in number, and during the first generation they were engaged in solving the more serious problem of existence. With a small and scattered population, a few fortified villages, and a hostile environment, there was no field and no demand for newspapers. But it was an era of great literary activity, and the founder of the colony was a favorite figure in a circle composed of Johnson, Goldsmith, Burke, Wharton, Burton, Mrs. Garrick, Mrs. More and others. He was pronounced by Burke the most extraordinary man of his day, and the frequent references made to him in Boswell's Life of Johnson make it evident that some of the most famous men of letters in England regarded him as their peer. Pope, Thomson, and other poets sung his praises, and grave theologians paid him high tribute. It is probable that Oglethorpe and a few of the more prosperous colonists brought with them small libraries, but there was little opportunity for literary culture while the newcomers were negotiating treaties with savage tribes, felling forests, building cabins, and defending their homes against the Spaniards. The writings of the founder and the trustees contain only the merest outline of the history of the early settlers and cannot be regarded as literature.

JOHN WESLEY.

During the first two years of its existence the colony received from England over 2,600 Bibles, Testaments and religious books in addition to about 1,000 volumes of the same class which came over with the first ship load of emigrants. It is not strange, therefore, that the first literature of the colony was of a religious character, and it is not too much to say that the Rev. John Wesley was the first writer of any fame in the community. His sermons, journal and pamphlets made a deep and lasting impression on the public mind in this country and in England. In 1736 a parish library was started in Savannah. Books were donated in England, and the trustees purchased a few volumes, ordering among others, Plato's works in Greek and Latin and his Republic in French. With preachers, pedagogues and soldiers controlling their affairs, it is not surprising that literature was at a low ebb in the colonies.

GEN. OGLETHORPE.

Oglethorpe wrote a sketch of the colonies of South Carolina and Georgia, but it was a plain and business-like document, without any graces of style to recommend it. He left nothing behind him in the shape of printed matter or manuscript that would compare in interest and value with the book of travel written by one of his successors, Gov. Henry Ellis. There were governors and other officials and citizens who wrote vigorous political letters, addresses and appeals during the revolutionary era, but we look in vain among them for anything that is noteworthy enough for preservation on account of its literary merit. The colony produced no Junius, no Joel Barlow, no Jefferson, no Franklin and no historian. Its leaders were so busy making history that they had no time to write it.

In his New and Accurate Account of the Provinces of South Carolina and Georgia, Gen. Oglethorpe wrote: "Let us in the meantime cast our eyes on the multitude of unfortunate people in the kingdom, of reputable families, and of liberal or, at least, easy education; some undone by guardians, some by law suits, some by accidents in commerce, some by stocks and bubbles, and some by suretyship. But all agree in this one circumstance that they must either be burthensome to their relations or betake themselves to little ships for sustenance which ('tis to 1) do not answer their purposes, and to which a well educated mind descends with the utmost constraint. What various misfortunes may reduce the rich, the industrious, to the danger of a prison, to a moral certainty of starving! These are the people that may relieve themselves and strengthen Georgia by resorting thither, and Great Britain by their departure. I appeal to the recollection of the reader (tho' he be opulent, tho' he be noble) does not his own sphere of acquaintance (I may venture to ask), does not even his own blood, his set of near relations furnish him with some instances of such persons as here described? Must they starve? What honest mind can bear to think of it? Must they be fed by the contributions of others? Certainly they must, rather than suffer to perish. Are these wealth to the nation? Are they not a burthen to themselves, a burthen to their kindred and acquaintances, a burthen to the whole community?"

"I have heard it said (and 'tis easy to say so) let them learn to work; let them subdue their pride and descend to mean employments, keep ale houses, or coffee houses, even sell fruit, or clean shoes for an honest livelihood. But, alas! these occupations, and many more like them, are overstocked already by people who know better how to follow them than do they whom we have been talking of. Half of those who are bred in low life and well versed in such shifts and expedients, find but a very narrow maintenance by them. As for laboring, I could almost wish that the gentleman or merchant who thinks that another gentleman or merchant in want can thresh or dig to the value of subsistence for his family or even for himself, I say I could wish the person who thinks so were obliged to make trial of it for a week, or (not to be too severe) for only a day. He would find himself to be less than the fourth part of a laborer, and that the fourth part of a laborer's wages could not maintain him. I have heard it said that a man may learn to labor by practice; 'tis admitted. But it must also be admitted that before he can learn he may starve. Suppose a gentleman were this day to begin, and with grievous toil found himself able to earn three pence, how many days or months are necessary to form him that he may deserve a shilling per diem? Men whose wants are important must try such experiments as will give immediate relief. 'Tis too late for them to begin to learn a trade when they have pressing necessities called for the exercise of it.

"Having thus described (very too truly) the pitiable condition of the better sort of the indigent, an objection arises against their removal upon what is stated of their inability for drudgery. It may be asked if they can't get bread here for their labor, how will their condition be mended in Georgia? The answer is easy. Part of it is well attested, and part self evident. They have land there for nothing, and that land is so fertile that (as is said before) they receive an hundredfold increase for taking very little pains.

"Give here in England ten acres of good land to one of these helpless persons and I doubt not his ability to make it sustain him, and this by his own culture without letting it to another. But the difference between no rent and rack rent is the difference between eating and starving. If I make but £20 on the produce of a field, and am to pay £20 for it, 'tis plain I must perish if I have not another fund to support me. But if I pay no rent the produce of that field will supply the merest necessities of life.

"With a view to the relief of people in the condition I have described, his majesty has this present year incorporated a considerable number of persons of quality and distinction, and vested a large tract of South Carolina in them, by the name of Georgia, in trust to be distributed among the necessitous. These trustees not only give land to the unhappy who go thither, but are also impowered to receive the voluntary contributions of charitable persons to enable them to furnish the poor adventurers with all necessities for the expense of the voyage, occupying the land, and supporting them until they find themselves comfortably settled. So that now the unfortunate will not be obliged to bind themselves to a long servitude to pay for their passage, for they may be carried gratis into a land of liberty and plenty, where they immediately find themselves in possession of a competent estate, in a happier climate than they knew before, and they are unfortunate indeed if here they cannot forget their sorrows."

BENJAMIN MARTYN.

Benjamin Martyn, the secretary of the trustees, was a man of considerable literary reputation. He wrote a pamphlet on Georgia, in the early days of the colonies, from which the following is an extract: "As the Mind of Man cannot form a more exalted Pleasure than what arises from the Reflexion of having relieved the Distressed; let the Man of Benevolence, whose Substance enables him to contribute towards this Undertaking give a Loose rein for a little to his Imagination, pass over a few Years of his Life, and think himself on a Visit to Georgia. Let him see those who are now a Prey to all the Calamities of Want, who are starving with Hunger and seeing their Wives and Children in the same Distress; expecting likewise every Moment to be thrown into a Dungeon with the cutting Anguish that they leave their Families expos'd to the Utmost Necessity and Despair: Let him, I say, see these living under a sober and orderly Government, settled in Towns, which are rising at Distances along navigable Rivers; Flocks and Herds in the neighboring Pastures, and adjoining to them Plantations of regular Rows of Mulberry Trees entwined with Vines, the Branches of which are loaded with Grapes; let him see Orchards of Oranges, Pomegranates and Olives; in other Places, extended fields of Corn or Flax and Hemp. In short, the whole Face of the County chang'd by Agriculture and Plenty in Part of it. Let him see the People all in Employment of various Kinds, Women and Children feeding and nursing the Silk worm, winding off the Silk, or gathering the Olives; the Men plowing and planting their Lands, tending their Cattle, or felling the Forest, which they burn for potashes, or square for the Builder; let him see these in Content and Affluence, and Masters of little Possessions which they can leave to their Children; and then let him think if they are not happier than those supported by Charity in Idleness. Let him reflect that the Produce of their Labour will be so much new Wealth for this Country, and then let him ask himself Whether he would exchange the Satisfaction of having contributed to this, for all the trifling, the Pleasures, the Money which he has given, would have purchas'd.

"Of all publick-spirited Actions, perhaps none can claim a Preference to the Settling of Colonies, as none are in the End more useful. . . . Whoever, then, is a Lover of Liberty will be pleas'd with an Attempt to recover his Fellow Subjects from a State of Misery and Oppression, and fix them in Happiness and Freedom.

"Whoever is a Lover of his Country will approve of a Method for the Employment of her Poor, and the Increase of her People and her Trade. Whoever is a lover of Mankind will join his wishes to the success of a design so plainly calculated for their Good: Undertaken and conducted with so much Disinterestedness.

"Few arguments are requisite to excite the Generous to exert themselves on this Occasion. To consult the Welfare of Mankind regardless of any private Views is the Perfection of Virtue; as the Accomplishing and Consciousness of it is the Perfection of Happiness."

AUGUSTUS BALDWIN LONGSTREET.

The student of Georgia's literature will find nothing that will interest him until he reaches the present century. Indeed, the first Georgian whose writing attracted wide-spread attention was Augustus Baldwin Longstreet, who was born in Augusta in 1790. Longstreet was descended from a sturdy Dutch and Norman stock, and he was fortunate enough to enjoy the best educational advantages of his time. He graduated at Yale, studied law in Litchfield, Conn., and commenced the practice of his profession in Georgia in 1815. His genius was soon recognized, and he achieved fame as a lawyer, judge, writer, divine, and college president. While he was still a young man his fame filled the state. He had a lively sense of humor, and he was one of the first southern dialect writers. His descriptions of

"cracker" and country life in Georgia Scenes have amused three generations of Americans, and many editions of the book have been sold. Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald in his life of Judge Longstreet speaks of him always as "the typical Georgian." He says that "he was a Georgian all over, all through, and all the time. He was the father of its humorists, and his humor was of a peculiar kind, unlike any other. He impressed his political opinions on the youth who were destined to shape the future policy of this state. He was one, and not the least, of a class of great teachers whose genius and piety have left upon its people an impress as lasting as eternity. He was an educator, who, bursting traditionary fetters, did much toward the emancipation of learning from its false methods and aims." A congressional reminiscence describes the happy effect produced by one of the Georgia Scenes many years after it was written. There had been a long and bitter sectional debate in the house, and when a measure full of material for passion and war resentments came up the democratic members agreed upon keeping quiet. A leading member of the republican side, representing a New England state, and noted for his virulent attacks on the south, made a violent assault on the democrats, charging them with cowardice, and in his excitement ran up and down the aisles shaking his fists and challenging the democrats to come to the front and show their colors and stand up for what they maintained. Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York, asked permission to interrupt this speaker, who with emphasis replied, "With great pleasure; I will be glad to hear from you." Mr. Cox sent to the clerk's desk a volume of Georgia Scenes, and the clerk read the following sketch:

A Lincoln County Rehearsal.—If my memory fails me not, June 10, 1809, found me at about 11 o'clock a. m. ascending a long and gentle slope in what was called the "dark corner" of Lincoln. I believed it took its name from the moral darkness which reigned over that part of the county at the time of which I am speaking. In this point of view, if it was but a shade darker than the rest of the county, it was inconceivably dark. If any man can name a trick or sin which had not been committed at the time of which I am speaking in the very focus of all the county's illumination (Lincolnton) he must himself be the most inventive of the tricky and the very Judas of sinners. Since that time, however (all humor aside), Lincoln has become a living proof that "light shineth in darkness." Could I venture to mingle the solemn with the ludicrous, even for the purposes of honorable contact, I could adduce from this county instances of the most numerous and wonderful transitions from vice and folly to virtue and holiness which have ever, perhaps, been witnessed since the days of the Apostolic ministry. So much, lest it should be thought by some that what I am about to relate is characteristic of the county in which it occurred.

Whatever may be said of the moral condition of the "dark corner" at the time just mentioned, its natural condition was anything but dark; it smiled in all the charms of spring, and spring borrowed a new charm from its undulating grounds, its luxuriant woodlands, its sportive streams, its vocal birds, and its blushing flowers.

Rapt with the enchantment of the season and the scenery around me, I was slowly rising the slope when I was startled by loud, profane and boisterous voices which seemed to proceed from a thick covert of undergrowth about 200 yards in advance of me and about 100 to the right of the road.

"You kin, kin you?"

"Yes, I kin, and am able to do it! Boo-oo-oo! O, wake snakes, and walk your chinks! Brimstone and —— fire! Don't hold me, Nick Stovall! The fight's made up, and let's go at it. —— my soul if I don't jump down his throat and gallop every chitterling out of him before you can say 'quit'!"

"Now, Nick, don't hold him! Jist let the wildcat come, and I'll tame him. Ned'll see me a fair fight, won't you, Ned?"

"Oh, yes; I'll see you a fair fight, blast my old shoes if I don't."

"That's sufficient, as Tom Haynes said when he saw the elephant; now let him come."

Thus they went on, with countless oaths interspersed which I dare not even hint at, and with much that I could not distinctly hear.

"In mercy's name," thought I, "what band of ruffians has selected this holy season and this heavenly retreat for such pandemonian riots? I quickened my gait, and had come nearly opposite the thick grove whence the noise proceeded when my eye caught indistinctly and at intervals through the foliage of the dwarf oaks and hickories which intervened glimpses of a man or men who seemed to be in a violent struggle, and I could occasionally catch those deep-drawn, emphatic oaths which men in conflict utter when they deal blows. I dismounted and hurried to the spot with all speed. I had overcome about half the space which separated it from me when I saw the combatants come to the ground, and after a short struggle I saw the uppermost one (for I could not see the other) make a heavy plunge with both his thumbs, and at the same instant I heard a cry in the accent of keenest torture: "Enough! My eye's out!"

I was so completely horror-struck that I stood transfixed for a moment to the spot where the cry met me. The accomplices in the hellish deed which had been perpetrated had all fled at my approach; at least I supposed so, for they were not to be seen.

"Now, blast your corn-shucking soul," said the victor (a youth about eighteen years old) as he rose from the ground, "come cutt'n' your shines 'bout me ag'in next time I come to the court-house, will you! Get your owl-eye in ag'in if you can!"

At this moment he saw me for the first time. He looked excessively embarrassed, and was moving off when I called to him in a tone emboldened by the sacredness of my office and the iniquity of his crime, "Come back, you brute, and assist me in relieving your fellow-mortal whom you have ruined forever."

My rudeness subdued his embarrassment in an instant, and with a taunting curl of the nose he replied: "You needn't kick before you're spurr'd. There ain't nobody there, nor ha'n't been, nother. I was jist seein' how I could'a' fought." So saying, he bounded to his plow, which stood in the corner of the fence about fifty yards beyond the battle-ground.

And, would you believe it, gentle reader, his report was true. All that I had heard and seen was nothing more or less than a Lincoln rehearsal, in which the youth who had just left me had played all the parts of all the characters in a court-house fight.

I went to the ground from which he had risen, and there were the prints of his two thumbs, plunged up to the balls in the mellow earth, about the distance of a man's eyes apart, and the ground around was broken up as if two stags had been engaged upon it.

The laughter which accompanied and frequently interrupted and followed the reading of the sketch was joined by both sides of the house. The orator did not resume his remarks.

Judge Longstreet also wrote Letters from Georgia to Massachusetts, Letters to Clergymen of the Northern Methodist Church, Master William Mitten, and many pamphlets and magazine articles. He was always busy with his pen, and many of his contributions appeared in the newspapers, "The Methodist Quarterly," "The Southern Literary Messenger," "The Southern Field and Fireside," "The Magnolia," and "The Orion."

Georgia Scenes is probably the most widely known and popular of all of Judge Longstreet's writings. The author's aim in this was much higher than the object frequently ascribed to him, that of amusing the reader with humorous sketches, his desire being to "supply a chasm in history which has always been overlooked—the manners, customs, amusements, wit, dialect, as they appear in all grades of society to an ear and eye witness of them." He chose the first fifty years of our republic in the course of which time the society of the southern states underwent an almost entire revolution, and at this date hardly a trace of the society of the first thirty years of the republic is found. The author has not confined himself to historic detail, but his language is always "Georgian" from the beginning to the end. As an illustration, The Gander Pulling is an actual occurrence at the place located. The characters were pen pictures of well-known individuals there and the language used their talk. Again, The Wax Works was an exhibition which actually came off in Waynesboro, Burke Co., and every figure actually existed and did the same parts assigned to him. The Fight also is a description of a combat to be seen in almost any county in Georgia. The character, however, answers better to many of the poor class seen in the sterile pine woods of Georgia. Judge Longstreet in the Matser Mitten was actuated by the laudable object of showing mothers the danger of allowing their affections for their children to interfere with their duty in using that paternal strictness which is absolutely necessary to the proper training of youth. This was suggested to the author when president of Centenary college in Louisiana by certain scholars whose mischievousness, encouraged by indulgent mothers, interfered with their studies. The scene was transferred to Georgia so as not to particularize the kind Jackson mothers and was well received by those who understood the aim of the author.

Judge Longstreet's newspaper articles were generally on transient topics and his serious essays on subjects which, having lost interest, have not been preserved. Bishop Fitzgerald says of Judge Longstreet's writings on religious questions, that these fragments show "a fondness and a genius for exegetics, with an independence and originality of thought that give assurance that he could have done more work in that line that would have deserved to have survived him." It was Judge Longstreet's contemplation to write a series of Georgia scenes from a religious point of view. There are friends who question his success in this line, knowing his special vein to be humorous, but that his sketches on the line above indicated would have been filled with true pathos is to be believed by the moving touches found in the published Georgia Scenes.

In his old age Judge Longstreet would gladly have withdrawn many of his humorous sketches from circulation, but the public continued to call for new editions of his most popular book, and it is now to be found in almost every library in Georgia. This busy writer reached the patriarchial age of four score and died at his home in Oxford, Miss., in the summer of 1870.

RICHARD HENRY WILDE.

Richard Henry Wilde was an Irishman, a native of Dublin, but his early manhood was spent in Georgia. He was admitted to the bar in Augusta and served as attorney of the state, also as a representative in congress. While he was a very eloquent and successful lawyer, he is best known by one poem, "My Life is Like the Summer Rose." When Byron read these verses he at once wrote to Wilde and congratulated him on being the author of one of the finest poems of the century. These immortal lines are worthy of a place in these pages :

"My life is like the summer rose,
That opens to the morning sky;
But ere the shades of evening close
Is scattered on the ground to die.

"But on the rose's humble bed
The sweetest dews of night are shed,
As if she wept such waste to see;
But none shall weep a tear for me.

"My life is like the autumn leaf,
That trembles in the moon's pale ray,
Its hold is frail, its state is brief,
Restless and soon to fade away.

"Yet ere that leaf shall fall and fade,
The parent tree shall mourn its shade,
The winds bewail the leafless tree;
But none shall breathe a sigh for me.

"My life is like the print which feet
Have left on Tampa's desert strand;
Soon as the rising tide shall beat
All trace will vanish from the sand.

"Yet still as grieving to efface
All vestige of the human race,
On that lone shore loud moans the sea;
But none, alas, shall mourn for me!"

Mr. Wilde died in 1847 at the age of forty-eight in New Orleans, where he then resided, but in compliance with his request he was buried at his old home, Augusta.

OCTAVIA WALTON LE VERT.

Madame Octavia Walton Le Vert, a remarkably brilliant writer, was born near Augusta in 1810. Her father was the second son of George Walton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of congress and governor of Georgia. Octavia Walton was reared in Pensacola and Mobile. In the latter city, when she was a little girl, she met Gen. Lafayette, who was so delighted with her that he predicted for her a brilliant career. She was almost entirely educated by her mother and grandmother and a private tutor. At the age of twelve she spoke three languages with ease, and while in her teens she visited the leading cities in the union and was everywhere enthusiastically admired. In 1836 she married Dr. Henry Le Vert, of Mobile, a son of the first French surgeon who came over with Lafayette. In 1853 and 1855 she visited Europe, the first time at the Duke of Rutland's invitation, and shortly after her return she wrote Souvenirs of Travel, a work of graphic power and picturesque description, which was very popular in its days. She also translated Dumas' Three Musketeers. Lamartine was captivated by her conversational gifts and urged her to become a writer, saying she had the genius of a natural improvisatrice. Mme. Le Vert survived her husband, and after the war made her home in New York, where she died in 1877.

FRANCIS R. GOULDING.

Francis R. Goulding, the author of the Young Marooners, has almost as wide a fame as the author of Robinson Crusoe. He was a native of Liberty county and his early boyhood was passed on the sea coast near Savannah. After graduating at the university of Georgia he attended the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., and entered the ministry. In 1842, while living at Eatonton, Ga., he conceived the idea of the sewing machine, and simultaneously was the idea worked out by Howe and Thimmonier, of France, but to Goulding must be given the credit for the first sewing machine ever given to the south. Having satisfied himself as to its successful operation he laid the machine aside for "weightier matters," and therefore no patent was applied for. He accepted a pastoral call in 1843 to Bath, Ga., where he lived for eight years, doing much literary work in this time. Little Josephine, a story of the early piety of a Washington county girl, was published by the American Sunday School union. The Young Marooners, upon which his fame chiefly rests, was first called Robbins and Cruisers Company, afterward Robert and Harold, or the Young Marooners. He was three years in writing it, the book being read to his family as his work progressed and subjected to a revision at their suggestion. It was published in 1852, three editions followed rapidly the first year, and it was reprinted in England and Scotland. In the summer of 1853 Mr. Goulding's wife died and he then opened a select school for boys at Kingston, Ga., devoting his leisure moments to notes on the Instincts of Birds and Beasts. He was married in 1855 to Matilda Rees, the daughter of Ebenezer Rees, of Darien, to which place he moved and resumed his pastoral duties, alternating for six years between Darien and Baisden's Bluff. What is Light? a treatise on the subject of light, followed years of correspondence with Faraday and other scientists. When the civil war began Mr. Goulding was the friend and nurse of sick and suffering soldiers around Darien, and when the town was burned by the Federal forces his handsome home was burned and his library totally destroyed. He then went to Macon and there revived The Young Marooners and compiled a soldiers' hymn book for use in the Confederate army. The war ended and left him broken down in health and exhausted in resources, but with an energy characteristic of the man, he went to work with his pen, contributing to various literary journals and writing a sequel to The Young Marooners, which he called Marooners' Island. Frank Gordon followed, a story containing scenes from his childhood on the sea-coast. His final years were a struggle for life, being a sufferer from asthma, and in an early August morning he passed away at his little home in Roswell, and in the cemetery at that place lie his remains. At the time of his death, in 1891, he was in his ninety-first year.

MIRABEAU LAMAR.

Among the early writers of this century in Georgia Mirabeau Lamar deserves a prominent place. He was the first president of the republic of Texas, having emigrated there from Georgia, his native state, in 1835. He held many public positions and at the time of his death in 1859 was sixty-one years old. He was a brilliant orator, journalist and poet. A volume of his poetry was published in 1857, but he is perhaps best known as a writer by the following:

"O, lend to me, sweet nightingale,
Your music by the fountains;
And lend to me your cadences,
O, river of the mountains.

"That I may sing my gay brunette,
A diamond spark in coral set,
Gem for a princess' coronet—
The daughter of Mendoza.

"How brilliant is the morning star,
The evening star how tender,
The light of both is in her eye—
Their softness and their splendor.

"But for the lash that shades their sight,
They were too dashing for the light,
And, when she shuts them, all is night,
The daughter of Mendoza.

"O, ever bright and beauteous one,
Bewildering and beguiling,
The lute is in thy silvering tones,
The rainbow is thy smiling.

"And thine is too, o'er hill and dell,
The bounding of the young gazelle,
The arrow's flight and ocean's swell,
Sweet daughter of Mendoza.

"What though, perchance, we meet no more,
What though, too, soon we sever;
Thy form will float like emerald light
Before my vision ever.

"O who can see and then forget
The glories of my gay brunette,
Thou art too bright a star to set,
Fair daughter of Mendoza."

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE.

Paul Hamilton Hayne, a South Carolinian, of distinguished revolutionary ancestry, spent the last years of his life at Copse Hill, in this state, where he died in 1886, at the age of fifty-six. His house at Copse Hill was a small, dusty looking affair, and but few could realize that it was the home of "one of the most famous poets of the world—the friend and peer of Longfellow, Holmes and Whittier." The interior walls were covered with pictures from art journals and weeklies; the furniture was home-made, the poet's desk was a carpenter's bench, used in building the cottage; the book cases were made of boxes. The rough interior was skillfully transformed by the hands of the loving wife. Edward P. Whipple, the celebrated essayist, wrote of him in his review of Legends and Lyrics: "It contains the ripest result of the genius of the most eminent of living southern poets. Daphnes, Cambyzes and the Macrobian Bow, Fortunio, The Story of Glaucus the Thessalian, and especially The Wife of Brittany would, if published under the name of the author of The Earthly Paradise, obtain at once a recognition on both sides of the Atlantic. We cannot see that the American poet is one whit inferior to his English contemporary in tenderness and ideal charm, while we venture to say he has more than Morris the true poetic enthusiasm and unwithholding abandonment to the sentiment suggested by his themes. We congratulate the south on possessing such a poet."

William Cullen Bryant and other equally well-known writers have cordially indorsed Whipple's estimate of Mr. Hayne. He was the author of several volumes of poetry, but the large volume of his complete poems published in Boston contains his best work.

RICHARD MALCOLM JOHNSTON.

Richard Malcolm Johnston, who is still living in Baltimore, was born in Hancock county in 1822. He is one of the most original and gifted of all the southern story writers of his time, and the following is a complete list of his works up to date:

Dukesborough Tales, Old Mark Langston, Ogeechee Cross Firings, Mr. Absalom Billingslea, and other Georgia Folks, Two Gray Tourists, Widow Guthrie, The Primes and Their Neighbors, Studies, Literary and Social, Mr. Fortner's Marital Claims and other Stories, Mr. Billy Downs and His Like, History of English Literature (Assisted by Wm. Hand Browne), Biography of Alexander Hamilton Stephens, Pearce Amerson's Will.

"Dick" Johnston attended for about four years an "old field" school and the "Goose pond" school; one of the stories in the Dukesborough Tales is a not exaggerated picture of one of these schools. After this his father moved to Crawfordsville and the Powelton to give his children better schooling; at the latter place Richard and his brother were prepared for college. Powelton is the Dukesborough of his tale. An incident of his school boy days—when at thirteen years of age he falls in love with his teacher—is used in the Early Majority of Mr. Thomas Watts. He entered Mercer college, where he was graduated in 1841. Teaching school for two years, he studied law, and when admitted to practice formed a partnership with Hon. Eli Baxter. He later was a partner of Hon. Jarvis Thomas, and lastly of Linton Stephens, a brother of Alexander H. Stephens. For ten years he practiced law in the middle and northern circuits of Georgia. The peculiarity of the people and scenes in the court-room supplied material frequently used in his various sketches. In 1844 Mr. Johnston married Miss Frances Mansfield, who lived in the same county, Hancock, but whose father was a native of Connecticut. He was twenty-three and she fifteen. It was during his practice of law that he was asked to become president of Mercer college, then to accept the nomination for judge of the superior court of the northern circuit, and finally to take the professorship of belles-lettres in the university of Georgia. The last being more congenial to his taste he accepted it. For four years he honored the university with his presence, and there he made many long time friends. It was in Athens he prepared his manuscript of a text book on English literature. He next conducted a large school for boys, called "Rockby," at his home in Hancock county, but after the death of his second daughter, Lucy, in 1867, he moved his school to Baltimore, Md., where he was accompanied by forty of his sixty pupils. The new school was called "Pen-Lucy," and the corner stone was a high sense of truth and personal honor. Mr. Johnston, for the past ten or twelve years, has devoted his time to literary work entirely. His first story appeared in the "Southern Magazine" under the nom-de-plume of "Philemon Perch," and its immediate success was a surprise to no one more than the author. His stories show a love of old Georgia associations, old places, old times and old friendships. The big heart and loving nature of the author is shown in every character he has drawn. His Pearce Amerson's Will published in "Lippincott's Magazine" in 1892 was founded on a romance, the character and scenes of which were laid in midway Georgia. He has his favorites in the children of his imagination, and Doolana Lines is his favorite among the female characters and Billy Williams among the male.

JOHN AND JOSEPH LE CONTE.

John Le Conte was born in Liberty county in 1818 and died in California in 1891. He was the son of Lewis Le Conte, the noted French botanist who resided in New York in the past century. John was prepared by Alexander H. Stephens for college and graduated at the university of Georgia. He was distinguished at college for his proficiency in mathematics, and at one time occupied the chair of natural philosophy and chemistry at his alma mater. At that time the study of medicine was the chief profession to be adopted by one of scientific mind, and so he took this degree in New York after a several years' course at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York. For two years he practiced in Savannah, and then went to the university of Georgia. For nine years he remained there, resigning to take charge of the chair of chemistry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York. Here he lectured for one winter, but physics rather than chemistry was his favorite study, and a year later he went to lecture on physics in the university of South Carolina, in Columbia. This chair he held until his final move to California in 1869. His scientific works extended throughout fifty years and his contributions will be found in the leading periodicals of Europe and America.

Joseph Le Conte, his brother, was also born in Liberty county, in 1823; he graduated at the university of Georgia and then entered the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard. He studied natural science and geology under Louis Agassiz and accompanied him on an exploring expedition through Florida. He held chairs in Oglethorpe university, the state university, and finally in the university of California, where his elder brother had preceded him. He married, about 1847, Miss Bessie Nesbit of Milledgeville, a niece of Judge Eugenius A. Nesbit of Macon. The two brothers were never separated from the time Joseph left Oglethorpe for Athens, with the exception of one year when John preceded him to Columbia, till the death of the latter. While there was in some of their characteristics a radical difference, the relationship between them was rarely beautiful and they lived in the closest intimacy and intellectual sympathy. John's talents were more restricted in his interests to pure science, and he literally lived in an atmosphere of scientific culture. His love of music, art, poetry, literature was of the deepest kind and he possessed an ardent love of natural scenery. Joseph was fond of the society of men of talent and humor, while John was rather reticent, preferring that privacy which is essential to continual and deep research. Next to his devotion to persons and truths, the latter's most marked trait of character was his warm, genial, sunny disposition. Speaking of his brother, Joseph Le Conte recently said: "Wherever clearness of thought and accuracy of statement on almost any scientific subject were required I instinctively turned to him as I would to an encyclopaedia." His wonderful memory, his methodical manner of reading and recording and his clearness of physical conceptions gave him a fullness as well as an accuracy of knowledge rarely obtained. John Le Conte was known as the father of the university of California. In 1869 when he went there it had only thirty-eight students, to-day it has over 1,200 students and an annual income of over $350,000. The boys' home on the plantation of their father in Liberty county has been recently described by Joseph. The attic was fitted up as a chemical laboratory in which the father carried on researches daily. His devotion to botany, too, was very intense. A large area of several acres of enclosed premises was devoted to the maintenance of botanical and floral gardens, widely known at that time as one of the best in the United States, and often visited by botanists, both American and foreign. To supply this garden the father made many excursions, often with visiting botanists or collectors, sometimes lasting several days, and always returned laden with botanical treasures. The father's life was one of utter forgetfulness of self and "entirely devoid of any ambition or vanity of reputation; a labor of passionate love of truth for truth's sake."

John's published works are: Religion and Science, Elements of Geology, Light; An Exposition of the Principles of Monocular and Binocular Vision, Com-pend of Geology, Evolution; Its Nature, Its Evidences, and Its Relation to Religious Thought.

Besides these and numerous contributions to scientific periodicals he had commenced during the war, and nearly finished, a complete treatise on physics, in which were embodied his wide knowledge and long experience in teaching. But at the time of the burning of Columbia in 1865 this work was destroyed. John Le Conte's death occurred in 1891. Just as he was about to leave on a year's vacation in 1889 his wife was taken sick and he was compelled to remain at home. In 1894 Joseph was given a year's vacation and spent the most of it in Europe. Before leaving he attended the International congress of Geologists, which met in Washington and was made first vice-president.

ANDREW ADGATE LIPSCOMB.

Andrew Adgate Lipscomb was a native of the District of Columbia, but most of his long and honored life was spent in Georgia. He was born in 1816 and died in 1890. His literary work was of a very high order and caused him to be recognized as one of our most thoughtful and elegant writers. Harper's Magazine in its early years frequently contained notable articles from his pen. Perhaps he was at his best while he was chancellor at the university of Georgia. He was a man of commanding presence and matchless dignity, and yet his genial traits of character and disposition made him a favorite with all classes. His pupils loved him and his intellectual sway was absolute. He resigned his position on account of the death of his son, an event which overshadowed his life ever afterward. His poem, written at the young man's grave, is full of beauty and pathos:

"I thought that thou in coming time
 Wouldst be my strength and stay;
 I thought to find in thy full prime Support amidst decay;
 No earthly one such aid could give,
 So tender, strong and wise;
 'Twas happiness with thee to live,
 Though crushed so many ties.

"But I am here to do for thee,
 In springtime's early hours,
 What thou canst never do for me—
 Bedeck my tomb with flowers.
 And yet for me a work thou dost,
 Which not till late I knew;
 God help my heart this hope to trust
 Of all my hopes most true.

"My tears thou wouldst not hear restrained
 Beside his resting place,
 Whose life ne'er gave a moment's pain
 Or aught else to efface.
 I know the loss; I know the gain;
 And oft have thought they blend
 Like sunshine gleaming through the rain
 When sudden showers descend."

Later Dr. Lipscomb was professor of art and criticism at Vanderbilt university, but the climate did not suit him and he returned to Athens, where he was made emeritus professor, holding that position until his death. Longfellow and Hayne were his devoted friends and Margaret J. Preston wrote: "It is worth while to write poetry when it falls into such sympathetic hands as yours;" and again she said: "You have certainly given two remarkably scholarly books to the Christian reading public. How subtle your thought is, and what depth of Christian philosophy I find in your studies! Your style is so cultured, and you have the esthetic faculty so largely developed that it takes more than an ordinary reader to follow your discussions. One could think that you had been an art student, so well you seem to understand the somewhat abstruse canons of art. At first blush I wondered how you could find so many studies in the Forty Days, but as I come to see how exhaustively you treat the subject, and how many-sided is your way of looking at it, I can better understand how full you find it of Gospel teaching, and how rich a subject it is for education. How vast your reading seems to have been, and what wonderful use you have made of it in the embroidery of your subjects! I cannot now pause over your poetic passages. What a fine one that is at the end of the sixth study of the supplement, but then such abound throughout the book."

Although a Methodist divine, Dr. Lipscomb never outgrew his early fondness for a literary career. During forty years he was a popular contributor to some of the leading magazines of the country. As a Shakspearean critic, the author of Studies in the Forty Days, Milton and several other poems he will never be forgotten by a large circle of appreciating readers. He was a master of all the graces of style, and never allowed anything from his pen to appear in print until it had been carefully revised. But for his modesty he would have been a more conspicuous figure in the literary world. He shunned publicity, and when the Appletons wrote to him for some facts about his life and work he felt that it would not be proper for him to furnish a sketch or ask a friend to write it. So the doctor has only a very brief notice in the Cyclopedia, but he has left such a lasting impress upon the culture of his beloved south that he does not need the aid of outside biographers.

CHARLES COLCOCK JONES.

Charles Colcock Jones is descended from English ancestry, his forefathers having come from England to South Carolina nearly two centuries ago. During the revolutionary war his grandfather, John Jones, was killed while a major in the continental army, near Savannah, in 1779. His father, Rev. Charles C. Jones, D. D., was a distinguished minister and was pastor of the First Presbyterian church in Savannah, where Charles C. was born in October, 1831. He afterward retired to his plantation in Liberty county. He was a gentleman of liberal education, and an earnest minister and teacher. Charles C. Jones, Jr., spent his boyhood on the big plantations of his father in Liberty county, where he fished, hunted, sailed boats and enjoyed all sports and amusements engaged in by boys with indulgent parents. Thus he grew up with a strong constitution and a training which was of great value to him in his after life. His father supervised his early studies, with private tutors to aid him. South Carolina college at Columbia was then presided over by Hon. William C. Preston, and there young Jones spent his freshman and sophomore years, then going to Princeton, N. J., where he was graduated with distinction. He studied law in Philadelphia, and received his degree of LL. B. in 1855. In addition to the law course he attended the lectures of Agassiz, Longfellow, Wyman, Lowell and Holmes. He returned home, and having spent a winter in the law office of Ward & Owens, became a member of the law firm of Ward, Jackson & Jones. Hon. Henry Jackson, one of the members, had been minister to Austria and Mr. Ward about this time was sent abroad as minister to China. Col. Jones was one of the earliest advocates of secession, and when it became necessary to organize in defense of the south, he became the senior first-lieutenant of the Chatham artillery. He was chief of artillery during the siege of Savannah. When the civil war was over Col. Jones moved to New York and began the practice of law. Here he mingled with literary characters which afforded him opportunities of study and research he could not have found then in the south. In 1877 he returned to Georgia and settled at Montrose in Summerville. In 1879 Col. Jones spent several months in travel, and while in England gained much information, which he used in his History of Georgia, a work pronounced by George Bancroft the finest state history ever published, and one that entitled its author to be called the Macauley of the south. He was a rapid worker, his Siege of Savannah being written in seven evenings, his two volumes of the History of Georgia in seven months and his Histories of Savannah and Augusta in two months. He was regarded after the appearance of his Antiquities of the Southern Indians as the highest authority upon that subject, and that book was the first to bring him into prominence with European scholars. Col. Jones was the most prolific writer Georgia ever produced and ranks first among southern historical and biographical writers of the present generation. He was the eldest of his family, his brother, Prof. Joseph Jones, being a distinguished scholar and chemist. Col. Jones' son, Charles Edgeworth, is a writer of magazine articles and shows evidence of inheriting his father's talent. Col. Jones was twice married, the first wife being Ruth (Berrien) Whitehead, of Burke county, and his second, Eva (Berrien) Eve, of Augusta. Both wives were grand-nieces of Hon. John McPherson Berrien, attorney-general in President Jackson's cabinet. Col. Jones was a handsome man, six feet high, broad-shouldered, with a fine head and face. With a commanding presence and charming conversational powers he possessed an interesting personality. His death occurred near Augusta, Ga., in 1893. Col. Jones' published works are: Monumental Remains of Georgia; Historical Sketches of Tomo-chi-chi, Mico of the Yamacraws; Antiquities of the Southern Indians; The Siege of Savannah in December, 1864; The Dead Towns of Georgia; The Life and Services of Commodore Tatnall; Memorial History of Augusta; The Life, Literary Labors and Neglected Grave of Richard Henry Wilde; Historical Sketches of the Chatham Artillery; Last Days, Death and Burial of Gen. Henry Lee; A Roster of General Officers, Etc., in Confederate Service; The History of Georgia; Negro Myths from the Georgia Coasts; Memorial History of Savannah; Biographical Sketches of Maj. John Habersham, of Georgia.

FATHER ABRAM J. RYAN.

Father Abram J. Ryan, born in Virginia in 1834, and died in Kentucky in 1886, was at one time claimed as one of Georgia's poets. For several years after the war he was a resident of Augusta. He was born in Norfolk, Va., and his parents came from Limerick, Ireland. There being no priest at Norfolk the babe was taken to Hagerstown, Md., for baptism, and this incident has been the cause of much discussion as to Father Ryan's birth-place. Early training and example of a good, patient Christian mother contributed much to Father Ryan's noble life, and to that mother did the good man dedicate his poems, or as he expressed it, "laid his simple rhymes as a garland of love" at her feet. Her piety did much in shaping his character, and he has said in speaking of his childhood days:

"I felt
That when I knelt
To listen to my mother's prayer,
God was w'ith my mother there."

When a lad of seven or eight years his parents moved to St. Louis, and there he attended the Brothers of the Christian school. He early showed mental activity and graces of character which endeared him to teachers and schoolmates. His reverence for sacred things and places led to the selection of the priesthood for his vocation. He soon entered the ecclesiastical seminary at Niagara, N. Y., and graduated with distinction and began at once the active duties of missionary life. On the outbreak of the war he joined the Confederate army as chaplain, and served until the close. A strict adherent to principle, and a man of deep conviction, he was slow to accept the results of the war, which he believed were fraught with disaster to the people of his section. He was a southerner of the strongest kind. "Their chariot-wheels had laid waste and desolated the land, and he for one could not bow and kiss the hands that had caused all this woe," and so he could make no concessions to the north. His was an open, manly character, and he was ever moved by kind impulses and influenced by charitable feelings, and so it was that when the yellow fever scourge devastated the southern land and the northern heart responded in sympathy to the affliction Father Ryan experienced a change and sung that glorious melody, "Reunited."

"The Northland, strong in love, and great,
Forgot the stormy days of strife;
Forgot that souls with dreams of hate
Or unforgiveness e'er were rife,
Forgotten were each thought and hushed;
Save—she was generous and her foe was crushed."

"Thus it was the angel of affliction and the angel of charity joined hands together and pronounced the benediction over a restored Union and a reunited people."

When hostilities had ceased and he heard of Lee's surrender he wrote the poem, "Conquered Banner."

"Furl that Banner, for 'tis weary;
Round its staff 'tis drooping dreary;
Furl it, fold it, it is best;
For there's not a man to wave it,
And there's not a sword to save it,
In the blood which heroes gave it;
And its foes now scorn and brave it;
Furl it, hide it—let it rest.

* * *

"Furl that Banner, softly, slowly!
Treat it gently—it is holy—
For it droops above the dead.
Touch it not—unfold it never,
Let it droop there, furled forever,
For its people's hopes are dead!"

His poem, the well known "Sword of Robert Lee," was written about the same time. Father Ryan was always a great sympathizer with Ireland, and his feelings found vent in Erin's Flag:

"Lift it up! lift it up! the old banner of green!
The blood of her sons has but brightened its sheen;
What though the tyrant has trampled it down,
Are its folds not emblazoned with deeds of renown?
What though for ages it droops in the dust, Shall it droop thus forever? No, no! God is just."

He lived once in Nashville, Tenn., and then moved to Clarksville, Tenn., and later still to Augusta, Ga. He edited the "Banner of the South" for five years, but this work was too exacting for him and he resigned from the paper. From 1870 to 1883 he was with St. Mary's church in Mobile, Ala. While lecturing in its behalf his health failed and he entered a Franciscan monastery to rest. While there he started his Life of Christ, but before it was finished the angel of death called him home. When the smallpox was raging in 1862 in the Gratiot state prison, the chaplain, alarmed, sought safety in flight. No other was found who was willing to risk his life by ministering to the sick and dying. One day a dying man asked for a minister and Father Ryan was sent for. He responded immediately and remained there for months attending to the sick and suffering. At the close of the war he lived near Beauvoir, Miss., and became an intimate friend of the Davis family. He was fond of music and would for hours play at the piano. Then the spirit would seize him and he would write his sweetest lines. It has been written of him: "He was a charming poet—one who could rekindle the smoldering embers in the heart, and make them burn with a fiercer flame than those which burned on vestal altars. He combined in one nature the impulsiveness of the Celt and the warm-heartedness of the southerner, and when he died he was mourned by all, irrespective of creed. A Roman Catholic, he was honored by Protestants; an Irishman, he was loved and admired by native Americans. Outside of race and creed, he was respected for his true manhood."

He had already won distinction as an orator, a lecturer, an essayist and a poet. "The leading merits of his poems are the simple sublimity of his verses; the rare and chaste beauty of his conceptions; the richness and grandeur of his thoughts; and their easy natural flow; the refined elegance and captivating force of the terms he employs as the medium through which he communicates those thoughts, and the weird fancy which throws around them charms peculiarly their own; these and other merits will win for their author enduring fame." Among his works were the following: Poems (Patriotic, Religious, Miscellaneous), Song of the Mystic, The Sword of Robert Lee, The Prayer of the South, The Conquered Banner, Gather the Sacred Dust, — Their Story Runneth Thus, Erin's Flag, A Crown for Our Queen (prose).

ALEXANDER HAMILTON STEPHENS.

Alexander Hamilton Stephens, who died during his gubernatorial term in 1883 at the age of seventy-one, was generally recognized as one of the foremost of American statesmen. He began life a poor orphan, and was indebted to the kindness of a wealthy friend for his education at the university of Georgia. President Moses Waddell was at that time the president of the college, and under the supervision of that great educator young Stephens made rapid progress. He ranked high as a scholar and a debater, and his record was very gratifying to his benefactor, and the lady who had become interested in his case, and who aided in defraying his expenses. It was thought that he would enter the ministry, but he changed his mind, paid back the money advanced for him, and managed to get through by his own efforts. For some time after graduating he taught school, and while teaching he was admitted to the bar after reading law only two months. Then began a severe struggle. During the first year he lived on six dollars a month and saved $400. He was quite successful in his profession and in 1836 was elected a member of the legislature. He was in congress several years before the war, and was vice-president of the Confederacy; a member of congress for several terms after the war, and in 1882 he was elected governor.

While an indefatigable student and writer he did not make his appearance as an author until 1867, when his War Between the States was published. This large work in two volumes was sold by subscription, and found its way into thousands of libraries. His school and pictorial History of the United States had a large sale, and won favor with the public. As an author Mr. Stephens was noted for his painstaking accuracy, reliability and impartiality. Although he opposed secession until the very last, and then followed the fortunes of the south, even to the extent of accepting the second office in the Confederacy, he always maintained the right of each state to withdraw from the Union, and his books are remarkable for the strong array of authorities and the arguments advanced to support his views on this subject. At the close of the war he was arrested and imprisoned five months in Fort Warren. He was then paroled, and his wise counsels materially aided in the restoration of law and order and good government in Georgia. Mr. Stephens was an invalid all his life, but he managed to get through with an immense amount of work. He was a favorite with all classes and all political parties and no man could supplant him in the affections of the people. It was generally admitted by his friends and opponents that he was an absolutely pure man, controlled by the highest and most patriotic motives. His life was one of work and pain, and his best energies were consecrated to the service of his people. His law practice and his books brought him a large income, but he spent every dollar of it in helping others. He was instrumental in educating nearly 100 young men, and many of them were entirely supported by him while they were at college. His charity manifested itself in many other ways, and at the time of his death his estate consisted only of his home place at Crawfordville and his library. The princely fortune accumulated by his labors had been spent in advancing the welfare of others. His speeches and writings will find readers for generations to come. They are not characterized by any extraordinary graces of style, but they convey much useful political and historical information, and if his sentences sometimes halt they are nevertheless clear and forcible, with the stamp of scholarship and profound thought. Unlike many public men, he was a lover of the best literature, and he was never happier than when he was at work in his library at "Liberty Hall," as his home was called. It is to be regretted that he did not find time to give still more work from his hand to the public.

THOMAS R. R. COBB.

Thomas R. R. Cobb, born in Athens in 1823, and killed on the battlefield in Virginia in 1862, was a lawyer, statesman and soldier whose gifts as a writer gave early promise of distinction. After a brilliant career at the state university he leaped to the front of the legal profession, while still a mere youth. He was the author of The Law of Slavery, a work which received the highest tributes of praise from the ablest lawyers of the Union. His Digest of the Laws of Georgia also ranks high. At the time of his death he was a brigadier-general, and one of the ablest and most daring of the southern generals. In Georgia he will long be remembered as the devoted friend of education. He built an academy at his own expense, and was the chief mover in establishing the Lucy Cobb institute at Athens, which was named in honor of one of his daughters. He was happily married to an intellectual woman, Miss Marion Lumpkin, the daughter of Chief Justice Lumpkin. His widow and several children survive him, and his youngest daughter is the wife of the Hon. Hoke Smith, secretary of the interior. Of his famous Digests Judge Richard H. Clark said: "This code was born during the war, hence its failure to create the sensation in the legal and literary world it would otherwise have created. The 'legal lights' are just now waking to the fact that it is the only code in the United States where the common law and the principles of equity have been reduced to a series of separate and distinct propositions, having the form and force of statutory laws. The credit of its distinguishing feature belongs entirely to Mr. Cobb." He was cut down by a shell at Fredericksburg, when only thirty-nine years old; had he lived he would have been one of the greatest leaders of the new south.

HENRY R. JACKSON.

Henry R. Jackson, born at Athens in 1820, has been a commanding figure in public life and at the bar for more than fifty years. Most of his life has been spent in Savannah, where he still resides. His father was the younger brother of Gov. James Jackson, and his mother was a daughter of Thomas Reade Rootes, esquire, of Fredericksburg, Va. Their son, Henry R. Jackson, graduated at Yale, and in a short time became one of the most successful lawyers in the south; he fought gallantly as a colonel in the Mexican war and as a general in the Confederate army. He was also minister to Austria before the war and minister to Mexico under Mr. Cleveland's first administration. Gen. Jackson early developed decided poetic gifts and many of his poems have never been preserved. In a volume styled Tallulah and Other Poems, published in 1850, many of his poems appear. The ones that attracted the most attention were My Father, My Wife and Child, and Old Red Hills of Georgia. The poem My Wife and Child was written at Camargo, Mexico, while the Mexican war was in progress. Every Georgian appreciated The Red Hills of Georgia:

"The red old hills of Georgia!
My heart is on them now;
Where, fed from golden streamlets,
Oconee's waters flow!
I love them with devotion,
The walks so bleak and bare.
How can my spirit e'er forget
The warm hearts dwelling there?"

1810452

"And where upon their surface
Is heart to feeling dead?—
And when has needy stranger
Gone from those hills unfed?
Their bravery and kindness
For aye go hand in hand,
Upon your washed and naked hills,
My own, my native land!"

SIDNEY LANIER.

Sidney Lanier was born at Macon, Ga., where his father, Robert S. Lanier, was a practicing lawyer. His mother was Mary Anderson, of Scotch descent, a native of Virginia, and gifted in poetry and music. When a child he taught himself to play upon the banjo, guitar, piano, violin and flute. He afterward became the finest flute player in the world. At the age of fourteen he entered Oglethorpe college near Midway, Ga., and was graduated, taking class honors. He excelled in mathematics, and during his whole college life it is said that he never shirked a duty or a responsibility. After graduation he remained in the school as tutor until the breaking out of the war. He and a younger brother, Clifford, enlisted as privates in the Confederate army with the Macon volunteers of the Second Georgia battalion. Several times Sidney was offered promotion, but he always refused it, because it would have separated him from his much beloved brother. The first year in the camp was pleasant without many hardships, and Sidney spent his time in learning French, German and Spanish, and in playing his flute. Later on he was in the battles of Seven Pines, Drury's Bluff, and the seven days' fighting around Richmond. After the fight at Malvern Hill the brothers were transferred to the signal service and stationed for a short time at Petersburg. He saw service in Virginia and North Carolina, and toward the last of the war the brothers were separated, each being put in charge of a vessel to run the blockade. Sidney's vessel was captured and he was confined for five months at Point Lookout prison. He had concealed his flute in his sleeve and this now became his dearest treasure. Near the close of the war he was exchanged and with his flute and a twenty dollar gold piece which he had when captured, he started for his Georgia home on foot in February, 1865. In March he reached home, exhausted from his tramp, and six weeks of illness followed, during which time his mother died of consumption. The two years following he was employed as a clerk in Montgomery, Ala. The second year he went north to see about the publication of his novel, Tiger Lilies. Of this book, describing his life during the war, Dr. Ward has written: "It is a luxuriant, unpruned work, written in haste for the press within the space of three weeks, but one which gives rich promise of the poet." Returning south he became principal of a school at Prattville and in the same year, 1867, married Miss Mary Day, daughter of Charles Day, of Macon. She had the utmost faith in her husband's abilities, and of this belief in him Mr. Lanier has written most gratefully. In My Springs he writes of her thus:

"O Love, O wife, thine eyes are they
My Springs from out whose shining gray
Issue the sweet celestial streams
That feed my life's bright Lake of Dreams.

"Oval and large and passion-pure
And gray and wise and honor-sure,
Soft as a dying violet breath,
Yet calmly unafraid of death.

"Dear eyes, dear eyes! and rare complete,
Being heavenly sure and earthly sweet,
I marvel that God made you mine,
For when he frowns 'tis then you shine."

About a year after his marriage a severe hemorrhage of the lungs alarmed his friends and wife, and caused him to resign his principalship. He then began to practice law with his father, and for five years proceeded, all the time struggling against consumption. By the advice of physicians he went to Texas for a change of climate. This did not bring the desired improvement, and knowing at best his life would not be long, and conscious of his genius, he determined to devote his remaining days to music and poetry. "With his flute and pen as sword and staff he turned his path northward, where an author had better opportunities for study and observation than in the struggling south, in which pretty much the whole of life had been merely not dying." In Baltimore, where he had made his home, he was engaged as first flute in the Peabody symphony concerts. Asger Hamerik, his director for six years in the Peabody symphony orchestra, thus speaks of him: "I will never forget the impression he made on me when he played the flute concerto of Emil Hartman at a Peabody symphony concert in 1878,—his tall, handsome, manly presence; his flute breathing noble sorrows, noble joys; the orchestra softly responding. The audience was spell-bound. Such distinction, such refinement! He stood the master, the genius."

During this time he was carrying on a course of study in the Anglo-Saxon and the early English texts. For months at a time he would have to give up all work and seek a change of air. Having contracted a fresh cold in November, 1876, he was obliged to go to Florida, and returning home, spent a while with friends in Georgia and Tennessee. For three winters following he played in the Peabody concerts in Baltimore. A course of Shakespearean lectures he delivered severely taxed his waning strength, but was the means of getting him the chair of English literature at Johns Hopkins. This brought him a regular salary and stimulated him to give utterance to his songs. Prominent among these were the Song of the Chattahoochee, A Song of Love, The Revenge of Hamish. He then was forced to go to Rockingham Springs, Va., where he lay exhausted by hemorrhages. Still his indomitable energy led him to do the work of a strong man. Besides many poems, he wrote here and sent to the press his Science of English Verse, the only one in existence, giving a scientific basis of poetry. Rallying himself he went to Baltimore in September, and the amount of work the dying man now accomplished was marvelous. He opened lecture schools, attended constant rehearsals, lectured at the university, besides writing poems. In January he was again ill, and continued failing until July, when he went to West Chester, Pa. As the weather grew cooler he returned to Baltimore and attended his lectures in a carriage, always sitting as he lectured. Such a force of will was wonderful. He wrote Sunrise when he couldn't feed himself. As a last resort he was taken to Asheville, N. C., and Mrs. Lanier, with her youngest child, came on to nurse him. As there was no improvement in his condition he made another effort, and the husband and wife took carriage across the mountain to Lynn, Polk Co. The father and brother were summoned here by telegram to the dying man, but they arrived too late to see him alive. The body was taken to Baltimore. In 1888 a marble bust was erected to his memory in that city.

ABSALOM CHAPPELL.

Absalom Chappell, born in Hancock county in 1801, and died in 1878, was the author of several books of value in their time, but not found in circulation now. They contained papers on The Oconee War, The Yazoo Fraud, Middle Georgia and the Negro, Gen. James Jackson, and Gen. Anthony Wayne. Col. Chappell was educated at that well-known school at Mt. Zion taught by Dr. Beman. He graduated from the law school of the state university under the guidance of Judge Clayton. He first practiced in Sandersville, then in Forsyth, afterward in Macon, and finally settled in Columbus, Ga. He married Miss Loretta R. Lamar, the sister of the poet, Mirabeau Lamar.

AUGUSTA EVANS WILSON.

There is no southern novelist better known than this author, who was born in Columbus, Ga., May 8, 1835. There are few romance writers of this country whose books have reached a greater circulation than those of Augusta Evans (Mrs. Wilson). Her father was M. R. Evans, a man of wealth, intellect and refinement, and her mother was Sarah S. Howard, a descendant of the Howards, one of the most cultivated families of Georgia. She was a child when her father moved to Texas at the end of the Mexican war, and no educational opportunities being offered in the neighborhood of San Antonio, her home, her schooling devolved upon the mother. It was there she received that literary training which fitted her for the remarkable achievements which have followed the course of her career. The mother was not only a woman of refinement and intelligence, but of literary tastes and any amount of pure southern bravery, who allowed nothing to prevent her daughter from cultivating her natural talent. Her first story, Inez, a tale of the Alamo, was written when she was only fifteen years old, and was published by the Harpers in 1855. Its scenery represents the surrounding country of the author's home, and the exciting events accompanying the Mexican war furnished a bright part of the theme. Beulah next appeared, and is considered by many her best book. The civil war interrupted her literary work, and it was a long time before her third novel, Macaria, was published. It passed the blockade by going to Cuba and thence to New York. It was written while the author sat in hospitals and nursed soldiers at Camp Beulah, near Mobile. A bookseller of Virginia first printed the book on coarse paper at an office in South Carolina. It was dedicated to the brave soldiers of the southern army, but the edition was all destroyed by a Federal officer in Kentucky. The issue was finally made by Lippencott & Derby, and the author partly protected as to her rights through the efforts of this firm. After the civil war ended Miss Evans took the manuscript of St. Elmo to New York in person. This was then the greatest of her works, and abounded with many historical references, showing great study and research. There have been few novels more abused or more commended than St. Elmo. Its success exceeded all expectations, and the author was the idol of the day. Towns, hotels, race horses and steamboats were named after the book, and the remuneration received by Miss Evans was a big figure. St. Elmo contains a description of that marvel of oriental architecture, the Taj Mahal at Agra in India—a marble tomb erected to perpetuate the name of Lalla Rookh. A traveler visiting Agra in 1891, writes that he was surprised to find a Parsee boy almost in the shadow of the Taj Mahal reading a copy of the London edition of Mrs. Wilson's Vashti. This book also met with unbounded favor. About this time Miss Evans married Mr. Wilson, a prominent citizen of Mobile, Ala. On account of her health he requested her to discontinue her novel writing, which she did, devoting herself to decorating her home and grounds. This home is located in a grove of magnificent oaks and fragrant magnolia trees on a beautiful road near Mobile. She has refused time and time again liberal offers, and not even a proposition to let her name her own price for a serial could tempt her. She has been offered $35,000 to allow her books to be published in cheap paper back form, not to interfere with her library bound editions, but refused to do so. She received $15,000 for Vashti before it ever went to press. Ten years elapsed between Infelice and her last work, At the Mercy of Tiberius. Mrs. Wilson loves Beryl the best of all characters, and considers At the Mercy of Tiberius her strongest book. Her whole life has been spent in the south, and she is a typical southerner. Sensitive and retiring, she is very appreciative of the good will of her fellow beings, and considers it a nobler privilege to possess the affections of "my country-women than to assist my country-men in making national laws." Miss Mildred Rutherford says of Mrs. Wilson: "Mrs. Wilson has frequently been pronounced the most brilliant and fascinating writer in the south. That she is a remarkable woman no one will deny. Entering the literary field without literary training at the age of sixteen, by her continued meritorious work she stands without question at the head of the novel writers of the south. She has woven into her novels all that is good and great in the human race, and she has given to her heroes and heroines the imperishable virtues of morality, Christianity and beauty. She is not a professional writer; literature has rather been an embellishment of her life. Her style has been severely criticised as pedantic, but certainly this charge may with equal justice be brought against George Meredith, Bulwer and George Eliot, and it is well established that Mrs. Wilson's books have in many instances stimulated her young readers to study history, mythology and the sciences, from which she so frequently draws her illustrations."

HARRY STILLWELL EDWARDS.

Harry Stillwell Edwards, the author of Two Runaways and other stories, was born in Macon, Ga., April 23, 1854. He attended a private school until fifteen years of age, when he accepted a clerkship in Washington, D. C. He returned to Georgia and studied law, graduating from Mercer university, Macon, with the degree of B. L. Then followed a period passed through by many young lawyers. Cases were few and an income was slow in materializing. His first literary effort was Varoli Bayerdierre, and appeared in the "Waverly Magazine" of Boston. He received the sum of fifteen dollars for this production, and at once dropped law and adopted story-writing as a profession. He wrote stories for this magazine and was local editor of the "Macon Telegraph" for several years. Then in 1881 he became part owner and associate editor of the paper. The gifted Albert R. Lamar was then managing editor. He also wrote many interesting, humorous and pathetic poems and sketches, some of which were The Atlanta Horn, The Man on the Monument and The Dooly County Safe. In 1885 his first magazine story of any decided merit, Elder Brown's Backslide, was published in "Harper's Magazine." It was followed by the Two Runaways, Sister Todhunter's Heart, De Valley an' de Shadder, and Idyl of Sinkin' Mountain, Minc, A Plot, Tom's Strategy, A Born Inventor and How Sal Came Through, all of which appeared in the "Century." Old Miss an' Sweetheart was subsequently published in "Harper's." He wrote many dialect verses, and has furnished many children's stories for "St. Nicholas" and "Youth's Companion." In 1890 the "Century" published the Two Runaways and other stories. Besides possessing literary talents he is quite musical, having set to music Mammy's Li'l Boy and Comin' from the Fields, two of his poems. In 1881 he married Miss Mary Roxie Lane, of Sparta, Ga. He is widely-known socially and enjoys the respect and friendship of all. Mrs. Augusta Lamar (Bacon) Curry writes of this well-known story-writer: "All of Harry Edwards' sketches are founded on fact. He is thoroughly familiar with the scenes and characters of which he writes, and selects his subjects from the every-day life around him. His plots are thoroughly original; there is nothing of the commonplace in them, and his stories are filled with quaint conceits and bright ideas. Minc, A Plot, is so thoroughly peculiar that it would be impossible to give an idea of it in a short sketch. He has the happy faculty of never repeating himself. Each story, no matter what the subject, while thoroughly true to life, is a new and distinct phase of human character, excellently drawn. His style, simple and unaffected, is a delightful combination of sentiment and pathos, with the sublimest humor."

MATT CRIM.

Miss Matt Crim was born in Atlanta, and has spent her life chiefly in Georgia. She was educated almost entirely in her native city. She now lives in New York. She wrote for the Sunny South and the Savannah papers, but her first sketch to attract general attention was An Unfortunite Creetur, which appeared in the "Century." "Harper's" and the "Independent" have since published many of her stories. Her books are The Adventures of a Fair Rebel, and In Beaver Cove and Elsewhere.

ELIZA FRANCIS ANDREWS.

Miss Eliza Francis Andrews was born in 1847, and her first work was A Family Secret, descriptive of southern life. A Mere Adventurer appeared in 1879, and in this Miss Andrews makes a plea for a wider field of usefulness for woman. The Letters of Elzey Hay were written mostly from Florida to the "Augusta Chronicle." Miss Andrews' home is Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., and she was educated at the La Grange Female college. She is now a teacher at Wesleyan Female college at Macon—the "mother of all female colleges." She is never idle, and is a popular contributor to current literature in Georgia.

WILLIAM H. HAYNE.

William H. Hayne was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1856, and is the son of Paul Hayne, the "King Arthur" of the pen. He was delicate in his youth, and outside of a short time spent at Dr. Porter's school in Charleston, was educated at home by his parents. His literary career began about 1879, and he has written enough poems to fill two volumes. His poems for children have appeared in "St. Nicholas," "Wide Awake," "Harper's Young People" and the "Independent." In 1873 he visited the north with his father, and in 1877 went once more, and was well-received. His poems are accepted by the best periodicals, and are much praised. His home after the war was Copse Hill, in the cottage already described in the sketch of his father's life. "The place became a sort of southern Mecca, to which loving folk made pilgrimages, and its name, 'Copse Hill,' grew familiar to all the world." There the father died in 1886. Many of William Hayne's choice morsels are in the quatrain form:

"It seems impossible to understand
How joy and sorrow may be hand in hand;
Yet God created when the earth was born
The changeless paradox of night and morn."

Then again:

"Hopes grimly banished from the heart
Are the sad exiles that depart
To melancholy's rayless goal—
A bleak Siberia of the soul."

This beautiful tribute to his father is from his pen:

"The guardian pines upon the hill
Were strangely motionless and chill,
As if they drew his last loved breath
From the uplifted wings of Death.
And now their mingled voices say,
The passing of a soul away—
The tenderest of the souls of men—
Our dead King Arthur of the pen!
Oh, kindred of the sea and shore,
Our grief is yours forevermore!
His body lieth cold and still,
For death has triumphed on the hill!"

At the unveiling of Sidney Lanier's bust in Macon, Ga., 1870, William Hayne delivered the poem of the occasion, and it was a grand tribute to the man it was intended to honor. Mr. Hayne has published one volume of his poems, Sylvan Lyrics.

CHARLES W. HUBNER.

Charles W. Hubner, of Atlanta, is of German lineage, and a native of Baltimore, Md. His boyhood was passed in Germany, studying music and the classics. He served in the Confederate army, and has been editorially connected with a number of papers in Atlanta, Ga.—the "Constitution," the "Evening Journal," the "Christian Index"—and was the literary editor of the "American," established by Dr. Armstrong. Some of Mr. Hubner's poems are of great beauty and a faultless rhythm, and are the product of half hours of leisure in the midst of the exacting duties of professional journalism. His touching and tender song, Spirit Eyes, is dedicated to a daughter who died. In speaking of her he says: "The Spirit Eyes I sing are her eyes, smiling down upon me wherever I turn my own tear-dimmed eyes to the starry splendors that blaze in the infinite blue. She was my darling, and just blooming into young maidenhood, when 'God's finger touched her' and she fell asleep in my arms to waken into life eternal. The sudden blow almost broke my heart, and the words were written with a pen dipped in the blood of a father's heart."

His works are: Historical Souvenirs of Luther, Wild Flowers, Cinderella, Lyrical Drama, Modern Communism, The Wonder Stone, Poems and Essays.

JAMES R. RANDALL.

James R. Randall, the author of Maryland, My Maryland, the war lyric which Oliver Wendell Holmes said was the best poem produced during the civil war, was born in Baltimore in 1843, and for twenty years was editor and writer on the "Augusta Chronicle." He is of English and French ancestry, "with a dash of Irish." He was educated at the Catholic college in Georgetown, D. C. In 1860 he was in New Orleans engaged in journalistic work. One night, while a professor at Poydras college, Point Coupee, La., he arose from a feverish dream and wrote the words of Maryland, My Maryland. He was immediately made famous. The story of how it was put to music is interesting. Frederic Berat chose the tune Ma Normandie, but later the lovely German lyric, Tannebaum, O Tannebaum, was selected. After the battle of Manassas some Maryland ladies visiting Gen. Beauregard were serenaded by the Washington artillery of New Orleans. After the serenade the soldiers asked for a song, and Miss Jennie Cary sang Maryland, My Maryland. The soldiers caught the refrain, and the whole camp rang with the beautiful melody. From that time Maryland became a national war song of the south. At the close of the war Mr. Randall married Miss Kate Hammond, the daughter of Col. Marcus Hammond, of South Carolina. Mr. Randall's journalistic work has received practical recognition from Hon. Patrick Walsh, the editor of the "Augusta Chronicle," who is the general manager of the Southern Associated Press, and warm friendship exists between them. In 1886 Mr. Randall left the "Chronicle" to associate himself with the "Anniston Hot Blast," and a year later he returned to his old home in Baltimore and became an editorial writer on the "Baltimore Press." His second war song, There's Life in the Old Land Yet, was written after the battle of Manassas, when the Maryland legislature took a step toward secession. In Memoriam was written when Pelham was killed, and Arlington soon followed, completing the quartet of war songs. Why the Robin's Breast Is Red, Young Marcellus and Eidolon are others of his poems. Mr. Randall has been called by his friends the "Tyrtæus" of the late war.

HENRY LYNDEN FLASH.

Henry Lynden Flash was a Buckeye boy by birth, and his parents were natives of Jamaica. He grew to manhood in New Orleans, and was educated in the Western Military institute of Kentucky. After graduation he went into business in Mobile, Ala. After a visit to Italy he returned to this country and settled in Mobile, then in Galveston, Tex. He served in the Confederate army until the last year of the war, when he bought and edited the "Macon Daily Telegraph and Confederate." It was in the columns of this paper that his poems were first read. He married Miss Clara Dolsen, of New Orleans. In 1886 he moved to Los Angeles, Cal., where he has since resided. He has only written poetry, as he so inclined, being steadily engaged in business. His poems have been collected and published. The poem, Shadows in the Valley, is considered one of his best. The first and last verses are:

"There's a mossy, shady valley,
Where the waters wind and flow,
And the daisies sleep in winter
'Neath a coverlet of snow;
And violets, blue-eyed violets,
Bloom in beauty in the spring,
And the sun-beams kiss the wavelets
Till they seem to laugh and sing;

"And no slab of pallid marble
Rears its white and ghostly head,
Telling wanderers in the valley
Of the virtues of the dead;
But a lily is her tombstone,
And a dew-drop, pure and white,
Is an epitaph an angel wrote

ORELIA KEY BELL.

Orelia Key Bell was born in Atlanta in 1864, and is the daughter of Marcus A. Bell. She is related to Francis Scott Key. She was educated in the Atlanta public schools and early developed a taste for literature. Her poetical genius was first encouraged by Henry W. Grady, of the "Atlanta Constitution," and she was spurred to further efforts by Mr. Page Baker, editor of the "New Orleans Times-Democrat," who accepted many of her poems. The "Century" used her productions, as did the "New York Sun," and it was in the latter paper that Gathering Roses first appeared. She is employed by the "Detroit Free Press" to furnish "flower songs" and "love songs" for its columns. Several of her poems have been set to music by distinguished composers, and elocutionists all over the land recite many of them. Miss Bell is at her best in her poems of nature. Her poems number in the hundreds. Those which attract the most attention are Po' Jo, Gathering Roses, To Youth, My Dream, Under the Laurel, To-day's Gethsemane, The Jamestown Weed and The Dead Worker.

Her poems will soon appear in book form. Mariposa, said to be the best she has written, has not yet been published.

FRANK LEBBY STANTON.

Frank Lebbv Stanton, the poet of the "Atlanta Constitution," was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1858. He lived while growing to manhood, as he expresses it, "from one end of Georgia to the other." His father moved from Charleston, S. C., to Savannah, Ga., where he died in 1865, and the boy at nine years of age began work on the farm. He studied hard and for six years was in a printing office. He then went to Smithville, where he founded the "Smithville News." Next he located at Rome and was employed on the "Tribune," a paper made so prominent by the writings of John Temple Graves, its editor. He began writing poetry at fifteen. He moved from Rome to Atlanta and edited the column, "Just from Georgia." His volume, Songs of a Day, was well received and passed rapidly through several editions. He is of a sensitive, tender nature, and the secret of his success is that his poems come from his heart, and go to the heart. They have a touch of nature in every line. The wife of Mr. Stanton has inspired many of his best efforts. His Dreamin' O' Home was written after talking with her of the old home at Smithville. A Little Hand was written from seeing her train a vine over the porch, and again he wrote of her hands:

"No jewels adorn them—no glittering bands—
They are just as God made them—those sweet, sweet hands!
And not for the world, with its splendor and gold
Nor for the pearls from the depths of the sea,
Nor the queens of the lands, with their beautiful hands,
Should these dear hands be taken from me.
What exquisite blisses await their commands!
They were made for my kisses—these dear, sweet hands."

MARIA LOUISE EVE.

Maria Louise Eve is a native of Augusta, Ga., and was born in 1848. She is the daughter of Dr. Edward Armstrong Eve, who was an eminent physician. The family of Eve when it first came to America settled in Philadelphia, afterward in Charleston, S. C., and finally came to Augusta, Ga. In 1866 she secured a prize of $100 for a prose essay, and in 1879 a prize of the same amount for the best poem expressing the gratitude of the south to the north for aid in the yellow fever epidemic.

This poem, Conquered at Last, begins:

"You came to us once, O brothers in wrath,
And rue desolation followed your path.
You conquered us then, but only in part,
For a stubborn thing is the human heart."

And it ends:

"You conquered us once, our swords we gave;
We yield now our hearts—they are all we have;
Our last trench was there, and it held out long;
It is yours, O friends, and you'll find it strong.
Your love had a magic diviner than art,
And 'conquered by kindness' we'll write on our heart."

Her Brier Rose won the prize for the best poem offered by the "Augusta Chronicle" in 1889, and her poem, The Lion and Eagle, a welcome to the England peace deputation, attracted much attention. Her writings are limited in number, but are of excellent quality.

LOLLIE BELLE WYLIE.

Lollie Belle Wylie was born in Bayou Coden, Ala., and her father dying when she was a babe, she was reared by her maternal grandfather, William D. Ellis, of Georgia. She was married to Hart Wylie when nineteen years of age, and after nine years of wedded life the husband died, leaving the widow with two little girls to support. Her first volume of poems, fresh from the press, was placed on her desk just as her husband died. Two years later she accepted Mr. Hoke Smith's offer to become society editor on the "Atlanta Journal," a position she held until she established a paper of her own—"Society." She is vice-president of the Woman's Press club of Georgia.

MONTGOMERY M. FOLSOM.

Montgomery M. Folsom, one of the editors of the "Rome Tribune," was born in Lowndes county, Ga., in 1857. His education was picked up in one of the old field schools and for three years he drove cattle. He was connected with the "Americus Daily Recorder" in 1884, and then went to the "Atlanta Constitution." He edited at different times the "Cedartown Standard," the "Atlanta Commonwealth" and the "Cedartown Guardian." He became associated with the "Atlanta Journal" in 1891. His published work is entitled Scraps of Song and Southern Scenes, and his sketches and poems appear in magazines all over the country.

J. L. M. CURRY, D. D., LL. D.

J. L. M. Curry, D. D., LL. D., was born in Georgia in 1825, and is of Scotch and English ancestry. He graduated from the university of Georgia in 1843, and studied law at Harvard. He has been a member of the Alabama legislature and has twice represented Georgia in congress. Under President Cleveland's first administration Mr. Curry was sent as minister to Spain. He has written much for newspapers and reviews and is the author of Constitutional Government in Spain, Gladstone, Establishment and Dis-establishment, or Progress of Soul Liberty in America. The last work has attracted much attention in England and America. He is a Baptist in his religious views, and is considered one of the most prominent divines of that denomination. Mercer university, appreciating his abilities, conferred upon him the degree of LL. D., and he holds the same degree from his alma mater.

ATTICUS GREEN HAYGOOD.

Atticus Green Haygood, born in 1830, was graduated from Emory college, Ga., and was at once licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1876 he was made president of Emory college. Dr. Haygood was offered the bishopric, but declined, feeling that he could do better service in the management of the Paine institute fund, but finally accepted the honor in 1890. His first book, Go or Send, published in 1873, was a prize essay on missions. Our Children, published in 1876, was well received, and 14,000 copies were sold. His other works are: Our Brother in Black, Sermons and Speeches, Pleas for Congress, The Man of Galilee, Jack-Knife and Brambles. Mr. Haygood is one of the ablest men in the southern Methodist conference. His sister is the well-known teacher, Miss Laura Haygood, who has been missionary to China for ten years.

"BILL ARP."

Charles H. Smith, or "Bill Arp," was born in Gwinnett county, Ga., in 1826. His father was from Massachusetts, and settled in Savannah, where he married a pupil in a school he was teaching. He "grew up as bad as other town boys, went to school some and worked some." He entered Franklin college at Athens, but did not graduate. He then studied law. He married Miss Mary Octavia Hutchins, and they have ten children. His famous letters first appeared when the war commenced, and were written in the Josh Billings style of spelling. They were rebellious letters in a humorous way, and attracted attention, not only for the humor but from the fact that what he good-naturedly said was so much to the point that it reached every true southerner. The "Courier-Journal" said of his letter to Artemus Ward in 1865, that: "It was the first chirp of any bird after the surrender, and gave relief and hope to thousands of drooping hearts." Another paper said: "His writings are delightful mixtures of humor and philosophy. There is no cynicism in his nature, and he always pictures the brightest side of domestic life, and encourages his readers to live up to it and enjoy it." He dropped the phonetic spelling after the war. In the weekly letters he has sent out for thirty years he has told much about himself and family. He bought a farm at Cartersville, Ga., after the war, and there he lives and writes. His home life is very happy. His cheerful philosophy cannot fail to brighten all around him. "Bill Arp" is at present writing letters to the "Constitution" and the "Sunny South," and has just published a History of Georgia.

WALTER LE CONTE STEVENS.

Walter Le Conte Stevens, Cassville, Cass Co., Ga., was born in 1847, and is a grandnephew of Louis Le Conte. He was graduated from the university of Georgia and became professor of natural sciences at Packer institute, New York. He then accepted an offer made by the Rensselaer Polytechnic institute, Troy, N. Y., in the science department. His contributions to the journals of the day have been widely copied in Europe.

WILLIAM LOUIS JONES, M. D.

William Louis Jones, M. D., born in Liberty county, Ga., in 1827, is a nephew of Louis Le Conte. He was graduated from the Franklin college, was at Harvard under Agassiz, and studied and practiced medicine. He succeeded Dr. Joseph Le Conte as professor of chemistry and natural history at Franklin college. Dr. Jones bought the "Southern Cultivator" after the war and moved to Atlanta. He contributed to this, as well as to the "Southern Farm and Weekly Constitution," many valuable scientific articles. His home is now in Atlanta.

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS.

Joel Chandler Harris was born Dec. 9, 1849, in Eatonton, the county seat of Putnam county, Ga. He was capable of reading and writing before he was six years old. Possessed of an imaginative nature, which had been stimulated by reading the Vicar of Wakefield, he at this early age read everything in print that he could find. He attended the Eatonton academy a few years, but that was the extent of his educational advantages. Near his home was the plantation of a Col. Turner, who there resided and published a weekly paper called "The Countryman." About the time young Harris was twelve years old, Col. Turner found need of the services of a bright, capable boy to learn the printer's trade, and this proved to be a piece of good fortune, which in a great measure supplied his lack of scholastic training and influenced his whole career. Young Harris applied to the Colonel and got the place. Turner was a bookish sort of man, and his wealth enabled him to gratify many whims. Two of his pet hobbies were to collect books and to run a newspaper. Col. Turner took a fancy to the applicant, and young Harris formed a liking for the publisher, and so he went to work at once. The work was not so hard as usually fell to the printer's devil of that period, and the lad had no difficulty in filling the position. Col. Turner, observing the mental activity of his boy, gave him a few judicious hints about a course of reading, and turned him loose in his leisure hours in the library. These books and his newspaper work constituted his educational training. He had no formal rules to go by and learned nothing by rote, but in a gradual and natural way acquired a large stock of information, and before long was fairly versed in belles-lettres. The first books he read showed a strong taste for a country boy. He was not interested in books of the present time, but was fond of the writers of the Elizabethan age. Good old Sir Thomas Browne was one of his special favorites, and other books, equally unique in character and beyond the usual range of a school boy's reading, were devoured by him. With the gaining of knowledge came the desire to write. His first efforts were sent in anonymously to "The Countryman," but when they were printed and Col. Turner commended them the author avowed himself. Following this he wrote regularly, and his contributions took a range embracing local articles, essays and poetry. The young printer and the planter were getting along finely until the appearance of Sherman's army. The plantation was so retired that they could not realize the nearness of the great conflict. The course of Sherman in his march toward the sea after burning Atlanta lay through Eatonton. Everybody deserted the place, taking all their possessions that could be speedily removed. Col. Turner was one of the last to go, taking his family and leaving Harris to occupy his mansion and save what he could from the invaders. Slocum's corps passed through the plantation and for three or four days the stationary occupant was kept busy doing what he could to protect the property of his employer. The invaders treated the young man well enough, after their fashion. They helped themselves to what they would, but were in a good humor and committed no outrages. In a few months the war was over and Harris sought a wider field. He was employed on the press successively in Macon, New Orleans, Forsyth and Savannah. In the last named city he was employed as an editorial writer on the "Morning News," then under the management of W. T. Thompson, the author. While in that city Mr. Harris married Miss La Rose of Canada. He was succeeding well and achieving fame, when the yellow fever scourge struck the city in 1876 and almost decimated it. This was the cause of his removal to Atlanta, where he became a member of the editorial staff of the "Constitution," and where his literary career proper really had its beginning. At that time Sam W. Small was a writer on the paper, being the author of the "Old Si" negro dialect sketches, and he shortly after resigned. The articles had been popular, and Mr. Harris was requested to try his hand in that line. In his boyhood on the Turner plantation he had spent night after night listening to the wonderful folk-lore tales of the negroes, and as he had never seen them in print he decided to experiment with them. In a few months the Uncle Remus sketches attracted attention everywhere, and the result is familiar to the world in the shape of the volume entitled Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings. The book was at once reprinted in England, and its appearance was an event in the literary circles of both countries. The author said regarding these marvelous fables that he was merely the reporter, and claimed no credit for them, but his deft manner of handling them and his subtle humor caught the public and there was eager desire to hear from him. In 1883 was published Nights with Uncle Remus; in 1884 Mingo, and Other Sketches in Black and White; in 1887 Free Joe and Other Sketches, Daddy Jake, On the Plantation, Little Mr. Thimblefinger, and other books. During these busy years Mr. Harris was closely held down by his editorial duties, and he was unable to form an opinion concerning the merits of his stories, and when he saw favorable reviews of them in every paper and no adverse criticism anywhere he was astounded. The success of the English editions amazed him, and the high praise received from the great London reviews was something he could not understand. Success has had no effect upon the modesty of this happy and fortunate story teller. He is told his writings are popular, and he knows that his pen is bringing him in an ample income, but it is still a mystery to him. Famous men in England write to him, French publishers issue translations of his stories, fashionable clubs in the great cities tender him receptions, the publishers ask him by nearly every mail to send them something, but none of these communications are allowed to disturb the even tenor of his life. Mr. Harris is a hard working journalist, and is at his desk nearly every day in the year, and the copy that he furnishes his paper every twelve months would make seven or eight volumes of the regulation size. Under such circumstances the wonder is that he has been able to do so much literary work of permanent value and interest during the past eight or ten years. Just at present he is engaged upon Aaron, a novel which is destined to be the longest and most ambitious of his efforts. He has also completed, jointly with Mrs. M. S. Young, of Alabama (Eli Shepherd), Songs and Ballads of the Old Plantations, and the work will make its appearance at an early day.

Mr. Harris is of medium height, compact, but supple, and rather on the rotund order; he is the most pronounced of blondes, with chestnut hair, a mustache of the same shade, and blue eyes—very honest and modest-looking eyes, except when the owner of them is in a merry mood, and then they dance and flash with mischief. He makes it a point to be jolly at all times and under all circumstances. Sick or well, he is always in a good humor. He thoroughly enjoys his work, and manages to extract as much fun out of it as some people would get out of a continuous round of amusements. Yet he can be serious. He is serious when he talks about his favorite books—the Bible is one of them. He is serious when he speaks of his great heroes—Lincoln, Lee, and Stonewall Jackson—and he is serious enough when he comes across any real suffering, or when misfortunes befall good men. A more natural, unaffected man does not live. He cares little for society, and yet does not shun it. He is frank and outspoken upon all subjects, and it does not take any round-about mode of questioning to find out exactly where he stands upon any issue. The whole tendency of the man is toward simplicity. He likes old-fashioned ways and plain English. He loves a good story, but it must be a story, not a minute psychological analysis. The school of Howells, James, and Tolstoy has no charm for him. What he wants in everything is a touch of nature. The methods of work adopted by Mr. Harris are, perhaps, not out of the ordinary line. He does not wait for inspiration. He maps out a plot in his mind, pictures to himself some of the leading actors, and then, after a hard day's editorial work, sits down to write. He writes with ease, and yet not rapidly. He puts his conscience into his work. If he cannot put nature on the printed page, he is determined to put her counterfeit presentment there. He does not strain after unusual and sensational effects, and he endeavors to use the simplest, clearest and strongest English he can command. Mr. Harris lives in a handsome Queen Anne residence, with spacious grounds, at West End, Atlanta's handsomest suburb, where, with his pleasant and attractive family, he entertains his literary friends and neighbors. In the introductory preface to Uncle Remus, Mr. Harris says:

"With respect to the folk-lore series, the effort has been to preserve the legends themselves in their original simplicity, and to wed them permanently to the quaint dialect—if, in these, it can be called a dialect—through the medium by which they have become a part of the domestic history of every southern family; and I have endeavored to give to the whole a genuine flavor of the old plantation. Each legend has its variants, but in every instance I have retained that particular version which seemed to me the most characteristic, and have given it without embellishment and without exaggeration. . . . If the language of Uncle Remus fails to give vivid hints of the really poetic imagination of the negro, if it fails to embody the quaint and homely humor which was his most prominent characteristic, if it does not suggest a certain picturesque sensitiveness—a curious exaltation of mind and temperament not to be defined by words—then I have reproduced the form of dialect merely, and not the essence, and my attempt may be counted a failure. At any rate, I trust I have been successful in presenting what must be, to a large portion of American readers, a new and by no means unattractive phase of negro character—a phase which may be considered a curiously sympathetic supplement to Mrs. Stowe's wonderful defense of slavery as it existed in the south. Mrs. Stowe, let me hasten to say, attacked the possibilities of slavery with all the eloquence of genius, but the same genius painted the portrait of the southern slave-holder, and defended him.

"If the reader not familiar with plantation life will imagine that the myth-stories of Uncle Remus are told night after night to a little boy by an old negro who appeared to have lived during the period which he describes—who has nothing but pleasant memories of the discipline of slavery, and who has all the prejudices of caste and family that were natural results of the system—if the reader can imagine all this, he will find little difficulty in appreciating and sympathizing with the air of affectionate superiority which Uncle Remus assumes as he proceeds to unfold the mysteries of plantation lore to a little child, who is a product of that practical reconstruction which has been going on to some extent since the war, in spite of the politicians."

The following sketches, taken from the books of Mr. Harris, show the quaint dialect and odd character upon which his interesting stories are founded:

The First of Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox.—One evening recently the lady whom Uncle Remus calls "Miss Sally" missed her little seven-year-old. Making search for him through the house and through the yard, she heard the sound of voices in the old man's cabin, and, looking through the window, saw the child sitting by Uncle Remus. His head rested against the old man's arm, and he was gazing with an expression of the most intense interest into the rough, weather-beaten face that beamed so kindly upon him. This is what "Miss Sally" heard:

"Bimeby one day after Brer Fox bin doin' all dat he could do fer ter ketch Brer Rabbit, en Brer Rabbit bin doin all he could fer to keep 'im fum it, Brer

Fox say to hise'f dat he'd put up a game on Brer Rabbit, en he ain't mo'n got the wuds out'n his mouf twell Brer Rabbit come a lopin' up de big road, lookin' dess ez plump en ez fat en ez sassy ez a Moggin hoss in a barley-patch.

"Hol' on dar, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"I ain't got time, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, sorter mendin' his licks.

"I wanten have some confab wid you, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"All right, Brer Fox; but you better holler fum whar you stan'. I'm monstus full er fleas dis mawnin'," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee.

"I seed Brer B'ar yestiddy," says Brer Fox, sezee, 'en he sorter rake me over de coals kaze you en me ain't make frens en live naberly, en I tole 'im dat I'd see you.'

"Den Brer Rabbit scratch one year wid his off hind-foot sorter jub'ously, en den he ups en sez, sezee:

"All a settin', Brer Fox. Spose'n you drap roun' termorrer en take dinner wid me. We ain't got no great doin's at our house, but I speck de ole 'oman en de chilluns kin sorter scramble roun' en git up somp'n fer ter stay yo' stum-muck.'

"I'm 'gree'ble, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"Den I'll 'pen' on you," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee.

"Nex' day Mr. Rabbit an' Miss Rabbit got up soon, 'fo' day, en raided on a gyarden like Miss Sally's out dar, en got some cabbiges, en some roas'n years, en some sparrer-grass, en dey fix up a smashin dinner. Bimeby one er der little Rabbits, playin' out in de backyard, come runnin' in hollerin', "Oh, ma! oh, ma! I seed Mr. Fox a comin'!" En den Brer Rabbit he tuck der chilluns by der years en make um set down, en den him en Miss Rabbit sorter dally roun' waitin' fer Brer Fox. En dey kep on waitin', but no Brer Fox ain't come. Atter 'while Brer Rabbit goes to de do', easy like, en peep out, en dar, stickin' out fum behime de cornder, wuz de tip-eeen' er Brer Fox tail. Den Brer Rabbit shot de do' en sot down, en put his paws behime his years en begin fer ter sing:

"De place wharbouts you spill de grease, right dar youer bound

An' whar you fine a bunch of ha'r, you'll sholy fine de hide.'

"Nex' day Brer Fox sont word by Mr. Mink, en skuze hisse'f kaze he was too sick fer ter come, en he ax Brer Rabbit fer ter come en take dinner wid him; en Brer Rabbit say he wuz 'gree'ble.

"Bimeby, w'en de shaders wuz at der shortes', Brer Rabbit he sorter brush up en santer down to Brer Fox's house, en w'en he got dar, he yer somebody groanin', en he look in de do' en dar he see Brer Fox settin up in a rockin' cheer all wrop up wid flannil, en he look mighty weak. Brer Rabbit look all 'roun', he did, but he ain't see no dinner. De dish-pan wuz settin' on de table, en close by wuz a kyarvin' knife.

"Look like you gwineter have chicken fer dinner, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee.

"Yes, Brer Rabbit, deyer nice, en fresh, en tender," sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"Den Brer Rabbit sorter pull his mustarsh, en say, 'You ain't got no calamus root, is you, Brer Fox? I done got so now dat I can't eat no chicken 'ceppein she's seasoned up wid calamus root.' And wid dat Brer Rabbit lipt out er de do', and dodge 'mong de bushes, en sot dar watchin' fer Brer Fox; en he ain't watch long, nudder, kase Brer Fox flung off de flannil en crope out er de house en got whar he could close in on Brer Rabbit, en bimeby Brer Rabbit holler out, 'Oh, Brer Fox! I'll dess put yo' calamus root out yer on dish yer stump. Better come git it while hit's fresh!'

"And wid dat Brer Rabbit galop off home. En Brer Fox ain't never kotch 'im yit, en w'at's mo', honey, he ain't gwineter."

Race Improvement.—"Dere's a kind er limberness 'bout niggers dese days dat's mighty cu'us," remarked Uncle Remus yesterday, as he deposited a pitcher of fresh water upon the exchange table. "I notisses it in de aller-ways an' on de street-cordners. Dey er rackin' up, mon, dese yer cullud fokes is."

"What are you trying to give us now?" inquired one of the young men, in a bilious tone.

"The old man's mind is wandering," said the society editor, smoothing the wrinkles out of his lavender kids.

Uncle Remus laughed. "I speck I is gettin' mo' frailer dan I wuz fo' de fahmin days wuz over, but I sees wid my eyes an' I years wid my years, same ez enny er dese yer bucks w'at goes a gallopin' roun' huntin' up devilment, an' w'en I sees how dey er dancin' up, den I gets sorter hopeful dey er kinder ketchin' up wid me."

"How is that?"

"Oh, dey er movin'," responded Uncle Remus. "Dey er sorter comin' roun'. Dey er gittin' so dey b'leeve dat dey ain't no better dan de w'ite fokes. W'en freedom come out de niggers sorter got dere humps up, an' dey staid dat way, twell bimeby dey begun fer ter git hongry, an' den dey begun fer ter drap inter line right smartually; an' now," continued the old man, emphatically, "dey er des ez palaverous ez dey wuz befo' de war. Dey er gittin' on solid groun', mon."

"You think they are improving, then?"

"You er chawin' guv'ment now, boss. You slap de law onter a nigger a time er two, an' larn 'im dat he's got fer to look atter his own rashuns an' keep out'n udder foke's chick'n-coops, an' sorter coax 'im inter de idee dat he's got ter feed 'is own chilluns, an' I be blessed ef you ain't got 'im on risin' groun'. An' mo'n dat, w'en he gits holt er de fact dat a nigger k'n have yaller fever same ez w'ite fokes, you done got 'im on de mo'ner's bench, an' den ef you come down strong on de pint dat he oughter stan' fas' by de fokes what help him w'en he wuz in trouble de job's done. W'en you does dat, ef you ain't got yo' han's on a new-made nigger, den my name ain't Remus, an' ef dat name's bin changed I ain't seen her abbertized."

MARY E. BRYAN.

Mrs. Mary E. Bryan, a native of Florida, has spent the greater portion of her life in Georgia, and now resides at Clarkston, within a half hour's ride of Atlanta. She married while a mere school girl, and at the age of nineteen accepted a position on "The Temperance Crusader," a literary weekly of some renown, which was published in Atlanta before the war, under the management of Mr. John H. Seals. Mrs. Bryan wrote stories and sketches for years, without coming prominently before the public, but in 1876 she gave Manche to the reading world, and in a short time Wild Work and other books followed in rapid succession. About this time she connected herself with "The Sunny South," a literary paper in Atlanta, conducted by the gentleman who had first engaged her services on "The Temperance Crusader." For this periodical she wrote in the course of ten years some of the best efforts of her life, but finding that her field was too narrow she went to New York, where she for several years edited the "Fashion Bazar"

and "The Fireside Companion," two of George Munro's popular publications. In the metropolis her brilliant abilities were properly appreciated, and in Sorosis and the Woman's Press club she held high official positions. Her novel, Wild Work, was pronounced by the New York "Herald" "the best American historical romance," and her other novels written for Mr. Munro were quite successful. But Mrs. Bryan has never seemed to care for the publicity which is so gratifying to many writers. She is a creature of impulse, and when she is in the mood she writes poems, short stories and novels with almost lightning-like rapidity. She never revises, and she has been known to write as many as four novels at the same time, turning from one to another without being in the slightest degree embarrassed by the numerous characters and plots. When Alexander H. Stephens was asked to name his favorite novelist he unhesitatingly replied that Mrs. Bryan was his favorite, and when Manche was published he ordered 100 copies for distribution among his friends. If this prolific writer of fiction had imitated some of her contemporaries in the matter of looking after her fame and her business interests, she would now be one of the most widely known and best remunerated of American writers. Having a competency of her own, she has never cared much about the pecuniary rewards of literature, and the $10,000 a year which she earned in New York tempted her so little that she voluntarily gave up the editorship of "The Bazar" and "The Fireside Companion" and returned to Georgia under a contract to still furnish four novels a year to her late employer. It is impossible to know Mrs. Bryan without recognizing her as a woman of genius. Two generations of southerners have read her stories, and her name is more familiar to the people south of the Potomac than that of any other literary woman, with the exception of Mrs. Southworth and Miss Evans, the author of Beulah, Macaria, and other novels. While she writes with the greatest possible rapidity, her style is remarkable for its vivid coloring, graphic and picturesque description and a certain intensity which throws a spell over the average reader. She is still in the prime of womanhood, and it is possible that she will in her future work command even a larger constituency than she has attracted in the past.

PROF. WILLIAM HENRY PECK.

Prof. William Henry Peck is another novelist who is claimed by Georgia. Born in Louisiana some sixty years ago, he resided in Atlanta for a number of years, until he sought a home in Florida. A professor of history, a college president and a journalist, this untiring worker may be said to rank with Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., as a writer of thrilling and romantic fiction. Up to the present time he has written about seventy long serial stories, and forty of them were produced, it is said, in the incredibly short period of ten years. Among some of his best known novels are The Miller of Marseilles, The Stone Cutter of Lisbon, The Queen's Secret, The Flower Girl of London, and The King's Messenger. During his residence in Atlanta he was a salaried contributor to the New York "Ledger," receiving $10,000 a year. He wrote also for the New York "Weekly," and "Saturday Night," and has been known to command $5,000 for a single serial. Prof. Peck has never been ranked by the critics and reviewers as a literary man, and yet his writings show a profound historical study, and in point of style they will suffer nothing by comparison with the works of more celebrated writers. But the critics and book reviewers are unwilling to say much in praise of a writer who sells his productions to the story weeklies, and turns out as many as four novels a year. If this gifted story-teller had gone about his work more deliberately, writing a novel once in every two or three years, for some well-known publishing firm, he would have won a much higher place among American novelists. But the critics resent fecundity, and when a man comes to the front with seventy novels in twenty years, the reviewers at once assign him an inferior place, without taking the trouble to examine his work.

JAMES MAURICE THOMPSON.

James Maurice Thompson, born in Indiana in 1844, and for a long time a resident of Georgia, stands in the front rank of the men of letters who have made this state their home. After serving four years in the Confederate army, he opened a law office at Calhoun. His first contributions appeared in "The Ladies' Home Gazette," and "Scott's Monthly," two popular Atlanta publications, and their scholarship and graceful style attracted the favorable attention of the reading public. Some years after the war he returned to his native state, Indiana, where he has since held the office of state geologist, and has devoted himself in his leisure hours to literature. He is a member of the New York "Independent's" staff, but finds time to write for numerous magazines and weeklies. Despite his fondness for a literary career, he is a man of affairs, with good business judgment, and makes no secret of the fact that he desires to reap substantial rewards rather than fame. He is a lover of science and an enthusiastic student of nature. Among his works are Hoosier Mosaics, Songs of Fair Weather, The Witchery of Archery, At Love's Extremes, A Tallahassee Girl, By-Ways and Bird Notes, A Fortnight of Folly, and a half dozen others of less note, to say nothing of his scores of short stories. Law, geology, and literature, together with judicious investments, have made Mr. Thompson a wealthy man, and among his neighbors he is regarded as a far-seeing man of business, whose judgment and predictions are worthy of the highest respect. With so many professions and occupations, and with his pen so constantly employed, it is natural that his style should be very unequal, and characterized by so much variety that it is difficult to describe or classify it. In one book he writes in the dry and colorless fashion of a veteran scientist, while in another he displays the vivacity of a society novelist. His short stories are also of very unequal merit, and the sensational character of some of them makes it evident that they were written at an early period of his life, before his tastes and his style had felt the influence of a mature intellect. It is confidently expected by his admirers that some of his best work will be given to the world in the years to come, as he is now at his best, with no adverse conditions to hamper his genius.

BENJAMIN HARVEY HILL.

Benjamin Harvey Hill, born in Walton county, and died in 1882, deserves a place among authors for the same reason that Junius has won a place among the literary men of England. Junius wrote letters for a newspaper which found their way later to the public in a book. This was the case with Mr. Hill's Notes on the Situation, a series of articles in many respects as notable as the Letters of Junius. Before the Notes were written their author had been prominent in public life for nearly twenty years. He had been a leader at the bar, an active politician and a Confederate senator. After the war, when Georgia was going through the various stages of reconstruction, the people were completely terrorized by Federal authority and bayonet rule. Many of the most influential citizens hesitated to express their views on the platform or in print, and a few white republicans and the negro voters were in a fair way to shape the policy of the state and control affairs indefinitely. At this critical time Mr. Hill wrote some fifteen or twenty letters for the Augusta "Chronicle," in which he clearly outlined the dangers then confronting the people, and pointed out the remedy. He urged organized and fearless action on the part of the democratic party, which contained the great mass of the whites, and encouraged his people to hope that a bold and determined fight for their constitutional rights would finally win. These stirring letters arraigned the Federal authorities and their allies in Georgia as usurpers and oppressors, and heaped upon them the most terrible denunciation and invective that the writer could command. The effect was immediate and far-reaching. Ex-Gov. Joseph E. Brown replied to the Notes, but he had espoused the unpopular side, and his utterances were not generally heeded. The name of Benjamin H. Hill became as familiar as a household word throughout Georgia and the south, and the young men, especially, hailed him as the leader sent to redeem the south from bondage. In a short time the whites of Georgia organized, and although the republicans succeeded in forming a new constitution, under which they elected a governor and a legislature, Mr. Hill's appeals and counsel reached every fireside in the commonwealth, and the people were the first in the south to get rid of republican rule and the evils of reconstruction. The writings of Georgia's great tribune will always be admired for their pure English and their clear and forcible eloquence. His sentences are stately, and they have that peculiar swing which belongs to the style of a great speaker. Their frequent quotations from Milton show that Mr. Hill was a close reader of that master spirit of English literature, and it is noteworthy that these articles increase in their intensive form from first to last until the climax is reached. In these peaceful times they may impress some readers as being unnaturally strained and excited in their tone; but in an era of something like anarchy, when the people stood between the evils of military despotism and servile insurrection, it is easy to understand the tremendous effect which they produced upon the popular mind. Nothing in the political literature of Georgia, from the revolutionary period down to the present time, is in any way comparable to the Notes on the Situation. In after years Mr. Hill made numerous speeches on the hustings and in both houses of congress, which added to his fame as an orator and statesman, but nothing ever came from his pen that was equal to his letters in the reconstruction period. Such opportunities come only once in a life-time, and the man who masters them and is equal to the occasion cannot hope to repeat his achievement. Junius laid down his pen at the right time, and Benjamin Harvey Hill ceased to write when he found that he had accomplished his purpose. After that he reached the people in other ways and by other methods. He wrote no more letters and pamphlets, but his eloquence made itself felt in every corner of the republic, and in some of his greatest congressional efforts—as in his Andersonville speech, for instance—the Junius-like precision and force of his written style is apparent in every sentence. A political history of his times from the pen of this great southern leader would have been a valuable contribution to our literature; but in its absence, the biography of his father, with a collection of his speeches, by Benjamin H. Hill, jr., will be found to be a work of permanent interest and value.

ISAAC W. AVERY.

Isaac W. Avery belongs to the literature and journalism of Georgia, and his work has been so notable in both that it is difficult to assign him his place in a chapter which deals with literary men and newspaper writers. He was born in St. Augustine, Fla., in 1837, and it is said that his father could trace his ancestry back in England as far as 1359. One writer has followed the family to King Alfred, and then to Egbert, the first Saxon king. The first Avery in America came over in 1631, to the colony established by John Winthrop, the colonial governor of Massachusetts. The grandson of this pioneer married the granddaughter of Winthrop, and from this couple the subject of this sketch is lineally descended. One of the family signed the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. Young Avery had the best educational advantages, and began the practice of law in 1860. The outbreak of the war interrupted his peaceful pursuits, and after taking part in the capture of Fort Pulaski he entered the Confederate army as a private and served until the close. He rose to the rank of captain, major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel and brigadier-general, and came out of the struggle a poor man. In two or three years he gave up the law and settled down in Atlanta as the managing editor of the "Constitution." Later he was one of Henry W. Grady's partners on the "Herald," and from 1877 until 1883 he served as secretary of the Georgia executive department under various governors. In 1881 his History of Georgia was published. This work deals with the period between 1850 and 1880, and is notable for its full and complete narrative of Georgia's trials during the war and the reconstruction periods. He has held the office of chief of the public debt division in the United States treasury department, and has declined other high government positions. He was the associate editor for Georgia of the National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, and in 1895 was the commissioner of the Cotton States and International exposition to Mexico, Central and South America, where his mission was remarkably successful. Gen. Avery is one of the most brilliant writers in Georgia. He is a man of culture and travel; observation and favorable opportunities have aided greatly in the development of his natural gifts. While his History of Georgia is only a fragment it is one of the most valuable contributions ever made to the historical literature of the state.

JAMES W. LEE, D. D.

James W. Lee, D. D., born in 1849, and educated at the university of Georgia, is an example of what may be accomplished by a bright intellect under the most adverse circumstances. He was a poor country boy, but after he had worked his way through college and had entered the Methodist ministry, his native talent and painstaking application began to make an impression upon the public. His essays and lectures were very popular in all sections and in the course of a few years he won for himself a prominent place as a writer and as a lecturer. In 1893 his book entitled, The Making of a Man, made its appearance, and from the first it was one of the most popular religious works ever issued in America. It passed through edition after edition in all civilized lands, and even in Japan it is a favorite book with the native Christians. Dr. Lee was called from Atlanta to a church in St. Louis in 1893, but since that time he has made a tour through the holy land with the Rev. Dr. Vincent, and the record of his trip, issued in a series of illustrated parts, is meeting with a very large sale. The doctor's style is exceptionally clear and vigorous. He is a hard student and a close observer, and his friends look for even better and more enduring work from his pen.

WILLIAM T. THOMPSON.

William T. Thompson, born in Ohio in 1812, and died in Savannah in 1882, was one of Georgia's earliest and most popular litterateurs. While contributing to the old "Madison Miscellany" and various other papers he found time to write numerous stories and sketches. His farce, The Live Indian, held the stage for many years, but he failed to secure its copyright and never made any money out of it for himself. He was equally unfortunate in regard to Major Jones' Courtship. This story is a broadly-humorous description of life among the country people in north Georgia, and for many years it had a large sale all over the country, but especially in the south and west. It was published by the Petersons of Philadelphia, and the same firm also handled the author's other books, Major Jones' Travels and The Chronicles of Pineville. With the proper business management Mr. Thompson would have made a modest fortune out of his writings, but his fate was that of many other American literary men—to toil for others without any adequate reward. As a humorist and a portrayer of rural life and manners he had no superior in his generation. He did for the south what Halliburton did for New England, and forty years ago his books were to be seen in almost every house and on every news-counter south of the Potomac. But while Mr. Thompson lived among us and was an active figure in journalism and politics until 1882, he is more of a tradition than anything else to the present generation of Georgians. He is talked about, but not read, and some of his books are probably out of print. He seems to have shared the fate of a group of his contemporary writers whose works had a large circulation in their day. When Major Jones' Courtship was at the height of its popularity the people were reading Doestick's funny productions, The Humors of Falconbridge, Simon Suggs, The Big Bear of Arkansas, Sam Slick, and a dozen other volumes of a similar character, including of course, Longstreet's Georgia Scenes. Just what caused them to lose their hold upon the public it would be difficult to explain, but the outbreak of the war turned the attention of men to more serious matters, and during the conflict the tone of our literature and journalism underwent a great change. Many of the old writers were no longer in touch with the public and failed to adjust themselves to the new conditions and the new demands of the time. Mr. Thompson in the prime of life disappeared from the literary stage and confined his work to journalism. He was still capable of producing even better stories than those which had captured the country before the war, but he resented the fickle tastes of the public and was unwilling to write books that would be neglected and forgotten in the course of a few years. Yet he never became embittered. He was neither a pessimist nor a cynic, but a broad-minded, healthy optimist of a gentle nature and disposed to accept without a murmur all the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune."

HENRY CLAY FAIRMAN.

Henry Clay Fairman, the editor of "The Sunny South," published in Atlanta, is a native of Mississippi, where he was born in 1849. His stories and poems are very popular in the south, but he is perhaps best known by a long serial story entitled, The Third World. Mr. Fairman in this novel shows the originality, the daring imagination and the graphic descriptive power of Jules Verne and Rider Haggard. The hero of his story is an Arctic explorer who accidentally wanders into a strange and unknown country near the north pole. He finds a race of highly civilized people, and after learning their language and adopting their customs he has the misfortune to excite the bitter enmity of a powerful noble who is in love with a maiden, in whom the stranger is deeply interested. The plot is intricate and full of surprises, but it ends happily with the flight of the hero to his own country, accompanied by the maiden, who has been rescued from the clutches of the wicked nobleman. While Mr. Fairman's description of the people and customs of the wonderful land near the pole is full of remarkable surprises, his story has the air of a matter-of-fact narrative, and if the reader can accept certain startling geographical statements he can easily go on to the end of the story without resenting its improbable features. The author has shown so much genuine power in The Third World that his thousands of readers are clamoring for its publication in book form, and it will probably appear in that shape at an early day.

HENRY D. CAPERS.

Henry D. Capers, a native of South Carolina, where he was born in 1830, has resided more than half his life in Georgia. He has made a reputation as a lawyer, literary man and educator, and is recognized as a man of brilliant and versatile talents. He is the author of Bellevue and one or two other novels, all of which show genius and culture, but for some unknown reason they have never had a large circulation. His Life of Memminger gives a complete history of the operations of the Confederate treasury department during the war, and is one of the most unique and interesting books that have yet been added to our war literature. The author was peculiarly equipped for the writing of this work, having been the chief clerk of the Confederate treasury during the four years of its existence.

HENRY W. HILLIARD.

Henry W. Hilliard, born in North Carolina in 1808, and died in Atlanta in 1892, wrote De Vere and Politics and Pen-Pictures. The former is a novel of southern life in ante-bellum days and deals with the bright side of the society and the institutions of the old south. It is written in an attractive style, but lacks the deft touch of the professional story-writer. Mr. Hilliard was more successful with his second book, which contains a record of his adventures and experience in a notable public career of half a century. He was United States minister at various times to Belgium and Brazil. During the war he commanded Hilliard's legion in the Confederate service. He was in congress before the war, and during his residence in Alabama he was the great rival of William L. Yancey. He was active for more than fifty years in politics, journalism and literature, and was a prominent figure at the bar and in the pulpit. A volume of his addresses published nearly forty years ago contains a number of speeches which are models of eloquence and style. Mr. Hilliard had an extensive acquaintance with the crowned heads, the aristocracy and the leading writers and scientists of Europe, and while in Brazil he was the intimate friend of Dom Pedro. If his time had not been given to so many pursuits he would have left an enduring name in the literature of his country.

OTHER WRITERS.

There are scores of writers in Georgia who have never come very prominently before the public because they have never pursued literature as a profession. In 1859 A. B. Seals, of Atlanta, wrote a novel entitled Rockford, which had a good circulation in the south. It bore the marks of genius, but it was the first effort of an unknown man, and the exciting period of secession caused it to be speedily forgotten. Contemporaneous with it was a novel by James Summerfield Slaughter, another Atlanta writer, entitled Madeline. It was a sensational story, but there were signs of promise in it, and the subsequent suicide of its author was sincerely regretted. While dealing with Atlanta litterateurs it will be convenient to group most of them, with the exception of a few, in this part of our chapter. Miss Leonora Beck is considered by many the foremost literary woman in Atlanta. She is the principal of a young ladies' college, and is fully equipped for her work, but her passion for literature has led her to enrich the magazines with some very strong and attractive work, and when her recent book, Star Heights, made its appearance it was favorably reviewed by many of the leading newspapers of the country. Her My Valentine and A Night's Rebellion placed her among the poets. They show the genuine poetic inspiration with the added touch of culture. Her articles on Browning and other contributions to the periodicals have been very favorably received. Miss Minnie Quinn is a young poet and story writer who has deservedly won a high place in the circles of thought and culture. Miss Quinn, when a young girl, attracted the attention of Paul H. Hayne, and became, so to speak, his protege, and Henry W. Longfellow was so well pleased with her early efforts that he encouraged her to persevere. Her two volumes, Violets and Apple Blossoms, published in her girlhood, met with a very gratifying success. Orelia Key Bell is another Atlanta poet who has found her way into the "Century" and the other magazines. It is said that her poetry stimulates the head rather than the heart, but Miss Bell strikes many notes. Some of her sonnets are perfect gems. Mrs. J. K. Ohl, otherwise known as "Maude Andrews," who has been mentioned elsewhere as a writer for the daily newspapers, should not have her literary personality entirely merged into the daily press. Her contributions to the "Century," "Cosmopolitan," "American Popular Monthly" and other periodicals show that her work is in demand in our great centers of literary enterprise. She has a wonderful knowledge of human nature and a picturesque and deft touch when she portrays it. Many of her productions in verse and prose will outlive her anticipations. Montgomery M. Folsom writes splendid dialect verse, and in his prose sketches he depicts cracker life perfectly. His book, Scraps of Southern Song, was very popular. Orth Harper Stein has been noticed among the journalists, but he is really entitled to a high place among the literary men of the period. Mr. Stein has for many years been a contributor to many leading periodicals. For some years he has been quite a prominent figure in literature. Robert L. Adamson, of the "Atlanta Constitution," should have a more prominent mention than he receives here. His short stories have been widely copied, and have been very popular. His sketches show a knowledge of life and human nature entirely unusual, and the avidity with which the periodicals reproduce them is convincing evidence of their popularity. The sketch of Mr. Adamson in a recent magazine speaks of him as the most prominent young story writer in the city, and says that he has already achieved success enough to make him envied by older writers. He is certain to be heard from in the literary world. Lucian Lamar Knight has been pronounced the most brilliant young writer in the south by an eminent jurist, and it is safe to say that his biographical and historical sketches give promise of much valuable work of an enduring character. He is a lawyer as well as a journalist and a poet, and no young man in the state has equaled him in oratory. Mrs. Mel R. Colquitt is a popular contributor to many magazines and newspapers. She has a bright, picturesque style, and her broad sympathy with everything human shows itself in everything that she has written and invests even cold type with a peculiar magnetism. Her poems, sketches and short stories are among the best that the south has furnished in many years. Miss Irene Farrar, whose death in her youth cut short a career of brilliant promise, wrote two novels which were very popular, and if she had lived her work would have been eagerly sought by the publishers. She was a young lady of thorough culture and distinctive originality, and her writings attracted favorable attention from the first. Mrs. William Geppert, formerly Miss Dollie Higbee, of Louisville, made a reputation when she wrote that dashing story of Kentucky life, In God's Own Country, and since then she has produced other stories that will live. Julian Harris, a young man who has barely attained his majority, inherits much of the talent of his father, Joel Chandler Harris. He has written many short stories, which have gone the rounds of the press with every possible evidence of popularity. At present young Harris confines most of his work to the routine of daily journalism, but he is studious and observant, and in the near future he is certain to make his mark. Francis Fontaine, the author of Etowah and other novels, is a writer of exceptional talent, and some of the leading newspapers of the country have devoted considerable space to their reviews of his books, but he is a very busy man and only his spare moments are given to his literary recreations. Mr. Fontaine is actively engaged in developing the material resources of Georgia, and this fact accounts for his failure to satisfy the demand for something more from his pen. Clio and Wenona, two recent novels by Miss Ella Powell, are full of promise, and the reading public will eagerly demand more from a writer whose early work is so strong, pure and graphic. Henry King Shackleford is an Atlanta writer with a remarkable career. After the war he was on the city staff of "The Intelligencer," but he found the work un congenial and went into business for himself. He was not successful, and in sheer desperation sent a short novel to Beadle & Co. in New York. It was accepted, and a check was promptly sent with a request for another story. The firm desired sensational Indian stories, and Shackleford wrote novel after novel in which he caused our Indian population to be recklessly slaughtered by his heroes. The demand for his writings was so great that he found it convenient to move to Brooklyn, where he could be in touch with his publishers. He obtained other work of the same character, and for several years has turned out one or two novels a month over various pen names. The Hon. William L. Scruggs, who has been prominently mentioned among the leading journalists of Georgia, is widely known through his contributions to numerous magazines and reviews. His productions are generally of a political character, or descriptive of South America, where he has spent nearly twenty years as United States minister to the United States of Colombia and the republic of Venezuela. Mr. Scruggs is a thoughtful and scholarly writer, and whenever anything from his pen appears in print it always challenges attention. Few men are so well equipped for literature of the substantial class, and his friends confidently expect to see from his pen one or more works dealing with South American subjects that will be of permanent interest and value. Mrs. Maria Jordan Westmoreland wrote Heart Hungry, Clifford Troup, and other novels, which were favorably passed upon by the popular verdict. Her books displayed great power and originality, and from the first bore every mark of professional authorship with no traces of amateur writing. She gave up novel writing some years ago, but it was not because of any lack of appreciation on the part of her readers. The late Mrs. Edward Hammond will long be remembered as the author of The Georgians and other novels. Her creative genius and attractive style invested her stories with a delightful charm. A. R. Watson, the poet, left no book behind him, but this is due to a peculiar misfortune. After his death in 1876 his poems were collected and turned over to Mr. Joel Chandler Harris to be edited with a suitable preface. Mr. Harris left the scrap book on his desk in "The Constitution" office for a short time one day when he was called out, and upon his return it was missing. Advertisements and appeals for its return were made in vain. Some person had carried off the scrap book with the determination that it should never again see the light. This unfortunate incident deprived the public of a book that was in great demand, and Watson's family, of course, suffered pecuniarily by the robber's conduct. During the war period Atlanta was a literary center. Watson was then at his best. Henry Watterson, later of "The Louisville Courier-Journal," was here. Alex. St. Clair Abram had published his History of the Siege of Vicksburg, and L. Q. C. Lamar and other able writers were giving their best work to the press. The Franklin Printing house published a Confederate geography, primer and spelling book—works which would afford very remarkable reading for these days.

Among Atlanta's law writers should be mentioned John L. Hopkins, John C. Reed, Henry Jackson, and Howard Van Epps. The digests and text books prepared by these distinguished lawyers will always be highly prized by the bench and bar of Georgia. Gen. James Longstreet, the famous Confederate commander, has in the hands of his publishers a book of war history which will be of exceptional value. The general's first manuscript of his work was destroyed by fire. At the end of a year or two he yielded to repeated requests and painfully rewrote the history. It was then edited by Mr. P. J. Moran, a talented Atlanta journalist, and will probably make its appearance in the course of a few months. Gen. Longstreet's prominence, and the well-known respect entertained for his military ability, in Europe as well as at home, will cause the work to be looked for with a good deal of expectant interest. It will reply to the general's critics, and the chapter on Gettysburg is said to be a very important paper. Mr. Charles N. West, of the Savannah bar, occasionally turns aside from the routine of his profession and contributes something to the historical and biographical literature of the state. Besides several other notable productions, his essay on William H. Crawford will long be prized as a valuable chapter of Georgia's annals. Georgia history has been too much neglected. Gov. Gilmer's remarkable work is now sought for as a literary curiosity, but while it contained much valuable biographical information, it has never been regarded as a history. Gen. Avery's History of Georgia is admirable as a fragment, but it does not pretend to cover the entire field. The works of McCall, Stevens, and Jones are also fragments. The Statistics of Georgia, and The Historical Collections of Georgia, by George G. White, are works of permanent value, but they furnish abundant material and data for future historians, instead of telling the story of the rise and progress of the commonwealth. Rev. Mr. Herbert, in 1779, wrote the Historical Account of the Progress of the Colonies of South Carolina and Georgia. Another state history is the work of T. S. Arthur and H. H. Carpenter. The Bench and Bar of Georgia, by Stephen F. Miller, is a perfect mine of information in regard to the leading men of the state. Herbert Fielder wrote a Life of Joseph E. Brown, which deserves a place in every library in the state, and the same should be said of Johnston's Life of Stephens, Stovall's Life of Toombs, and B. H. Hill's Life, by his son, B. H. Hill, jr. The Miscellanies of Georgia, by A. H. Chappell; Reminiscences of An Old Georgia Lawyer, by Garrett Andrews, and Reminiscences of Fifty Years, by William H. Sparks, are all works of considerable interest and power. E. Y. Clarke wrote a popular History of Atlanta, which is still in demand. J. D. Waddell's Life of Linton Stephens is justly regarded as a great work, and it is to be hoped that ex-Gov. Wilson Lumpkins' manuscript state history will some day be published. Prof. J. T. Derry is the Author of a School History of Georgia and a popular History of the Confederate States. The late Dr. F. O. Ticknor, of Columbus, was as rare and brilliant a poetic genius as ever flourished in any state in the Union. He wrote hastily and carelessly, without revision, and his poems were never published in book form until after his death, but for many years they have been going the rounds of the press, and his Little Griffin of Tennessee, has taken its place among the most popular poems of this generation. Ticknor needed the excitement of the war period to inspire his stirring lyrics, and when peace came he almost entirely ceased to write. If he had been at all careful of his fame, he would now rank among the foremost poets of America. But he always regarded his verses as the vagrant offspring of the moment, and the idea never occurred to him that they would be treasured by others. Autumn Dreams, by Mrs. E. B. Castlen, of Macon, will be recollected as a volume of poems of more than ordinary excellence. The Italian Bride, a drama, by S. Yates Levy, of Savannah, won its way on the stage and was quite popular for a time. Volumes of poems, in addition to those already mentioned have been written by Miss Annie R. Blount, of Augusta; Miss Carrie Bell Sinclair, of the same city; John C. Langston, of Bolingbroke; William T. Dumas, Mrs. Jennie Porter, and Miss Mary Gay. The latter's book, Life in Dixie, was sold to the extent of several editions. The War in Heaven, a thoughtful, religious work, by the Rev. James P. Simmons, has attracted general attention. Our Brother in Black, and other works, by Bishop Atticus G. Haygood, are widely read. The late M. Dwinell, of the Rome "Courier," wrote an attractive book of travels, and J. R. Gorman and Rev. M. B. Wharton have made successful ventures in the same field. Rev. J. M. Bonnell's Art of Prose Composition also deserves favorable mention here. Then, it should be stated that Clifford Lanier has written two novels, Thorn Fruit, and Two Hundred Bales. Other novels are Nellie Horton, by Rev. Dr. Warren, of Macon; Crown Jewels, by Mrs. Emma Moffett Tyng; Ca Ira, by W. D. Trammell; Helen Freeman In the Right Path, by Miss L. A. Field; Cachet, by Mrs. M. J. R. Hamilton, and several juvenile books by Rev. George G. Smith. The Life of Henry W. Grady, published by H. C. Hudgins & Co., of Atlanta, is a splendid popular biography of the great Georgia journalist, and another biography of Mr. Grady, issued by the Cassells, of New York, ranks very high. Its introduction is by Joel Chandler Harris, and is a remarkably interesting study of the orator and editor. There are, of course, various theological and school books by Georgia writers, besides medical and technological works, but they are not generally included in a chapter dealing with literature and journalism. Many things contributed to the press would have added greatly to the reputation of their writers if they had ever made their appearance in book form. The late P. W. Alexander wrote a capital series of war letters, and in later years his contributions to the newspapers were always characterized by rare excellencies of style. In reconstruction times the Hon. Henry S. Fitch, of Illinois, made Georgia his home for several years. He was United States district attorney, but his occasional newspaper articles had a Junius-like brilliancy and epigrammatic turn and were widely copied. Ex-Senator H. V. M. Miller has occasionally consented to deliver literary lectures, and his efforts have been distinguished by their literary finish and instructive and entertaining qualities. Rev. Dr. W. P. Harrison, for a long time the editor of the "Southern Methodist Review," made a national reputation for scholarship and brilliant writing. Mr. Woodrow Wilson has written several well-known books of a political character which have won favor with thoughtful readers. Dr. J. William Jones, the author of lives of Lee and Davis, and various other war books, was for some years a resident of Atlanta. Mr. C. H. Jones, editor of the St. Louis "Post-Dispatch," is the author of several volumes of literary essays. Judge Logan E. Bleckley will always be remembered as the author of In the Matter of Rest, and several other poems of striking originality. Some of his lectures also display the qualities of wisdom and humor in a most remarkable degree. If this eminent man had devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits it cannot be doubted that he would have made a name among the most eminent writers of our country. Mrs. Julia Truitt Bishop, now of Texas; Miss Julia Fischer, of Augusta, and Miss Harrydelle Hallmark, of the latter place, have made reputations with their stories and sketches.

Residents of older states glancing over the list of Georgia litterateurs may think that it is a brief one and contains but few well-known names, but the explanation is not far to seek. During the first five generations of the state's existence the people were busy making history. They were pushing the Indians westward, fighting battles, clearing away forests, building towns and cities, constructing railways and opening mines. The men among them who had first-class literary ability devoted themselves to law, medicine, politics and the ministry, and in these callings they became famous. Bright intellects like those of the Toombses, Stephenses, Cobbs, Browns, Hills and Colquitts spurned the slow work of the pen when they knew that their eloquence at the bar or in legislative halls would advance them to the very highest positions and win fame and fortune. Such men as Pierce, Haygood, Candler, Tucker, and Hawthorne in the pulpit have swayed more people than they could have done through the medium of their pens, and as they were practical men looking for immediate results they avoided the arduous and uncertain pathway of literature. Very few of Georgia's greatest intellects embarked in journalism. The rewards were meager and they felt that it would profit them more to throw themselves into the exciting field of politics and leave the work of chronicling their deeds to inferior minds of a more patient and plodding cast. Then sectionalism at an early date blighted southern literature. In the great centers of the north, where the best facilities for publication and distribution existed, it was natural that the writers of that section should have the preference, and the impression gained ground in the south that books by southern writers were not wanted, and that they would be discriminated against in the regular channels of trade under the control of northern publishers. So there grew up in the south a literary class which had no medium of expression except in conversation, letter-writing, pulpit discourses and speeches at the bar and in the political arena. It was not indolence that prevented these students and lovers of literature from writing books; it was their well-grounded conviction that the publishers and critics of the north and of Europe were against them and would not give them fair play. The Harrises, Johnstons and Edwardses of the anti-bellum period in Georgia could have written stories that would have answered Uncle Tom's Cabin, but they never penned a line because they felt assured that their books would not be placed on sale and that the combined northern and European press would be against any literature that came from a slave-holding people. But in politics, at least, they had a fair field in which individual ability could not fail to gain the world's recognition. And the southern statesmen were not mistaken in this view. They ruled the republic almost from its formation down to a recent period, and the cultured circles of Europe are familiar with the names and the careers of a long line of illustrious presidents and public men who came from every state in the south, from Virginia to Texas. Literature ebbed in the south because politics offered all the most attractive prizes.

GEORGIA GAZETTE.

On April 7, 1763, the "Georgia Gazette," edited by James Johnson, made its appearance in Savannah. It was the first newspaper in Georgia and the eighth to appear in the colonies. It was conducted as a weekly until 1799, when it was suspended. At that time in the sparsely settled colony it was very difficult to support a newspaper, and "The Gazette" was necessarily a small affair, containing marriages, deaths, the arrival of vessels, and brief articles on political subjects. Before the revolution it was completely under the control of the royal governor, Wright, and later it seemed to follow the fortunes of the dominant parties, whether they were royalists or patriots. It contained many of the proclamations and resolutions of those days, all of which will be found reproduced in the histories of Stevens and Jones. In the History of Savannah, written by Hon. C. C. Jones, Jr., O. F. Vedder and Frank Weldon, the chapter devoted to journalism contains an interesting account of the rise and progress of the newspapers of that city. In January, 1802, "The Georgia Republican," a semi-weekly owned and edited by John F. Everett, was started. This was the second newspaper in Savannah. In 1807 John J. Evans was associated with Mr. Everett and the paper was changed to a tri-weekly with the name of "The Republican and Savannah Evening Ledger." In 1810 Mr. Evans took entire charge and was succeeded in 1814 by Frederick S. Fell as editor and proprietor. A. McIntyre became a partner in 1817, and the paper was soon enlarged and changed to a daily for a few months, when it returned to its tri-weekly issues. Mr. Fell remained with the paper in sole or part control until his death in 1831. Emanuel De La Motta then conducted it until 1837, when I. Cleland joined him. De La Motta retired two years later, and William Hogan the year following became Cleland's partner. Cleland shortly withdrew and was succeeded by Charles Davis. The paper then began to advocate whig principles, and was changed to a morning daily. In 1849 Mr. Hogan sold his interest to Joseph L. Locke, who became the managing editor, with Mr. Davis as commercial editor and business manager. Mr. Davis later sold to Francis J. Winter, but his death shortly afterward left Mr. Locke in entire control. Mr. Locke finally sold his entire interest to Mr. P. W. Alexander in 1853. Mr. A. W. Moore was associated with Mr. Alexander, but soon retired and was succeeded by James R. Sneed. In 1856 Mr. Alexander sold his interest to Mr. Sneed and F. W. Sims. Mr. Sneed was in editorial charge of the paper until the city was captured by Gen. Sherman in 1864. Under instructions from the Federal commander the paper was seized, and John E. Hayes, the war correspondent of the "New York Tribune," who was with the army, took charge as editor, remaining in that position until his death in September, 1868. The paper was then sold to its old editor and proprietor, James R. Sneed, who sold it to Col. William A. Reed about a year later. In the course of a few months it suspended. It was revived by Scudder & Hardee, who sold it to "The Advertiser," a new paper. In 1878 the subscription list was sold to "The Morning News." Among the editors on the staff of "The Republican" at different times were S. T. Chapman, Edward De Leon, Thomas H. Harden and Thomas W. Lane. Dr. William A. Caruthers was also a valued contributor. The paper was at first on the side of the republican or Jeffersonian party, but after 1828, when it was the champion of Andrew Jackson, it went over to the whigs and did good work for that party, although it did not support Winfield Scott for the presidency. It opposed secession vigorously, but when Georgia went out of the Union it was loyal to the state and the Confederacy until the invaders took possession of it and turned it over to a republican editor.

SAVANNAH GEORGIAN.

The "Savannah Georgian" started in November, 1818, with Dr. John M. Harvey as editor. It was a bright newspaper, but the editor unfortunately differed with his constituents in regard to many important matters, and there was not a good understanding between him and the public. The people did not patronize the venture liberally and Harvey sold out to I. K. Tefft and H. J. Finn. In leaving Savannah, Harvey wrote a poem of much local notoriety, in which he heaped curses upon the city, enumerating in it every bad feature which he thought was connected with Savannah. Finn, who was an actor, soon returned to the stage, and died a well-known and popular comedian. Mr. Tefft sold out to George and William Robertson, and in 1832 Dr. R. D. Arnold and W. H. Bullock became joint editors and proprietors. Henry R. Jackson, Philip J. Punch, and S. S. Sibley were the next owners of the paper. Gen. Jackson soon retired and P. B. Hilton was admitted into the partnership. There were other changes, until it came under the control of Albert R. Lamar, who conducted it until 1859, when it was suspended. Lamar, who will be spoken of again in these pages, was one of the most brilliant editorial writers ever known in Savannah. He was a man of strong intellect, thorough culture and he had the courage of his convictions. While he was really of a genial nature, he knew when to dip his pen in gall, and when he was in the mood few writers could equal him in flaying an opponent.

SAVANNAH MUSEUM.

In 1820 the "Savannah Museum" was started, but after running a few years it was discontinued, the field being too narrow at that time for another newspaper. "The Morning News," established in 1850, of course ranks as the leading daily of the city without any exceptions in the past. W. T. Thompson, the litterateur, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work, was the first editor. He held his position through several decades, and while compelled to take a vacation under Sherman's rule for a few months, he retained his chair until his death in 1882. The historian to whose work we have referred says that under Thompson the paper was vigorous from the first, standing up for democratic principles, regardless of the dictates of the politicians. It bore its part in the great secession and war period, and in 1867 J. H. Estill purchased an interest and finally added to it, until he had the entire control. Estill is what is called a self-made man. A native of Charleston, he has been connected from childhood with the printing business. He worked as a printer in Charleston and Savannah and when the war began he was a pressman in the latter city. He served with Bartow in the war and when peace was restored again worked as a printer and pressman. When he obtained control of "The Morning News" he gave his entire attention to his business and in 1876 the paper was able to erect a handsome building. Mr. Estill, if he had devoted himself to editorial work, would have made a reputation, but he is a man of affairs, and his time has been fully occupied with great enterprises for the past generation. He has been remarkably successful, and it should be said to his credit that he has always manifested a just and proper appreciation of the work of his staff writers. His relations with Mr. Thompson, for instance, were always fraternal, and when Joel Chandler Harris was on "The News," Mr. Estill began those intimate relations with him which have continued down to the present time. "The News" was a fearless paper during the reconstruction era, and ably seconded its contemporaries in the other leading cities of the state in restoring good government under the rule of the democracy. It was one of the first dailies in Georgia to organize a good system of special correspondence in Washington and other centers, and it was the first to equip itself with those conveniences of machinery which are now considered indispensable in all first-class newspaper establishments. It had the first folding machine and the first mailer used in Georgia. It bought new and improved presses and year after year kept the paper up to date, increasing its telegraphic service from 1,800 words per day to 6,000.

THE TIMES

Of afternoon journalism in Savannah it may be said that "The Times" was the first evening paper that made a success. It was founded in 1882 by Richardson & McNally. Mr. H. Richardson had been for a long time the city editor of "The News," and McNally had been its bookkeeper. They made a success of their venture and Mr. Richardson is now equally successful as the editor of "The Columbus Enquirer-Sun." The paper was sold to Mr. Gazaway Hartridge, who improved it very much. Its successor is "The Press," whose editor, P. A. Stovall, has made a reputation as a brilliant journalist and as the author of a life of Robert Toombs.

JOURNAL, COURIER, MIRROR, EXPRESS AND ADVERTISER.

"The Evening Journal," "The Courier," "The Mirror," "The Evening Express" and "The Daily Advertiser" were started in recent years and lived only a short time. Among other papers in Savannah now living are "The Journal," a German weekly, "The Savannah Local," "The Independent" and "The Tribune." "The Old Homestead," a literary monthly, after a successful career of several years, was moved to Atlanta, where it recently suspended. While it is generally admitted that W. T. Thompson was Savannah's foremost journalist, it is a well-known fact that Gen. Jackson, Dr. Arnold, Miles Levy, Charles N. West and others have at various times volunteered as editorial writers in some public or party emergency, and their pens have rendered the press good service. Ex-Senator Thomas M. Norwood is another writer whose name is well known in journalism. He is one of the most distinguished lawyers in Savannah, and has served in both houses of congress. He is the author of a popular novel entitled Plutocracy, and is a frequent contributor to the newspapers. His style is noted for its pointed, epigrammatic and scholarly characteristics, and his newspaper articles are widely read and copied. But, as a rule, the best talent of Savannah has not been attracted to journalism. The most successful newspaper men of the city have come from other places. "The Morning News" is a first-class daily, but with the Atlantic on one side and a sparsely settled territory on the other, natural limitations make it impossible for it to obtain the wide circulation and influence secured by northern and western newspapers, which are in some instances really inferior to "The News." The bright young men of Savannah, therefore, are not inclined to go into local journalism. The bar offers them more tempting prizes, and among its members will be found some of the most distinguished men in the union. No successful journalist in Savannah could ever hope for the fame and fortune that come to a popular lawyer with a good practice.

THE INTELLIGENCER.

Maj. John H. Steele was the editor of Atlanta's first daily newspaper, "The Intelligencer," owned by Judge Jared I. Whitaker. Steele began his work in 1851, and was a power in the state until his death in 1871. He was a man of culture of the old school, and his thorough acquaintance with politics and public men made him a valuable man in his profession. "The Intelligencer" was a democratic newspaper, and during Gov. Joseph E. Brown's four gubernatorial terms, embracing eight years in all, it rendered substantial services to the party, as it was the leading daily in North Georgia. Maj. Steele always furnished a thoughtful and well-written editorial page. He was particular about small points, which are now neglected by most of our editorial writers. He believed in a dignified discussion of political issues, and anything flippant or unfair was especially abhorrent to him. When the occasion required it the major called to his aid the ablest pens in the state, and under his management for some twenty years it was everywhere recognized as an enterprising and influential newspaper for those times. Even during his six years connection with it after the war, when age and disease had greatly impaired his usefulness, he was noted for his clear head, remarkable memory and the readiness with which he wrote his political leaders.

SOUTHERN MISCELLANY.

"The Southern Miscellany," a literary weekly owned by Col. C. R. Hanleiter, was moved from Madison to Atlanta in 1846, and survived for a brief period. Col. Hanleiter is still living, but his co-worker, Maj. W. T. Thompson, the journalist and story-writer, died in 1882 in Savannah, where he was editing "The Morning News."

SOUTHERN TEMPERANCE CRUSADER.

Col. John H. Seals deserves more than a passing notice in this chapter on the writers of Georgia. He was born in this state something more than sixty years ago, and while yet a young man he began in Atlanta the publication of "The Southern Temperance Crusader," a journal of considerable literary merit. Mrs. Mary E. Bryan was on the staff from the beginning, and the venture would have been a permanent success but for the fact that the war broke out about two years after it was started and caused its suspension. Its popularity was so great, however, that when Col. Seals started "The Sunny South," in 1875, with Mrs. Bryan to aid him, the paper at once leaped into public favor and secured the largest circulation ever enjoyed by any southern literary weekly. A few years ago Col. Seals sold "The Sunny South" to Messrs. J. R. Holliday, Clark Howell and C. C. Nichols, who still own it and continue its publication under the editorial management of Mr. Henry Clay Fairman.

THE NATIONAL AMERICAN.

Among the early newspapers in Atlanta was "The National American," a tri-weekly, owned by Col. C. R. Hanleiter, and edited by Col. J. S. Peterson. In the period just before the war it was an able newspaper, and its editor gave so much of his time and attention to the study of southern statistics that he was soon recognized as an authority on the subject. He is still an active figure in journalistic and business circles, and he is the same enthusiastic and well-informed champion of Atlanta and Georgia that he was forty years ago when he first sought a home in the struggling town in the forests.

SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.

It does not come within the province of this chapter to attempt to narrate the story of the various weeklies which have been started in Atlanta. Many of them were short-lived, and others never had any circulation and never succeeded in impressing the public. "The Southern Confederacy," however, deserves more than a passing mention. It was a weekly started in 1859 by Dr. James P. Hambleton. The paper in a short time became the most violent secession paper in the south. In 1860 it published its famous "black-list" of northern republican merchants, and advised all southerners not to trade with them. Dr. Hambleton soon retired from journalism, and since the war period has been heard from only occasionally. At last accounts he was a resident of Washington city.

MINOR DAILIES.

During the war period numerous dailies were published in Atlanta, and among them were "The Intelligencer," "Southern Confederacy," "Gate City Guardian,"

"Commonwealth," "Reveille," "Knoxville Register" and "Memphis Appeal." "The Register" was edited by L. J. Dupre and John C. Whitner, and among its editorial contributors were such prominent men as Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar and Gen. Howell Cobb. "The Confederacy" was managed by Col. George W. Adair and Mr. J. Henley Smith. It had a good staff, and Henry Watterson, of Louisville, Mr. A. R. Watson, the well-known poet, and Mr. J. N. Cardozo, the economist and statistician, were all connected with it. Watson and Cardozo have been dead many years, but the others are in the midst of their useful work. During the war the newspapers found it a hard matter to obtain their necessary supplies of machinery, paper and ink, but they kept up bravely until the last, frequently printing entire editions on brown wrapping paper and wall paper. The editors and printers were not subject to conscription, and this fact explains the ease with which they kept their ranks filled at all times. The siege killed several newspapers, but "The Memphis Appeal" and "The Intelligencer" fled southward, and the latter lost no time in returning to Atlanta after its evacuation by the Federals in November, 1864. Sherman had occupied the city for two months and a half, from Sept. 2 to the middle of November, but in that time no newspaper was started. Everything was in suspense and nobody had enough confidence in the situation to begin the publication of a paper. Immediately after the restoration of peace "The Intelligencer" had a rival in the shape of "The Daily New Era," under the management of Col. J. S. Prather. The following year "The Era" was sold to Dr. Samuel Bard, who soon changed it into a republican organ. In the course of two or three years a stock company purchased the paper and installed the Hon. William L. Scruggs as managing editor. Mr. Scruggs conducted the paper very successfully until the chaotic conditions of reconstruction times made the venture unprofitable and it was forced to suspend. The editor, however, was not a loser by the change. He had manifested such signal ability as to attract the attention of President Grant, who offered him the mission to the United States of Colombia. Col. Scruggs accepted this important post and made such a splendid record as a diplomat that he was reappointed. He also served as consul at Canton, China, and was twice sent as minister to Venezuela. In the meantime "The Sun," "True Georgian," "Constitution" and "Herald" came into the field. "The Intelligencer" and "The New Era" made way for the newcomers, and after a brief career all of them were out of the way with the exception of "The Constitution." "The Herald" at one time gave promise of permanency. It was managed by Henry W. Grady, Robert A. Alston and A. St. Clair-Abrams. Alston was killed in a fight with one of his friends, Capt. Edward Cox; Abrams went to Florida, where he became prominent in politics, and Grady joined the staff of "The Constitution."

THE CONSTITUTION.

"The Constitution" deserves a chapter of some length. It was started in the summer of 1868 by Carey W. Styles and J. H. Anderson, with W. A. Hemphill for its business manager. Col. Styles made it a strong anti-reconstruction paper, and it became the leading organ of the democratic party in Georgia. In the course of a few months Col. Styles retired, and the paper was conducted under the firm name of W. A. Hemphill & Co. J. R. Barrick, a Kentuckian of fine literary ability, edited the paper until his death in 1869, when Col. I. W. Avery took editorial charge. Various changes occurred, and finally Capt. Evan P. Howell purchased an interest and became editor-in-chief. Col. E. Y. Clarke was managing editor for six years, but in 1876 he sold out his interest to Capt. Howell and retired. Mr. N. P. T. Finch, who was one of the proprietors and editorial writers, sold out his interest in 1888 to Mr. S. M. Inman. Henry W. Grady purchased a fourth interest in 1880 and became managing editor. Upon his death in 1889 Mr. Clarke Howell succeeded him, and still retains his position. In the course of ten years Mr. Grady made "The Constitution" the leading southern newspaper. His methods increased the weekly subscription list to 150,000 and the daily was proportionately successful. He was a journalist Napoleon, and no department of the paper escaped his close scrutiny. He had no superior as a political editor, but he never lost his interest in the literary features of the paper, and the local reporters never made a scoop or did any exceptionally good work without receiving substantial encouragement from him. No man could be more imaginative, and yet none was more matter-of-fact. For years Grady was the life and soul of "The Constitution," and under his control it became one of the chief factors in the upbuilding of the new south. He selected his men with care, and when he was satisfied that he had infused something of his own spirit into them he would sometimes cease writing for a long period of several months. His assistants thoroughly understood him, and in his absence it was a point of honor and a matter of pride with them to come as near as possible to his expectations and requirements. The important incidents of his career will be found in a more extended sketch of his life in another part of this work. Carey W. Styles, who was "The Constitution's" first editor, was at that time about forty years old. He was a bitter hater of everything that he considered inimical to the south, and his editorial denunciations of republican rule and the reconstruction measures were the fiercest ever known, even in that period of heated passion and strife. Styles was absolutely fearless, and with practically the entire community at his back, he risked his life every day in what was then a perilous profession. Nor was he satisfied with denouncing those who differed with him through the columns of his paper. He frequently appeared on the platform and, meeting his political opponents face to face, he heaped upon them the most furious abuse. When he retired from "The Constitution" he edited at different times "The Albany (Ga.) News," a weekly at Brunswick, the "Evening Commonwealth" in Atlanta, and "The Constitution" at Weatherford, Texas. Gen. I. W. Avery was the most brilliant of the early editors of "The Constitution," and his literary and journalistic work is still eagerly sought for. On "The Constitution," "The Herald" and "The Evening Capitol" he rendered splendid service to his party, and was largely instrumental in building up the material interests of his state through his policy of bringing prominently before the outside world the natural resources of the commonwealth. His style is remarkably fluent and graceful, and is characterized by dash, vigor and enthusiasm.

Capt. Evan P. Howell, "The Constitution" editor-in-chief, was born in Milton county in 1839. He had only commenced the practice of law at Sandersville when the war broke out and he went to the front with the First Georgia regiment as orderly sergeant of his company. During the last three years of the struggle he was captain of Howell's artillery, and was in nearly all of the leading battles in Virginia, and in the Georgia campaign. Although a mere youth at the time he exhibited those traits of indomitable courage and determination which have made him so influential in journalism and in politics. He has been repeatedly elected to both houses of the state legislature, and has declined the urgent requests of his fellow citizens to serve them in the gubernatorial chair and in the United States senate. He has had an extensive experience in public life. As the solicitor-general of his circuit he made a fine record, and as a democratic campaign organizer he has long been regarded as the best in the state. In the campaign which resulted in the permanent location of the capital in Atlanta, Capt. Howell was an indefatigable worker. With his multiplicity of business cares he does not find much time for writing, but he outlines the general policy of the paper, and when he writes an editorial its pointed, pithy and vigorous style generally causes it to attract public attention, and it is frequently copied from one end of the country to the other. His work in behalf of Atlanta's expositions and the various great industrial enterprises which have developed and benefited Georgia, and the south has been generally recognized. Personally, the captain is one of the most genial and magnetic of men. He is as well known and popular in Washington, New York and other political and commercial centers as he is in Atlanta.

Clark Howell, the present managing editor of "The Constitution," is at the present time just entering the thirties. He began his journalistic career when a mere boy after leaving the state university. He served with distinction for so young a writer on "The New York Times" and "The Philadelphia Press," and then became night editor of the paper which he now manages. Succeeding Mr. Grady at his death, he gave most of his time and attention to the details of his office work, and is probably the most painstaking and industrious managing editor in America. He has several times represented his county in the legislature and has served as speaker of the house, and is at the present time a member of the National democratic executive committee. He inherits many of his father's best characteristics, and has made a reputation as a political organizer and campaign worker. Mr. Howell frequently appears on the platform and is a very popular and effective speaker. He has a legion of devoted friends in Georgia and throughout the Union, and his election last year to the presidency of the International League of Press clubs is an evidence of the warm regard entertained for him by his brother journalists. Among other notable men on the staff of this great newspaper are Joel Chandler Harris, the chief editorial writer; Frank L. Stanton, P. J. Moran, Frank Weldon, J. K. Ohl, E. W. Barrett and R. L. Adamson, Julian Harris, E. C. Bruffey, Remsen Crawford and R. H. Newell of the local department; also Mr. L. L. Knight. Mr. Harris, the author of Uncle Remus, has been sketched elsewhere in these pages, but it may not be out of place to mention the fact here that he is considered the financial authority on the paper, and his editorials in favor of the remonetization of silver during the past few years have been widely quoted. Mr. Stanton's work is now famous throughout the country. His verses are in thousands of scrap books and his bright paragraphs are very popular. Two editions of a volume of his poems have had a large sale and have received highly favorable notices from leading reviewers in this country and in England. Mr. Moran is one of the ablest correspondents and special writers in the United States, and his capacity for work is apparently unlimited. Mr. J. K. Ohl, the assistant managing editor, is a clear-headed, well-equipped journalist. His special articles and his dramatic criticisms are popular features of the paper. His wife, who writes over the pen-name of Maude Andrews, is the society editor. Her work in prose and verse is always brilliant and thoroughly readable. Her poems have appeared in "The Century" and "The Cosmopolitan," and her short stories have met with a very favorable reception. She ranks with the most accomplished literary women of the continent.

Frank Weldon, the night editor of "The Constitution," is a young Baltimorean who has made a good record in the journalism of Baltimore, Savannah and Atlanta. In Savannah he was for some time on the staff of "The Press," a bright and successful afternoon paper. He makes an admirable night editor and is equally at home in other departments of newspaper work. His letters, stories and sketches are among the best produced by the younger generation of southern newspaper men. Walter G. Cooper, who was a special writer on the paper for several years during Mr. Grady's management, and after his death, is a writer who has already come to the front. As the editor of "The Rome Tribune" and chief of the department of publicity of the Cotton States and International exposition he has made a fine reputation for so young a man. He is an industrious worker, and when he writes an article dealing with facts and figures he is never satisfied until he has verified every important statement. He has a clear, pleasing style, and his little book on the Piedmont region is regarded as a valuable and interesting volume. Mr. Cooper's journalistic ability has enabled him to greatly aid the exposition in bringing its salient features before the public.

Mr. L. L. Knight, the editor of the religious department of "The Constitution," is a young man of exceptional gifts. His historical and biographical articles are full of merit and give promise of more ambitious work in that line. He is also a graceful poet and eloquent speaker, and inherits much of the talent of the Walton and Lamar families, whose blood flows in his veins. Mr. W. A. Hemphill, the business manager, and the owner of a large interest in the paper, has been prominently identified with it from the first, and its success is principally due to his forethought, economy and enterprise. He is a graduate of the state university, a gallant ex-Confederate, the president of a bank, and an ex-mayor of Atlanta. He first suggested the Cotton States and International exposition, and stands in the front rank of Georgia's progressive and public-spirited citizens. He is now in the prime of life and bids fair to enjoy a long career of honor and usefulness.

From 1874 until a recent date Samuel W. Small was one of the most conspicuous men in Atlanta journalism. He came to Atlanta from Texas, where he had conducted an afternoon paper, which he had started shortly after resigning his position as ex-President Andrew Johnson's private secretary. "The Constitution" people soon found that he was the best short-hand writer, the best reporter and the best all-round man that had ever been on the staff. He has made a notable record in the past twenty years. No man on the Atlanta press has done more work and better work, and none is to-day better equipped for journalism. Mr. Small found time to visit Europe in an official capacity at the Paris exposition. He wrote pamphlets, started daily and weekly papers, acted as court stenographer, traversed the country as an evangelist and lecturer, started a paper in Oklahoma, and one in Norfolk, and at last accounts had opened a law office in that city.

In the reconstruction period Dr. Samuel Bard was quite prominent in Atlanta and in Georgia. He came to Atlanta from Memphis, and after running "The New Era" a short time as a democratic paper, suddenly turned it into a republican organ. When he sold it he started "The Daily True Georgian," on the republican line. President Grant appointed him governor of Idaho, but he soon resigned the office, and during Grant's second term accepted the postmastership of Chattanooga. About 1876 he started a daily paper at Pensacola, Fla., and during that year fell a victim to the yellow fever. He was a man of talent, tact and personal magnetism, and in the most heated political warfare he managed to retain the friendship of his opponents.

Col. E. W. Clarke, one of the early editors of "The Constitution," was in his active days one of the most popular journalists in Georgia. He was patriotic and public-spirited, and his efforts in behalf of the development of the state have never been sufficiently appreciated. He has at various times embarked in other newspaper ventures, and his History of Atlanta is still regarded as a work of great local interest and value.

ATLANTA SUN.

"The Atlanta Sun," a daily in existence between 1870 and 1874 had the distinction of being edited first by the Hon. Cincinnatus Peeples and later by the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens. A. R. Watson, the poet, Mr. P. J. Moran, and Mr. William H. Moore were brilliant members of the staff. Watson died in Macon, where he had accepted a place on "The Telegraph;" Moore died in Augusta while editing "The Evening News," and Mr. Moran is now one of the most active members of "The Constitution's" staff. Mr. Stephens was not successful as the managing editor of a newspaper. He wrote his editorials at his home in Crawfordville, more than 100 miles distant, and it was a common thing for one of his leaders to fill five columns. He could write able political essays, but short and timely editorials and paragraphs were beyond his reach. The paper was a financial failure, and when it suspended Mr. Stephens lost a considerable sum of money.

DEAD DAILIES.

It would be a difficult matter to enumerate all the dead Atlanta daily newspapers within the past thirty-five years. Shortly after the war "The Intelligencer," "Opinion," "Commercial," "Sun" and "News" gave up the ghost, and they were followed by "The Times," "Telegram," "Transcript," "Nickel," "Evening Herald," "Commonwealth," "Tribune," "Post-Appeal" and others. The "Post-Appeal" was at one time a profitable newspaper. Maj. D. E. Caldwell sold it to Col. Marcellus E. Thornton, and the experiment of changing it from an afternoon to a morning paper brought about its suspension. Maj. Caldwell is dead, but Col. Thornton, who is a man of large wealth, owns and edits "The Press" and "Carolinian" at Hickory, N. C.

ATLANTA JOURNAL

"The Atlanta Journal," started in 1883 by Col. E. F. Hoge, who died a little over a year later, is one of the leading newspapers of the state. When Col. Hoge's ill health forced him to sell, Col. John Paul Jones, of Toledo, Ohio, purchased it. He afterward sold it to a stock company, and it is now owned by the Hon. Hoke Smith, Mr. H. H. Cabaniss and several other gentlemen. Mr. Smith directed, and is supposed still to direct the policy of the paper. His first managing editor, Mr. Josiah Carter, resigned after holding the position a few years and started an afternoon paper with the unlucky name of "The Herald." In the course of a couple of years it was forced to suspend and Mr. Carter went on the staff of "The New York Morning Advertiser," while his partner, Mr. Blackburn, started "The Commercial," an afternoon paper which has achieved a very gratifying degree of success. "The Journal" has had on its editorial staff such capable writers as Mr. F. H. Richardson, Mr. John H. Martin, Mr. Howard Williams, Mr. Thad Horton, Mr. Gordon N. Hurtell, Mr. Stanhope Sams, Mr. A. W. Bealer, Mr. W. H. Howard, Mr. J. H. Johnson, Mrs. Lollie Belle Wylie, Miss Corinne Stocker, and Miss Mary Lou Jackson. Mr. Martin retired some years ago, having served forty-eight years on a number of newspapers in various states. He is now a resident of Atlanta, and in his serene old age enjoys the competency which he has so well earned. In his time he was one of the most influential editors in the state, but he never courted publicity, and much of his best work has been inadvertently credited to others. Mr. Richardson and his associates make an able staff, and Mr. Smith, the present secretary of the interior, is acknowledged to be a masterly director of the paper's editorial policy. He frequently writes a strong editorial, but the pressure of his public and professional duties leaves him very little time for such work. He is a man of great intellectual energy and power, and he is a potential force in journalism as well as at the bar and in politics. Mr. Smith at an early age made a reputation as a brainy lawyer, having been admitted to the bar at the age of seventeen. For some years he has enjoyed the most lucrative practice of any lawyer in Georgia. In journalism he adopts the same original and daring methods which have made him a leader at the bar and in politics. Since he has held the office of secretary of the interior he has not appeared prominently in the management of his paper, but it is well known that he is still the master spirit of "The Journal," and whenever it makes a decided hit in politics the people are quick to credit Secretary Smith with it.

EVENING CAPITOL.

"The Evening Capitol" was started by Charles S. Atwood in 1888 and at different times it was edited by I. W. Avery, James A. Gray and Judge Kit Warren. Mr. Atwood's bad health, resulting finally in his death, caused the paper to suspend. "The Commonwealth" was another paper that made quite a reputation under the ownership and management of Col. B. F. Sawyer, in the early seventies. Sawyer, who is still a prominent citizen of Atlanta, has been a gallant Confederate colonel, the editor of several newspapers, the author of several popular novels, and the inventor of a number of valuable articles. He is a native of Alabama, and from the time when he went to Cuba with the ill-fated Lopez expedition down to the present hour he has led a very active and busy life. It is by no means unlikely that he will again be heard from in journalism.

OTHER WEEKLIES AND MONTHLIES.

Atlanta had and still has many weeklies and monthlies of some reputation and influence. The Christian Index, a Baptist paper, now owned and edited by Mr. J. C. McMichael, was at different times edited by some of the ablest of the southern Baptists, among them the Rev. David Shaver, D. D., who before coming to Georgia was prominent in religious journalism as the editor of the "Richmond Religious Herald." His successor, the Rev. H. H. Tucker, who died a few years ago, had few equals as a strong, bold writer. The "Wesleyan Christian Advocate," a Methodist weekly which was moved here from Macon a few years ago, is an influential journal under the editorship of the Rev. W. F. Glenn, D. D. The "Southern Cultivator," an agricultural monthly, was edited for many years by Dr. W. L. Jones, but his successor, ex-Gov. W. J. Northen, has ably taken up the work, and the magazine is doing a great work for the agricultural and other interests of this section. The "Southern Farm and Home," owned and edited by Mr. J. R. Holliday, and one or two others, also enjoys a good circulation and is very popular among the farmers. "Dixie," an industrial monthly, owned and edited by Thomas H. Martin and J. H. Allen, is the handsomest periodical in the south. It is a fine advertising medium, and is working wisely and effectually for the development of the resources of this section. The "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" and the "Eclectic Medical Journal" are among the professional periodicals of Atlanta of long standing. The "People's Party Paper," edited by Thomas E. Watson, is a strong populist organ. It is vigorously edited and is said to have a large circulation in the rural districts. "The Looking Glass," an illustrated weekly, edited by Orth H. Stein, is a somewhat sensational paper, which lashes the follies and crimes of private and public circles in a fearless way. The latest daily in the field is the "Commercial," an afternoon paper, started by Mr. B. M. Blackburn in the early part of 1894. It is a democratic paper, but it is very independent and fearless in its policy. Apparently it has met with gradually increasing prosperity from the start.

Gen. I. W. Avery in his History of Georgia claims that taken all in all the state has as bright, independent and gifted journalists and as newsy and vigorous papers as any state in the Union. This is doubtless true, but the historian goes so far as to say that "more notable and brilliant men have adorned our journalism than any other state can boast, and that there is now a larger endowment of superior press writers connected with the papers of this commonwealth than any other can show." Perhaps this is claiming too much for a sparsely settled state, the youngest of the old thirteen. It is true, however, that some of our ablest statesmen, lawyers and business men, have been journalists or writers for the press. Among the names most prominent are those of Alexander H. Stephens, Henry W. Hilliard, L. Q. C. Lamar, H. V. M. Miller, Albert R. Lamar, P. W. Alexander, A. R. Wright, H. Gregg Wright, Cincinnatus Peeples, H. V. Johnson, Mirabeau B. Lamar, James Gardner, Henry R. Jackson, William M. Browne, Joseph Forsyth, William T. Thompson, James R. Randall, William L. Scruggs, Patrick Walsh, Henry W. Grady, Evan P. Howell, Clark Howell, Joel Chandler Harris, Henry Edwards and P. A. Stovall.

AUGUSTA CHRONICLE.

"The Augusta Chronicle" is the oldest paper in the state, having been founded in 1785, and "The Constitutionalist," which was consolidated with it, dates from 1799. Mr. James M. Jones was the chief editor of "The Chronicle and Sentinel," as it was called, for many years, and Mr. V. M. Barnes assisted him just before and during the war period. Barnes edited "The Constitutionalist," under James Gardner, during the last two years of the war, and sat in the constitutional convention of 1865. Gardner made his paper a power in Georgia for the ten years before secession, and narrowly missed the governor's chair. James R. Randall edited the paper after the reconstruction period until it consolidated with the "Chronicle." On this latter paper Gen. A. R. Wright and his son, H. Gregg Wright, made national reputations. Connected with them was Patrick Walsh, the brainy Irishman who for more than twenty years past has been the chief proprietor and the dominant spirit of the paper. Walsh is a self-made man, but he acquired a first-class education and for more than a quarter of a century he has been prominent as a writer and as a speaker in state conventions and other deliberative assemblies. As United States senator, filling the unexpired term of the late Senator A. H. Colquitt, he made a greater reputation in a few months than was ever made in the same brief period by any other member of that body. He is never happier than when he makes his paper advance the material interests of the south, and no man in all the region has a greater command of statistics relating to our water-power, cotton mills, mines, agricultural and other industries. He is a vigorous writer and an eloquent speaker, and his public spirit, loyalty to his friends and devotion to his state are proverbial.

COLUMBUS ENQUIRER.

In 1828 Mirabeau B. Lamar established the "Columbus Enquirer." In 1830 he yielded the editorship to Henry W. Hilliard until 1834, when Gen. Lamar resumed control for a while, and then went to Texas, where he became the first president of the republic. S. M. Flourney was editor from 1834 until his death in 1857. John H. Martin was editor from 1858 to 1876. In 1874 Maj. Alfred R. Calhoun, an ex-Union officer, bought the paper and later purchased the "Sun," changing the name of the venture to the "Georgia Sun." Calhoun's style was too independent and personal to suit the community, and he sold out to W. L. Salisbury, who employed J. G. De Votie as editor. Salisbury was assassinated in 1878, and John King purchased the paper. De Votie remained editor until he died in 1881, when King assumed editorial management. It is now edited by B. H. Richardson, an able editor, who was formerly city editor of the "Savannah News." The "Columbus Sun" was at various times edited by Hon. John Forsyth, Hon. William L. Scruggs and other prominent men.

MINOR WEEKLIES.

The De Wolfes, of the "Times"—father and son—were among the well-known journalists of Columbus, and E. T. Byrington in recent years made a notable success of the "Ledger," an afternoon paper. The "Athens Banner-Watchman," started as the "Banner," a weekly, in 1816. As a daily the "Banner" was owned at various times by Hopkins Holsey, James Sledge, S. A. Atkinson, T. W. and T. L. Gantt, H. H. Carlton, Chapman & Ingram, John T. Waterman and a stock company. The "Watchman," a weekly paper of some renown, conducted by John H. Christy, was consolidated with the "Banner" years ago. In 1826 the Macon "Telegraph and Messenger" was established, at first under the name of the "Telegraph," but about 1870 it absorbed the "Messenger," another old paper, started by Simon Rose, and edited by Gen. William M. Browne. Among the leading editors of the "Telegraph and Messenger" at various times were Joseph Clisby, H. H. Jones, A. R. Watson, A. W. Reese, Albert R. Lamar, Harry Edwards, F. H. Richardson and A. A. Allen. Lamar was the most brilliant and best equipped editor of his time in Georgia. He was a student and a thinker, and his style had been polished and pointed to the very last degree. His editorials were read with delight by all cultured people whether they agreed with them or not, and the writer's half cynical, half humorous vein invested his articles with an additional charm. His death a few years ago deprived Georgia journalism of one of the few men who had made a national reputation in it.

AUGUSTA NEWS.

"The Augusta News," started in 1877 by the late William H. Moore, is still a successful evening paper, running neck-and-neck with its bright rival, "The Herald," whose leading writer is Thomas D. Murphy, a newspaper man who stands deservedly high in journalistic circles. "The Rome Tribune" was started in 1843 as "The Coosa River Journal," by S. Jack, H. V. M. Miller and W. Spencer. There were several changes and as "The Courier" it was owned successively by A. M. Eddleman, S. M. Jack, Joshua Knowles and W. J. Scott. M. Dwinell made a fortune out of "The Courier," and conducted it many years as a weekly, tri-weekly and daily. Among the papers absorbed by it was "The Commercial," Henry W. Grady's paper. Its successor is "The Tribune," which has been edited by such competent journalists as John Temple Graves, Walter G. Cooper and Addison Knowles. "The Bulletin," "The Hustler" and other dailies have all contributed to Rome's progress, and A. B. S. Moseley, of the former paper, has made quite a fortune out of his enterprise. Col. B. F. Sawyer, who was connected with various paper in Rome and later with "The Atlanta Commonwealth," is one of the ablest newspaper men in the state. "The Griffin Daily News," started in 1871, and conducted by J. D. Alexander, has been a notable paper for years. In Albany "The News and Advertiser," conducted at different times by H. M. McIntosh and others has made its mark in Georgia journalism.

VARIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

The leading religious newspapers of Georgia for many years have been "The Christian Index," the organ of the Baptist denomination, edited for a long time by the Rev. David Shaver, D. D., and the Rev. H. H. Tucker, D. D., and "The Wesleyan Christian Advocate," the organ of the Methodists. The latter paper changes editors every two or three years. "The Milledgeville Union and Recorder" is the outgrowth of two papers—"The Recorder," started in 1819, by Grantland & Camak; and the "Federal Union," established in 1825. Gen Avery says in his history that the latter paper was at various times edited by John G. Polhill, John A. Cuthbert, H. V. Johnson and other distinguished men. "The Mountain Signal," at Dahlonega, edited for a long time by Hon. W. P. Price, has always been an influential weekly. Fifteen years ago, in his summary of the weekly press, Gen. Avery wrote: "The next paper in age is the "Sandersville Herald and Georgian," founded in 1841, and now run by Wm. Park. "The La Grange Reporter" was started in 1843 by Dr. Bronson, with Col. W. B. Jones and Hon. John F. Awtry as printers, and the name then was "The La Grange Herald." B. H. Bigham and Col. Jones owned the paper a while. William J. Scott of "Scott's Magazine," edited it for a period. Alexander Speer, a most remarkable man, father of Judge Speer of the supreme court, and grandfather of Emory Speer, the congressman, was editor a long time. Thomas J. Bacon, a relative of Speaker A. O. Bacon, conducted this journal. The paper had a stirring administration under C. H. C. Willingham, who was threatened with arrest for his unsparing denunciation of the military reconstruction government. Mr. J. T. Waterman bought "The Reporter" in 1872, and ran it for eight brilliant journalistic years, making it a model in every respect. He sold it to William A. Wimbish, who has recently disposed of the paper.

The next weekly paper in point of time was that exquisite specimen of typography and sustained taste and ability, the "North Georgia Citizen," published and edited at Dalton by J. T. Whitman. It was started in 1847 by Ware & Wyatt, as the "Mountain Eagle." Its name has been often changed—to "Spirit of the Times," "North Georgia Times and Citizen." In 1858 the proprietor and editor was J. Troup Taylor. In 1859 J. T. Whitman, the present owner, bought the paper. It was partially destroyed by Gen. Sherman's men, and was suspended a while. It has been democratic, conservative and ably conducted, and was one of the solid institutions of Dalton. It still runs under another management, but "The Argus," conducted by A. H. Shaner, is a formidable competitor. In 1854 Col. C. W. Hancock established the "Sumter Republican" in Americus, when the place had 300 people. It was a whig paper, but has been democratic since the war. It was suppressed by Gen. Steadman a month in 1865. It is a fine journal, and Col. Hancock is a leader of the Georgia press. It has a splendid scope of territory, it has grown steadily in circulation, and its present and only proprietor, if he lives fifty years longer, will leave it a legacy of honor and profit to his descendants. "The Southern Watchman," at Athens, was also established in 1854. "The Southern Enterprise," at Thomasville, began its life in 1855, and is now brilliantly run by Mr. C. P. Hansell.

In 1856 the "Monroe Advertiser" was launched at Forsyth. J. P. Harrison ran it long. J. C. Harris began his bright journalistic career upon it. It has always been a model of a paper, and Henry H. Cabaniss now keeps it up to its unsurpassable standard. In 1857 the "Cartersville Express" was put forth. In 1858 the "Gainesville Eagle" commenced a strong career, J. E. Redwine long managing it. Its editor was a bright writer, H. W. J. Ham, who now edits "The Georgia Cracker" in the same town. In 1859 the "Early County News," at Blakely, and the "Elberton Gazette," at Elberton, were established, both first-class journals.

VARIOUS PUBLICATIONS.

"The Warrenton Clipper," so far as we can learn, is the only war-born paper in existence, it having been established in 1863. It has had a stirring time, one of its editors, Mr. Wallace, having been murdered. It is now run by Rev. John A. Shivers, one of the noted men of the state press, a bold, born editor. After the surrender, the "Newnan Herald" came to us first in 1865, and also the "Georgia Enterprise" at Covington. The year 1866 saw an increased activity in the birth of papers. The "Marietta Journal," "Waynesboro Herald and Expositor," "Dawson Journal," "Eatonton Messenger," "Greensboro Herald," "Hawkinsville Dispatch," "Jesup Sentinel," "Sparta Times and Planter," and "Washington Gazette," all vigorous bantlings, inaugurated healthy, influential journalistic lives. The "Marietta Journal" was issued when the town was in ruins and garrisoned by Federal soldiery. It served a good mission, and gave hope to the county. It fought reconstruction boldly, and was menaced time and again. R. M. Goodman & Co. owned it up to 1875, when Neal & Massey bought, and still run it. It is a first-class journal. The "Waynesboro Herald and Expositor" is under control of R. O. Lovett, and was a consolidation in 1880 of "Expositor," started in 1866, and the "Herald," in 1878. The "Eatonton Messenger" has been a specially valuable and vigorous paper. It was called first the "Press and Messenger." It has changed hands and names several times. Its publisher and editor is George W. Adams. It is one of the progressive journals of Georgia.

In 1867 the "Valdosta Times" was established. In 1868 the "Barnesville Gazette" was introduced to the public by Lambkin & Pound. Mr. Pound, McMichael & Allen, and lastly J. C. McMichael owned the paper in succession. The journal has been twice enlarged, so great has been its prosperity. It is read in six counties, and is a strong publication. The "Brunswick Appeal" was started also in 1868. The year 1869 saw several excellent weeklies given to the public, the "Madison Madisonian," the "Calhoun Times," the "Fort Valley Mirror," the "Perry Home Journal," the "Rome Bulletin," and the "Talbotton Register and Standard." The "Madisonian" was the project of the late Dr. J. C. C. Blackburn, for thirty years identified with our state journalism. The "Talbotton Standard" was the enterprise of two remarkable young men, John B. Gorman and J. T. Waterman. Mr. Gorman was a gallant soldier, has been a successful business man, and a great walker, traveling on foot over 1,200 miles, and is altogether a genial and original character. The "Standard" was consolidated with the "Register" in 1880, and is now owned by J. B. Gorman and O. D. Gorman, and edited by O. D. Gorman, who is a facile writer and noted for his enterprise and fearless views. It is one of the model papers of the state and wields a deservedly great influence in the progressive county in which it is published.

In 1871 the "Catoosa Courier" was published, and has a large circulation, under R. M. Morris. The "Hinesville Gazette" was first issued in 1871, and that sterling journal, the "Gwinnett Herald," published now by Col. Tyler M. Peeples, at Lawrenceville. This is one of the strong weeklies, and edited by an ornament of the newspaper calling. The "McDuffie Journal," at Thompson, and the "Louisville News and Farmer" and "Bainbridge Democrat," by Mr. Ben Russell, complete the list of 1871. The "Eastman Times," the "Toccoa News" and "Greenville Vindicator," by J. T. Revill, the "Lumpkin Independent" all came out in 1872. The "Vindicator" is conducted with singular power and independence. The "Greensboro Georgia Home Journal" was founded in 1873 by Rev. J. Knowles, an eloquent preacher and an able writer. The "Hamilton Journal" and "Middle Georgia Argus," at Indian Springs, "Oglethorpe Echo," at Lexington, and "Montezuma Weekly," and the "Thomasville Times," by J. Triplett, also appeared in 1873. In 1874 the "State Line Press" at West Point, by S. P. Callaway; the "Covington Star," by J. W. Anderson, the "Jonesboro News," "Quitman Reporter," "Summerville Gazette," and the "Darien Timber Gazette," by Richard W. Grubb, were established. These are all the very highest types of weekly journals, bold, able and enterprising. Mr. Callaway aided to found an admirable system of public schools. Mr. Anderson's career has been romantic, he figuring largely in the famous Kansas troubles, and is one of the strong men of our press. Mr. Grubb is a genius. His bright, newsy paper has been a departure in journalism, and is to-day a recognized leader among our state publications. In its files it has embalmed the local history of its county and the famous citizens. It has given some twenty-five sketches of the journalists of the state. His office has been twice destroyed by fire. As delegate to political conventions, member of the state democratic committee, he has been unusually honored. The "Gazette" has a large circulation, copies of it going to Hong Kong, Calcutta and Europe. The year 1875 saw the birth of the "Berrien County News" at Alapaha, the "Brunswick Advertiser," the "Carnesville Register," "Hartwell Sun," "Irwinton Southerner and Appeal" and "Jefferson Forest News."

The "Rome Tribune," the "Marion County Argus," the "Dublin Gazette," the "Elijay Courier" and "Butler Herald," "Crawfordville Democrat," now under charge of a bright Atlanta youth, Mr. Ed Young; "De Kalb News" at Decatur, "Franklin News," "Henry County Weekly," by Brown & McDonald, "Walton County Vidette" at Monroe, "Coffee County Gazette," "Swainsboro Herald," all had birth in 1876. The "Crawfordville Democrat" was established by W. D. Sullivan, then sold to M. Z. Andrews, who disposed of the paper to Ed Young & Co. Mr. Young has doubled the size and circulation of the paper in a month, and its editorial management shows the first order of ability. The "Tribune" was founded by that powerful writer, Col. B. F. Sawyer, and is now run by an efficient editor, W. A. Knowles. The "Argus," published by W. W. Singleton, at Buena Vista, is a conservative and well-conducted journal, having a large scope of territory. The "Dublin Gazette" was the enterprise of John M. Stubbs. It had a number of editors, A. T. Allen, J. M. G. Medlock, Ira T. Stanley, J. H. Etheridge, and now it is managed ably by David Ware, Jr. The "Du Pont Okefeenokean," "Walker County Messenger," at La Fayette, "Quitman Free Press" and "Griffin Sun" belong to the year 1877. Mr. W. R. Hanleiter edited the "Sun" vigorously and recently sold it to Randall & Randall.

In 1878 the "Dade County Gazette," the "Conyers Weekly," and the "Dalton Argus," "Blackshear News," "Cartersville Free Press," by C. H. C. Willingham, that sturdiest of our political editorial fighters; the "Cedartown Advertiser," the "Dublin Post," and "Louisville Courier" came forth in healthy usefulness. The Rev. J. A. Darr put out the "Gazette," Dr. T. J. Lumpkin bought it in 1879 and runs it now. Its motto well exemplifies its management: "Faithful to the right and fearless against the wrong." Mr. J. N. Hale established the "Conyers Weekly," and it is a paragon of good administration, run strictly on a cash basis, by J. B. and J. H. Reese. The "Argus" was the bantling of H. A. Wrench, at Dalton, and was a spicy, outspoken, combative, keen-cutting striker. It is now run by A. H. Shaver and is still a piquant paper.

In 1879 several most excellent journals were established, one of them in its scholarly, forceful and vivid editorials equaling any journal, north or south. This paper, the "Sparta Ishmaelite," edited by Sidney Lewis, is marked by a commanding ability, thorough fearlessness, and an incisive discrimination in its editorial conduct. Mr. Lewis is certainly a strong and gifted writer and one of the ornaments of Georgia journalism. The "Fort Gaines Tribune" was the enterprise of S. E. Lewis, and has deservedly grown into large circulation. The "Douglassville Star" was founded by Rev. J. B. C. Quillian, and sold the same year to its present proprietor, Robert A. Massey, who has made it one of the live papers of Western Georgia. The other papers born in 1879 were the "Arlington Advance," "Cochran Enterprise," "Americus Recorder," "Bellton Georgian," in Hall county, "Dawsonville Mountain Chronicle," "Fort Gaines Tribune," "Fort Valley Advertiser," "Harlem Columbian," "McVille South Georgian," "Newnan Leader," "Sylvania Telephone," "Thomaston Middle Georgia Times," "Thomasville Post," and "Warrenton Our Country." The year 1880 was right prolific in new journals, the "Walkinsville Advance," "Spring Place Times," "Danielsville Yeoman," "Cleveland Advertiser," "Canton Advance," "Camilla Despatch" and "Elberton News."

"The Leader" is a newspaper in Cuthbert, but it holds its own with all of them. It was established about seven years ago by Joseph W. Stanford and was a success from the first. It has a splendid circulation in Randolph and adjoining counties. Mr. Stanford is a hard worker and was formerly editor of the "Cuthbert Enterprise," which was afterward consolidated with "The Leader." The "Jesup Sentinel" is one of the liveliest papers in the "wire grass" section, where it enjoys a splendid circulation. Everybody knows Ben Miliken, the editor of the "Sentinel." He is one of the cleverest men on the Georgia press—clever with his pen and clever personally. He has brought the "Sentinel" out in a wonderful manner, and keeps fully abreast with the times. It has done much good work for Jesup, advertising its interests far and wide. It is the paper of the people, and the people appreciate and sustain it. M. T. B. Fuller is editor of the "Abbeville Times," one of the bright weekly newspapers of southwest Georgia. He is a young man who has made his way in the world and has risen to local fame and prominence by brains and energy. Mr. Fuller is also business manager of the "Baptist Watchman." The "Buchanan Messenger" is the official organ of Haralson county and enjoys a good circulation. It is a well-edited and very neatly-printed weekly newspaper. Its editor is Mr. A. Edgar Nix, but his young wife has been a potent factor in the establishment and progress of the paper. The "Smithville News" is published at Smithville and circulates in Lee and adjoining counties. Mr. Albert Clarke is its young editor, who seems determined to be at the helm of only a good paper. Mr. H. D. Smith is the energetic and enterprising editor of the "Adel News." The "News" has always been a success. It gets the news and gives it in brief and breezy form, and has become very popular with its readers. Editor Smith is a good hand at turning a paragraph and understands just how to get up a good weekly newspaper. The "Stewart County Hopper" is edited by John Barton Gilbert, a veteran in the business. He grinds to powder all that comes to his "Hopper," and by its deft agency columns dwindle to brief, bright paragraphs. Mr. Gilbert's journalistic experience dates back to the forties. He was, in 1863, war correspondent of the "Columbus Enquirer"—now the "Enquirer-Sun"—and a good one. The "Tallapoosa Dispatch" is one of the big enterprises of that thriving, progressive town. It is now published daily and weekly. Both papers receive a splendid patronage. Mr. H. J. Shields is editor of the "Dispatch," and he wields a bright pen. He is devoting all his energies to the upbuilding of the town and county, and his efforts are heartily appreciated by the people. Col. H. A. Wrench, formerly editor of the "Dalton Argus," is now editor of the "Brunswick Times." For years he has been a leading spirit in the progress and enterprise of the town and county and has done much to bring the interests of his section before the country. "The Times" ranks with the solid "old reliables" of the weekly press. Its editor keeps pace with the times, and its columns are always bright and interesting. Walter Scott Coleman, editor of the "Cedartown Standard," is one of the rising young men of the state. He has been successful in everything he has undertaken, but the crowning success of his life is the "Cedartown Standard." Mr. Coleman has built up in Cedartown this splendid weekly newspaper, which is probably one of the best equipped in the state, and has done more to advertise the interests of Polk county than all other agencies combined. Joseph S. Walls, editor of the "Jonesboro News," is another "shining light" in weekly journalism. Readers of Clayton county's bright paper will agree that he has greatly improved his paper in every department. Especially is this so in the county news service, which is always full and interesting. "The News" has a large circulation, not only in what might be termed its legitimate field, but is well patronized by Atlanta advertisers, who know a good thing when it comes along. Col. W. T. Christopher is an editor who has done much for southwest Georgia through his paper, "The Montezuma Record," which has been a great factor in the upbuilding of the town and county. "The Record" is a fearless, out-spoken newspaper, and is well patronized by the people. It shows up well with the best weeklies in the state, and has a high exchange value, while its editor is known and appreciated throughout the state. J. C. Johnson ranks with the young editors of the weekly press and all who read his paper will admit that he is a bright one. "The Enterprise" is firmly established in the good will of the people. It is published at Watkinsville, and is the official paper of Oconee county. Mr. Johnson is also clerk of the superior court—a responsible position, and is popular wherever he is known. For a young man of twenty-four years he is pretty well up on the ladder of success. The "Fort Valley Leader" is the successful result of the establishment of two weekly newspapers—"The Leader" and "The Enterprise." Fort Valley is a flourishing town, and it needs a first-class journal to illustrate its growth and prosperity. This it has in "The Leader," under its present able management. Mr. T. V. Fagan, the proprietor, assisted by Mr. Austin in the editorial department, is doing splendid work for Fort Valley, and the people appreciate his efforts. Trox Bankston and "The Ringgold New South." They go together quite naturally, and both have a state-wide reputation. Under his enterprising management "The New South" has prospered and is spreading out wonderfully. It has many bright and interesting features, and so popular has it made its young editor that nothing is too good for him in Ringgold. The "Henry County Weekly" is one of the best known of Georgia weekly newspapers, and ranks well with the best of the state exchanges. Mr. J. A. Fouche, who assumed control a few years ago, has infused new life into the paper, which is newsy, ably edited and on a solid basis of prosperity. Its columns show a careful editing, and are read by a large number of subscribers in and out of the county. "The Weekly" is an "institution" on which the people of McDonough and Henry county may well congratulate themselves. The "Greensboro Herald-Journal" is one of the old established Georgia weeklies, being now in its twenty-seventh volume. From time to time it has employed some of the best editorial talent of the state, and has always been a strong and influential newspaper. Its editor, Mr. Charles Dobbs, is a young man of energy and ability, and he is keeping the paper up to its former high standard. The "Herald-Journal" is perhaps the best patronized weekly in the state, both as to advertising and circulation, and it fully merits the handsome support the people are giving it. The "Cherokee Advance" is a weekly newspaper of considerable prominence in the state. It has been established for thirteen years and is now under the editorial management of Benj. F. Perry. It excels as a newspaper—covering three counties through the work of its correspondents. "The Advance" naturally has a large circulation on that account. No item of news escapes its vigilant editor, who is so popular that he has frequently been mentioned for the state senate. In "The Middle Georgia Argus," published at Jackson, the people of Butts county have a good weekly newspaper, which they have complimented with a splendid patronage. Mr. David J. Thaxton, the editor, is well known as a versatile writer and a man of affairs, whose talent and energy has made "The Argus" what it is. In addition to his editorial work Mr. Thaxton writes excellent sketches and poems that touch a popular chord. His work in this direction has been highly praised and widely copied by the press. There is, perhaps, no editor in the Georgia weekly press who enjoys greater popularity than the preacher-editor, J. L. Underwood, who for many years has presided over the destinies of the "Camilla Clarion," Mitchell county's progressive newspaper. Editor Underwood has been president of the Georgia Weekly Press association and a prominent man of affairs at all times. His energy knows no limits. He can preach a sermon in the morning, edit the paper at noon and address an agricultural society at night. He preaches, farms, edits, and orates on short notice. He is a man admired and respected by the people. The "Conyers Solid South" ranks with the "old reliable" Georgia weeklies; but recently it has taken a new lease of life and has made great progress. Mr. John Maddox is the editor. He is a young man who wields a bright and vigorous pen, and is saying some sharp things in his editorial columns. There is not an editor in the state who enjoys greater popularity than J. W. Hanlon of "The Quitman Sun," and a more versatile writer does not exist in the weekly sanctum. The first recollection of Editor Hanlon is connected with a Georgia hand press; he was literally raised in Georgia journalism, which is better for having known his pen. As the editor of the "Alapaha Star," he gave to Berrien county a splendid paper; in Albany he has done brilliant work and in Quitman his "Sun" shines brightly over the fertile fields of Brooks county. As Bob Wick his humorous works have received wide recognition. Hanlon can give more spice and variety to a country weekly than the man who invented the hand press with all its interesting and intricate attachments. The "Elberton Star" is a representative Georgia weekly, edited by Mr. Ira C. Vanduzer, who has made it a popular and influential paper. It has made rapid progress the past three years, and has an excellent county news service. It is edited with great ability and typographically is a "beauty." Mr. Frank E. Callaway, editor of the "La Grange Reporter," is perhaps the youngest editor in the state. He has chosen journalism as his profession, having early developed the true journalistic instinct, and it is easy to predict a bright future for him—judged by the work he has already accomplished. He was one of the brightest boys at the state university, where he has acquitted himself with high honors. He has contributed some notable articles to "The Reporter," and under his editorial management it will take first honor with the weekly press. Mr. J. W. Chapman of "The Washington Gazette" is one of the veteran editors of Georgia, having been in the newspaper business twenty-five years. He was formerly one of the editors of the "La Grange Reporter," but for seventeen years has edited "The Gazette" and has been closely identified with the best interests of Washington and Wilkes counties. "The Gazette" is a solid, reliable newspaper, and has done great work for the town and county, and it is constantly adding to its usefulness as a factor in the growth and prosperity of its section. "The Middle Georgia Progress," published at Sandersville, in Washington county, is not one of the oldest papers in the state, but it is fair to state it is one of the best. Mr. C. B. Chapman, the editor-in-chief, is a gentleman whose energy and ability have brought the paper up to its present standing. He is a writer of considerable force, and his pen turns many bright paragraphs. Mr. John H. Hodges is editor and proprietor of the "Houston Home Journal," published at Perry. It is one of the leading weeklies of the state, and has a large circulation, both in and out of the county. Mr. Hodges is prominent in county affairs and as an editor ranks high with the fraternity and his paper is a valued exchange. The "Rockdale Banner," published at Conyers, is edited by Mr. T. D. O'Kelly, and enjoys a liberal patronage. "The Banner" circulates extensively in Rockdale county and also has a flattering outside support. It is an eight-page paper, with bright editorial and local columns. Its editor is what the press calls a "hustler," and makes the paper go with a rush, and he manages a pen that can say a sermon in a sentence. The "Lithania New Era," bright, newsy and eight pages, is one of the best paying enterprises in De Kalb county. Its editor, Mr. E. S. Steadman, is a popular member of the Georgia Weekly Press association. "The New Era" has long been identified with the interests of De Kalb county, and enjoys a large circulation. A. B. Fitts is editor of the "Carrollton Daily Times," and is distinguished among his fellow-editors for his courage in establishing a daily paper in a town the size of Carrollton. His venture, however, was a success from the first, and is making fame and money for its editor. In addition to the daily he gets out a weekly, which was established in 1872. It has a purely moral tone, and steadily strives to elevate public sentiment. Carrollton is the terminus of the Savannah, Griffin & North Alabama railroad, and the county is large and its prospects bright. Mr. Perry Lee is the editor and proprietor of the "Pike County Journal," published at Zebulon. Mr. Lee is a young man who has made his mark in weekly journalism, and at one time accomplished the difficult feat of running two papers at one time. At present all his energies are devoted to the advancement of the "Pike County Journal," and the paper shows that his efforts are appreciated by the people. "The Journal" is well edited and gets up a fine display of local news each week. Southwest Georgia has many first-class weekly newspapers, but the "Dawson News" takes a leading position among them. It is a handsome appearing eight-page paper. Mr. E. L. Rainey, the editor, was formerly connected with the "Dawson Journal," but since "The News" passed into his hands he has given the citizens of Dawson and Terrell county the very best paper they ever had. No Georgie weekly is more favorably known in the state than "The Hawkinsville Dispatch," of which Mr. J. R. Beverly is editor. "The Dispatch" is published by Beverly & Co. In its various departments it is complete as a weekly newspaper: its editorials are strong and timely, and its local columns cover the news of four counties. Mr. John T. Waterman, an accomplished journalist, and Speaker Crisp's private secretary, was recently a member of the firm, and his death in 1895 leaves a void in Georgia journalism. Perhaps there is not an older weekly newspaper in the state than the "Milledgeville Union-Recorder." It was a flourishing, popular newspaper long before the war, and it is identified with the most interesting periods in the history of the state. Mr. R. B. Moore is at present its young and talented editor, and under his able management it still sustains the reputation of the past. "The Union-Recorder" is eight pages, and is one of the most solid and reliable weeklies. It is widely quoted and has a large circulation. "The Madisonian" is another representative Georgia newspaper, and is edited by Mr. C. M. Furlow, a young man who pushes a bright pencil. This paper has long been identified with the interests of Madison and Morgan counties. It is an eight-page newspaper, with many interesting features. It covers a wide field of news and has a good circulation. In "The Richland Gazette," Stewart county boasts another bright weekly newspaper, which holds its own with the best of them. "The Gazette" is young in years, but wide in circulation and is making fame and money for its editor, Mr. A. J. Tison. Mr. Tison was formerly editor of the "Smithville Enterprise," and has been identified with Georgia journalism for a number of years. He is a progressive man with a love for his profession. The "Ellijay Courier," edited by Mr. Horace M. Ellington, is a sparkling Georgia weekly. In the belief that variety is the spice of weekly journalism, Mr. Ellington gives his readers much of it—from the first to the last column. Writing of him, one of his friends says: "He is young, poetic, progressive." This gives the key to the "Courier's" success. It is very popular with all classes of readers. There is always a poem for the love-sick swain; a furrow for the farmer; a sermon for the preacher; an announcement for the politician; and so the paper goes, and goes rapidly. It is the official paper of Fannin, Gilmer and Pickens counties. It has been a faithful advocate of our public school system.

HENRY WOODFIN GRADY.

The most conspicuous figure in Georgia journalism during recent years was Henry Woodfin Grady. Born in Athens, Ga., in 1851, his boyhood was passed in that quiet college town where he enjoyed the best educational advantages. He was placed under the best teachers of that generation in his native state, and his progress was very rapid. To casual observers the boy seemed to devote very little time to his books, but his preceptors found that he mastered his tasks and was always perfect in his recitations. He read and made a book his own in the time required by an ordinary boy to get through the first chapter. His memory was phenomenal. Facts, figures and quotations once lodged in his mind remained there ready for use when needed, and his memory never failed him. As a boy the youngster was as original as he was brilliant, and the older citizens of Athens predicted a great future for him. The civil war broke out when he was barely ten years old, and his father raised the first Georgia regiment and went to the front as its colonel. He died on the battlefield, leaving a widow and three children, Henry, William and a daughter, Mattie, all of whom are now dead, with the exception of the mother. In his youthful days it was young Henry's desire to enter the legal profession, and at a very early age he matriculated in the state university at Athens. He was an industrious student in his peculiar way, taking a full course, and applying himself closely to such studies as suited the bent of his genius, and paying little attention to others which he thought might not be useful to him in after life. For history, the classics, Anglo-Saxon and belles-lettres he had a passion which lasted all through his life. Mathematics did not attract him, and yet in his mature years he was regarded as an authority in statistics and political economy. He cared very little for chemistry and natural philosophy, but he liked logic, and rhetoric delighted him. He stood very high in all his classes, and at an early age was a fluent speaker, with a wonderful command of good English. Even in his boyhood he was noted for the ease with which he placed on paper his ideas in terse and graphic language. In the literary societies of the university he was a conspicuous figure, and his bold and ringing style of speaking made him the favorite orator of his day. In the literary and debating clubs he was always first, carrying off the highest honors. While yet a college boy in his teens he wrote his first effort for a newspaper, a letter to the "Atlanta Constitution." The editor saw it was a bright and dashing epistle, full of promise, and he at once determined to keep an eye on the writer. He frequently printed letters from his boyish correspondent, and in later years was delighted to see how splendidly he had fulfilled the promise of his youth. Of the boy's college days, Judge Emory Speer says: "His college life was a miracle of sweetness and goodness; never did a glass of wine moisten his lips. Never did an oath or an obscene word defile that tongue whose honeyed accents in time to come were to persuade the millions of the fidelity and patriotism of the people he loved. Well do I remember the look of amazement, of indulgent but all intrepid forbearance which came into his face when one day a college bully offered to insult him. In those days of innumerable college flirtations he had but one sweetheart, and she the beautiful girl who became his wife, and is now the mother of his children, and his bereaved and disconsolate widow. This sweetness of disposition ran through his whole life. If the great journal of which he became an editor was engaged in an acrimonious controversy some other writer was detailed to conduct it. Grady had no taste for controversy of any acrid sort, and I recall but perhaps one exception in his whole editorial life. But while he would never quarrel, I had the best right to know, when the emergency came he had the intrepidity of a hero."

He graduated with distinction in a class of brainy young men. A post-graduate course at the Virginia university followed, and there, as in Athens, Grady leaped to the front and was regarded as a genius. After finishing his education he for some unknown reason gave up his idea of becoming a lawyer, and in 1870 he was the editor and one of the proprietors of the "Rome Daily Commercial." It was his first newspaper venture, and he acquitted himself in such a way as to make him widely known and popular in Georgia. Later he purchased an interest in the "Atlanta Herald," a rival of "The Constitution," and for several years his energy and genius made it one of the most notable papers in the south. After the fiercest possible struggle the "Herald" went down shortly after the great panic of 1873, and Mr. Grady became the "New York Herald's" southern correspondent. In this capacity he was fearless and enterprising, and his letters first informed the American public of the true nature of the great problems which disturbed South Carolina and other southern states during the latter part of the reconstruction period. He was in Florida during the campaign of 1876, and gave an inside view of the work of the returning board. After the Hamburg riots in South Carolina he visited the scene and wrote a ten-column report for "The Herald." In 1880 Mr. Grady purchased a fourth interest in "The Atlanta Constitution," which at that time had on its staff such able men as Capt. E. P. Howell, editor-in-chief; Mr. W. A. Hemphill, business manager, and Joel Chandler Harris. The new partner in the business was made managing editor, and he at once threw his whole heart and energy into the paper. In a short time "The Constitution" was the most widely read and quoted southern daily, and its weekly edition had an immense circulation. He wrote editorials, sketches, and local articles, regarded as models of their kind and set the journalistic fashions in the south. As a specimen of one of his off-hand editorials, the following on the death of Gen. Robert Toombs is worthy of note:

"Quenched is the imperious life, stilled is the mighty heart; gone, the dauntless spirit; at rest, the turbulent emotions; pulseless, the splendid form.

"If God ever made the body of mortal man to shine with the hope and inspiration of immortality, surely here it was. In the splendor of his beauty, in the mightiness of his strength, in the vitality that sparkled in his eyes and rushed through his veins, in the ease with which he conquered and the heights to which he soared, and the scope and freedom and boundless comprehension of his powers there was little suggestion of decay. Dazzled by his kingly beauty and majesty one might have said, 'Surely he will conquer death.'

"But the course of nature is unchangeable. Even the eagle's wings grow weary and are folded, and the strong man totters to the welcome grave. The glory fades from the cheek and the light dies in the eye. The majesty departs from the pallid brow, and the rich blood falters in the veins. The tongue that summoned forty millions of people to war babbles unmeaningly in its hollow cavern. The fingers that easily split this continent in two beat the air pitifully for support and guidance. The mighty spirit that bent senators to its will and that forged earth's bloodiest revolution, sicklied o'er at last with uplifting shadows, creeps aimlessly within the walls of memory, and weeps or laughs alike within itself.

"Then God, in his wise and infinite mercy, comes and ends it all! His gentle hands clasp the wandering fingers. His kiss touches the maundering lips. There is peace at last. Georgia's glorious sun sleeps. The unforgiven rebel awaits, in unbroken stillness, the final judgment of God. And death, touching the tranquil face with its unspeakable solemnity, revives therein something of the majesty and beauty of youth, that his people, gazing through the mist of tears, may see him last as they loved him best, when he stood among them in his kingly splendor."

Col. Isaac W. Avery, one of his associates on the "Atlanta Herald's" staff, wrote of him: "He was a composite character. He had genius of a high and varied order, and combined qualities remarkable because seemingly inconsistent. For instance, with a fervent nature, boundless energy when interested, intense self-will and a warm temperament, he had a conservatism as steady and thoughtful as ever I have known. With a glittering imagination, he was self-poised, tactful and just. Passion never governed him in large matters, and no man ever subordinated prejudice and temper to the success of his cause with firmer will than he. He was able to meet the most trying occasion with consummate control and judgment. He was a cool user of all needed discretion, and his forbearance and self-command were marvelous. The restraints he put upon his impetuous nature were wonderful. The deliberate effort with which he worked results was extraordinary."

A year before the Christmas day on which he was buried the holiday was marked by exceptionally delightful weather. Here is Mr. Grady's description of it: "No man or woman now living will see again such a Christmas day as the one which closed yesterday, when the dying sun piled the western skies with gold and purple. A winter day it was, shot to the core with sunshine. It was enchanting to walk abroad in its prodigal beauty, to breathe its elixir, to reach out the hands and plunge them open-fingered through its pulsing waves of warmth and freshness. It was June and November welded and fused into a perfect glory that held the sunshine and snow beneath tender and splendid skies. To have winnowed such a day from the teeming winter was to have found an odorous peach on the bough whipped in the storms of winter. One caught the musk of yellow grain, the flavor of ripening nuts, the fragrance of strawberries, the exquisite odor of violets, the aroma of all seasons in the wonderful day. The hum of bees underrode the whistling wings of wild geese flying southward. The fire slept in drowsing grates, while the people, marveling, out doors, watched the soft winds woo the roses and the lilies. Truly, it was a day of days. Amid its riotous luxury surely life was worth living, to hold up the head and breathe it in, as thirsting men drink water; to put every sense on its gracious excellence; to throw the hands wide apart, and hug whole armfuls of the day close to the heart, till the heart itself is enraptured and illumined. God's benediction came down with the day, slow dropping from the skies. God's smile was its light, and all through and through its supernal beauty and stillness, unspoken but appealing to every heart and sanctifying every soul, was his invocation and promise—"Peace on earth, good will to men."

As a political manager Mr. Grady had no superior, and during every great campaign in Georgia he was the controlling spirit, and in every instance his side won the victory, with the exception of Atlanta's second prohibition election. In that contest there was a great deal of feeling, families were divided, and the proprietors and writers of the "Constitution" were about evenly divided. Mr. Grady led the prohibition forces, and in one of his speeches before an immense audience he said among other things: "Now to sum up. See what prohibition has done for Atlanta. Your population has been largely increased, 4,070 street taxpayers have been added to the records, and the registration has increased 2,140 votes; 678 new home-owners in prohibition's two years; only 153 in liquor's two years; distress warrants and garnishments decreased; 2,595 fewer cases in the justice courts; fewer criminal cases; $1,325,000 added to your banking capital and surplus; $1,000,000 more deposits in your banks than two years ago; five savings banks now, where then there was one; fifteen building and loan associations against six; $1,000,000 put in manufactures in the county; wages higher and every factory and shop crowded; $300,000 put into new churches and schools; the poor of the churches diminished, and the membership nearly doubled; your schools fuller and your children better clothed more stores here than when there were 130 bar-rooms, and fewer stores vacant than ever in your history; your houses crowded with families paying rent better than ever before, your merchants and manufacturers busy and prosperous, your principal streets a sight to be seen on a fair day—last Sunday without an arrest in all this broad city—why, my friends, it almost seems that God had held this old town in the hollow of His almighty hand and smiled on it while He rested here the ark of His covenant on this grand issue. Who shall challenge this great and prosperous city in its prosperous career? Why should you bring bar-rooms back into this city, and put it once more under the dominion of the liquor traffic?

"My friends, hesitate before you vote liquor back into Atlanta, now that it is shut out. Don't trust it. It is powerful, aggressive and universal in its attacks. To-night it enters an humble home to strike the roses from a woman's cheek, and to-morrow it challenges this republic in the halls of congress. To-day it strikes a crust from the lips of a starving child, and to-morrow levies tribute from the government itself. There is no cottage in this city humble enough to escape it—no palace strong enough to shut it out. It defies the law when it cannot coerce suffrage. It is flexible to cajole, but merciless in victory. It is the mortal enemy of peace and order. The despoiler of men, the terror of women, the cloud that shadows the face of children, the demon that has dug more graves and sent more souls unshrived to judgment than all the pestilences that has wasted life since God sent the plagues of Egypt, and all the wars that have been fought since Joshua stood beyond Jericho. Oh, my countrymen, loving God and humanity, do not bring this grand old city again under the dominion of that power. It can profit no man by its return. It can uplift no industry, revive no interest, remedy no wrong. You know that it cannot. It comes to destroy, and it shall profit mainly by the ruin of your sons or mine. It comes to mislead human souls and to crush human hearts under its rumbling wheels. It comes to bring gray-haired mothers down in shame and sorrow to their graves. It comes to turn the wife's love into despair, and her pride into shame. It comes to still the laughter on the lips of little children. It comes to stifle all the music of the home, and fill it with silence and desolation. It comes to ruin your body and mind, to wreck your home, and it knows that it must measure its prosperity by the swiftness and certainty with which it wrecks this work. Now will you vote it back? * * *

"Now, for a last word, my friends. I never spoke to you from deeper conviction than I speak to-night. I beg of you in the interest of peace and fairness to give this experiment a full trial. Note what it has done in a year of imperfect trial. Give it two years more that it may demonstrate what it can do. Then if it fails it will fall, if it is good it will stand. If you are in doubt what you should do give us the benefit of the doubt. Give the doubt to the churches of this city that stand unbroken in this cause. Give the doubt to the 20,000 prayers that ascend nightly for the cause from the women and children of Atlanta—prayers uttered so silently that you cannot catch their whispered utterance, but so sincerely that they speed their soft entreaty through the singing hosts of heaven into the heart of the living God. If you are in doubt as to what your duty is, turn this once to your old mother whose gray hairs shall plead with you as nothing else should—remember how she has loved you all her life and how her heart yearns for you now. Take her old hand in yours, look into her eyes fearlessly as you did when you were a barefoot boy, and say, 'I have run my politics all my life, and to-day I am going to give one vote to you. How shall I cast it?' Watch the tears start from her shining eyes, feel the lump rising in her throat, and tell me if that is not better than 'personal liberty.' If you are in doubt, ask your wife; ask her who years ago put her little hand in yours, and adoring and trusting, left the old home-nest and went out with you into the unknown world; remember how she has stood by you when all else forsook; how she has lived only in your life, and carried your sorrows on her own, and ask her how you shall vote.

"I do not believe that women should counsel men in politics, but this question is deeper than politics. Your wife need not tell you how to vote on the tariff, or on candidates, or on any political issue, but this is her election as well as yours. On this jeopardy is staked the home you builded together, the happiness you have had together, and the welfare of the little children in whose veins your blood and hers run commingled. Her stake and theirs on this election is greater than yours. Then ask her, if you have any doubt, how you should vote on that day.

"Now a word to the good women here. You can do great work quietly and gently in your homes for this cause and for the good of your city. You can do this work in the home circle, where no man can say you nay. Mothers, go to your son on election morning, call him back to the time when he learned God's name at your knees, and wake when he would in the night, he would find your soft eyes above him and your loving hands about him, and say: 'My son, find your way this morning in memory to those days when nothing stood between us, and when these old hands sheltered you and protected you.'

"Wives, go to your husbands that morning. Not in pique or criticism, but with a love and tenderness that shall break through their pride or indifference; lay your husband's hand lovingly on the heads of the little ones, the pride of his life and yours—oh, you who went down into the very jaws of death that you might give them to him!—and say, 'My husband, whatever you do to-day, do it for these little ones and for me.'

"Now, my friends, I have done. What I have spoken to you to-night I have spoken in sober earnestness and truth. If what I have said has impressed you, I beg of you to let the impression deepen rather than pass away, for I know and you know this issue goes deeper than words can go. It involves hundreds of homes redeemed from want and desolation, it involves thousands of hearts now rejoicing that late were breaking; it involves the happiness of women and children, and the most sacred charges vouchsafed to our care; it involves the fate of this tremendous experiment that Atlanta must settle for the American people. Against it there is nothing but the whim of personal liberty. Your city has prospered under prohibition as it has never prospered before. If you are a merchant or a manufacturer, your books will tell you this. You know that you have prospered this year in your happiness; ask your neighbor of his business. Look abroad about you on these bustling streets, and on these busy stores; on these shops and factories in which the fires scarcely ever die, and in which the workmen are never idle, and then vote in the light of reason and of conscience, and however you vote, may God bless you, and the city you love so well."

During the last year of his life Mr. Grady delivered addresses before the New England society in New York, various organizations in Boston, the university of Virginia and other bodies, which gave him a national reputation. In his famous New England banquet speech in New York he said among other things:

"Pardon me one word, Mr. President, spoken for the sole purpose of getting into the volumes that go out annually, freighted with the rich eloquence of your speakers—The fact that the Cavalier, as well as the Puritan, was on the continent in its early days, and that he was 'up and able to be about.' I have read your books carefully, and I find no mention of that fact, which seems to me an important one for preserving a sort of historical equilibrium, if for nothing else.

"Let me remind you that the Virginian Cavalier first challenged France on this continent, that Cavalier John Smith gave New England his very name, and was so pleased with the job that he has been handing his own name around ever since, and that while Miles Standish was cutting off men's ears for courting a girl without her parents' consent, and forbidding men to kiss their wives on Sunday, the Cavalier was courting everything in sight, and that the Almighty had vouchsafed great increase to the Cavalier colonies, the huts in the wilderness being as full as the nests in the woods. But having incorporated the Cavalier as a fact in your charming little book, I shall let him work out his own salvation, as he has always done with engaging gallantry, and we will hold no controversy as to his merits. Why should we? Neither Puritan nor Cavalier long survived as such. The virtues and traditions of both happily still live for the inspiration of their sons and the saving of the old fashion. Both Puritan and Cavalier were lost in the storm of the first revolution, and the American citizen, supplanting both, and stronger than either, took possession of the republic, bought by their common love and fashioned to wisdom, and charged himself with teaching men government and establishing the voice of the people as the voice of God.

"My friend, Dr. Talmage, has told you that the typical American has yet to come. Let me tell you that he has already come. Great types, like valuable plants, are slow to flower and fruit. But from the union of these colonists, Puritans and Cavaliers, from the straightening of their purposes and the crossing of their blood, slowly perfecting through a century, came he who stands as the first typical American, the first who comprehended within himself all the strength and gentleness, all the majesty and grace of this republic—Abraham Lincoln. He was the sum of Puritan and Cavalier; for in his ardent nature were fused the virtues of both, and in the depths of his great soul the faults of both were lost. He was greater than Puritan, greater than Cavalier, in that he was American, and that in his homely form were first gathered the vast and thrilling forces of his ideal government, charging it with such tremendous meaning, and so elevating it above human suffering that martyrdom, though infamously aimed, came as a fitting crown to a life consecrated from the cradle to human liberty. Let us, each cherishing the traditions and honoring his fathers, build with reverent hands to the type of his simple but sublime life, in which all types are honored; and in our common glory as Americans there will be plenty and some to spare for your forefathers and for mine.

"In speaking to the toast with which you have honored me, I accept the term, 'The New South,' as in no sense disparaging to the old. Dear to me, sir, is the home of my childhood, and the traditions of my people. I would not, if I could, dim the glory they won in peace and war, or by word or deed take off from the splendor and grace of their civilization, never equaled, and perhaps never to be equaled in its chivalric strength and grace. There is a new south, not through protest against the old, but because of new conditions, new adjustments, and, if you please, new ideas and aspirations. It is to this that I address myself.

"Dr. Talmage has drawn for you with a master hand the picture of your returning armies. He has told you how, in the pomp and circumstance of war, they came back to you, marching with proud and victorious tread, reading their glory in a nation's eye! Will you bear with me while I tell you of another army that sought its home at the close of the late war? An army that marched home in defeat and not in victory—in pathos and not in splendor, but in glory that equaled yours, and to hearts as loving as ever welcomed heroes home. Let me picture to you the footsore Confederate soldier, as, buttoning up in his faded gray jacket the parole which was to bear testimony to his children of his fidelity and faith, he turned his face southward from Appomattox in April, 1865. Think of him as ragged, half-starved, heavy-hearted, enfeebled by want and wounds; having fought to exhaustion, he surrenders his gun, wrings the hands of his Confederates in silence, and, lifting his tear-stained and pallid face for the last time to the graves that dot the old Virginia hills, pulls his gray cap over his brow and begins the slow and painful journey. What does he find? Let me ask you who went to your homes eager to find, in the welcome you had justly earned, full payment for four years' sacrifice, what does he find when, having followed the battle-stained cross against overwhelming odds, dreading death not half so much as surrender, he reaches the home he left so prosperous and beautiful? He finds his house in ruins, his farm devastated, his slaves free, his stock killed, his barn emptied, his trade destroyed, his money worthless; his social system, feudal in its magnificence, swept away. His people are without law or legal status; his comrades slain, and the burdens of others are heavy on his shoulders. Crushed by defeat, his very traditions gone, without money, credit, employment, material training; and besides all this, confronted with the gravest problem that ever met human intelligence—the establishing of a status for the vast body of his liberated slaves.

"What does he do—this hero in gray with a heart of gold? Does he sit down in sullenness and despair? Not for a day. Surely God, who had stripped him of his prosperity, inspired him in his adversity. As ruin was never before so overwhelming, never was restoration swifter. The soldier stepped from the trenches into the furrow. Horses that had charged Federal guns marched before the plow, and fields that ran red with human blood in April, were green with the harvest June; women reared in luxury cut up their dresses and made breeches for their husbands, and, with a patience and heroism that fit women always as a garment, gave their hands to work. There was little bitterness in all this. Cheerfulness and frankness prevailed. 'Bill Arp' struck the keynote when he said: 'Well, I killed as many of them as they did of me, and now I am going to work.' Or the soldier returning home after defeat, and roasting some corn on the roadside, who made the remark to his comrades: 'You may leave the south if you want to, but I am going to Sandersville, kiss my wife and raise a crop, and if the Yankees fool with me any more I will whip 'em again.' I want to say to Gen. Sherman—who is considered an able man in our parts, though some people think he is kind of careless about fire—that from the ashes he left us in 1864 we have raised a brave and beautiful city; that somehow or other we have caught the sunshine in the bricks and mortar of our homes, and have builded therein not one ignoble prejudice or memory. * * * * *

“But what of the negro? Have we solved the problem he presents, or progressed in honor and equity toward the solution? Let the record speak to the point. No section shows a more prosperous laboring population than the negroes of the south. None in fuller sympathy with the employing and land-owning class. He shares our school fund, has the fullest protection of our laws, and the friendship of our people. Self-interest, as well as honor, demand that they should have this. Our future, our very existence, depends upon our working out this problem in full and exact justice. We understand that when Lincoln signed the emancipation proclamation your victory was assured; for he then committed you to the cause of human liberty, against which the arms of man cannot prevail; while those of our statesman who trusted to make slavery the corner-stone of the Confederacy, doomed us to defeat as far as they could, committing us to a cause that reason could not defend or the sword maintain in the sight of advancing civilization. Had Mr. Toombs said—he did not say—that he would call the roll of his slaves at the foot of Bunker Hill, he would have been foolish, for he might have known that whenever slavery became entangled in war it must perish, and that the chattel in human flesh ended forever in New England when your fathers—not to be blamed for parting with what did not pay—sold their slaves to our fathers, not to be praised for knowing a paying thing when they saw it.

“The relations of the southern people with the negro are close and cordial. We remember with what fidelity for four years he guarded our defenseless women and children, whose husbands and fathers were fighting against his freedom. To his credit be it said that whenever he struck a blow for his own liberty he fought in open battle, and when at last he raised his black and humble hands that the shackles might be struck off, those hands were innocent of wrong against his helpless charges, and worthy to be taken in loving grasp by every man who honors loyalty and devotion. Ruffians have maltreated him, rascals have misled him, philanthropists established a bank for him, but the south with the north protests against injustice to this simple and sincere people. To liberty and enfranchisement is as far as the law can carry the negro. The rest must be left to conscience and common sense. It should be left to those among whom his lot is cast, with whom he is indissolubly connected and whose prosperity depends upon their possessing his intelligent sympathy and confidence. Faith has been kept with him in spite of calumnious assertions to the contrary by those who assume to speak for us, or by frank opponents. Faith will be kept with him in future if the south holds her reason and integrity.

“But have we kept with you? In the fullest sense, yes. When Lee surrendered, I don’t say when Johnston surrendered, because I understand he still alludes to the time when he met Gen. Sherman last as the time when he ‘determined to abandon any further prosecution of the struggle’—when Lee surrendered, I say, and Johnston quit, the south became, and has been loyal to the Union. We fought hard enough to know that we were whipped, and in perfect frankness accepted as final the arbitrament of the sword to which we had appealed. The south found her jewel in the toad’s head of defeat, the shackles that had held her in narrow limitations fell forever when the shackles of the negro slave were broken.

“Under the old regime the negroes were slaves to the south, the south was a slave to the system. The old plantation, with its simple police regulation, and its feudal habit, was the only type possible under slavery. Thus was gathered in the hands of a splendid and chivalric oligarchy the substance that should have been diffused among the people, as the rich blood under certain artificial conditions is gathered at the heart, filling that with affluent rapture, but leaving the body chill and colorless. The old south rested everything on slavery and agriculture, unconscious that these could neither give nor maintain healthy growth. The new south presents a perfect democracy, the oligarchs leading in the popular movement—a social system compact and closely knitted, less splendid on the surface but stronger at the core; a hundred farms for every plantation, fifty homes for every palace, and a diversified industry that meets the complex needs of this complex age.

"The new south is enamored of her new work. Her soul is stirred with the breath of a new life. The light of a grander day is falling fair on her face. She is thrilling with the consciousness of a growing power and prosperity. As she stands upright, full statured and equal among the people of the earth, breathing the keen air and looking out upon the expanding horizon, she understands that her emancipation came because in the inscrutable wisdom of God her honest purpose was crossed and her brave armies were beaten. This is said in no spirit of time-serving or apology. The south has nothing for which to apologize. She believes that the late struggle between the states was war and not rebellion, revolution and not conspiracy, and that her convictions were as honest as yours. I should be unjust to the dauntless spirit of the south and to my own convictions if I did not make this plain in this presence. The south has nothing to take back. In my native town of Athens is a monument that crowns its central hills—a plain, white shaft. Deep cut into its shining side is a name dear to me above the names of men, that of a brave and simple man who died in brave and simple faith. Not for all the glories of New England—from Plymouth Rock all the way—would I exchange the heritage he left me in his soldier's death. To the feet of that shaft I shall send my children's children to reverence him who ennobled their name with his heroic blood. But, sir, speaking from the shadow of that memory, which I honor as I do nothing else on earth, I say that the cause in which he suffered and for which he gave his life was adjudged by higher and fuller wisdom than his or mine, and I am glad that the omniscient God held the balance of battle in his almighty hand, and that human slavery was swept forever from American soil—the American Union saved from the wreck of war.

"This message, Mr. President, comes to you from consecrated ground. Every foot of the soil about the city in which I live is as sacred as a battle-ground of the republic. Every hill that infests it is hallowed to you by the blood of your brothers who died for your victory, and doubly hallowed to us by the blood of those who died hopeless, but undaunted, in defeat—sacred soil to all of us, rich with memories that make us purer and stronger and better. Silent but stanch witnesses in its red desolation of the matchless valor of American hearts, and the deathless glory of American arms—speaking an eloquent witness in its white peace and prosperity to the indissoluble union of American states, and the imperishable brotherhood of the American people.

"Now, what answer has New England to this message? Will she permit the prejudice of war to remain in the hearts of the conquerors when it has died in the hearts of the conquered? Will she transmit this prejudice to the next generation, that in their hearts, which never felt the generous ardor of conflict, it may perpetrate itself? Will she withhold, save in strained courtesy, the hand which, straight from his soldier's heart, Grant offered to Lee at Appomattox. Will she make division of a restored and happy people which gathered above the clouds of your dying captain, filling his heart with grace, touching his lips with praise and glorifying his path to the grave; will she make this vision on which the last sigh of his expiring soul breathes a benediction, a cheat and delusion? If she does, the south, never abject in asking for comradeship, must accept with dignity its refusal; but if she does—if she accepts with frankness and sincerity this message of good-will and fellowship, then will the prophecy of Webster, delivered in this very society, forty years ago, amid tremendous applause, be verified in its fullest and final sense, when he said: ‘Standing hand to hand and clasping hands, we should remain united as we have been for sixty years, citizens of the same country, members of the same government, united, all united now and united forever.’ There have been difficulties, contentions and controversies, but I tell you that in my judgment:

“ ‘Those opposed eyes,
Which like the meteors of a troubled heaven,
All of one nature, of one substance bred,
Did lately meet in th’ intestine shock,
Shall now in mutual well-beseeming ranks
March all one way.’ ”

In December, 1889, Mr. Grady contracted a severe cold while speaking in the open air on his visit to Plymouth Rock, and shortly after returning to Atlanta he died on the morning of Dec. 23. There was general mourning throughout the country upon the announcement of his death, and his funeral on Christmas Day was attended by the largest concourse ever seen in Atlanta. Many notable tributes were paid him by distinguished orators, poets and journalists.

In the center of Atlanta stands the Grady statue—a handsome bronze memorial which is visited every year by thousands of tourists from every quarter of the Union. But the great journalist and orator does not need a monument to keep his memory fragrant. His name is still a household word in Georgia, and it is synonymous with genius, patriotism, charity, public spirit and enterprise. There has been only one Henry Grady in this generation.

PREFACE TO MEDICAL HISTORY.

As is common with writers I preface these chapters with an apology. Under the circumstances I feel that I am entitled to charity from critics. If they knew the difficulty of obtaining the data necessary for such work they would not be censorious. Much of the data from which these chapters were written were obtained from pamphlets, newspapers and personal recollections of my professional brethren. I have done the best I could under the circumstances. I have as carefully as possible verified the correctness of the statements made in these chapters, and am satisfied that they may be relied upon. Let it be remembered that these chapters are not intended to be either a consecutive or full history of medical matters in Georgia. Such a history cannot be written for the reason that the necessary data have not been preserved. I have written as best I could upon what appeared to me to be the most interesting and important questions relative to the medical profession of our commonwealth, and express the hope that I have succeeded in discharging the task to the satisfaction of my professional brethren. With these explanations I submit my work to the generous, noble-hearted physicians of Georgia.

TOPOGRAPHY.

FROM the Commonwealth of Georgia, by J. T. Henderson, Esq., commissioner of agriculture of Georgia, 1885, I extract the following facts: "Georgia is naturally divided into a number of zones, extending across the state in direction approximately parallel with the coast line, differing more or less in geology, topography, climate and production. The state presents great variety in her topography. From an extensive area of nearly level surface in South Georgia the country graduates towards the north through undulating, rolling and hilly lands to a mountainous region of diversified character in North Georgia, rising at the same time from sea level to an altitude of 5,000 feet. The state is divided by bold divides into three divisions: lower, middle and upper Georgia, each having, along with much diversity in itself, some prominent characteristics in common throughout its extent. The first of these natural divisions, belonging to the south, that of southern or lower Georgia, extends from Florida and the Atlantic coast to a line crossing the state from Augusta to Columbus, and passing at the heads of navigation, near Milledgeville and Macon. This is an approximately level, sandy region, covering more than half of the state, and embracing all the cretaceous and tertiary formations. This section graduates from sea level to about 500 feet. Beginning with the low marsh lands on the coast, the country rises by terraces, first to the height of twelve or fifteen feet above tide, and next, thirty or forty miles inland, to a height of seventy-five or one hundred feet. Beyond this the surface varies from nearly level to undulating, and becoming hilly in the upper, or northern part. Middle Georgia is a broad, hilly region, having few elevations that are designated as mountains, and these, with few exceptions, are such as would hardly receive the distinctive name of ridge in the more northern portions of the state. Lands too steep for the plow are of rare occurrence over the larger part of this area. Pine mountain, in Harris, and Graves mountain, in Lincoln, are elevations of a few hundred feet above the surrounding country, that form conspicuous features in the landscape. Stone mountain stands 600 feet above the surrounding country, and covers, at its base, an area of about one square mile. This is a mass of denuded granite, destitute of vegetation, except here and there a bush or scrubby tree that finds foothold in the crevices of the rocks. The summit affords a view reaching beyond the limits of the state. The Chattahoochee ridge is a prominent feature, forming a long water divide, reaching nearly across the state, from Habersham to Troup county. Atlanta is situated on the crest of this ridge. One conspicuous feature of the larger portion of middle and north Georgia is the existence of fragmentary stones, usually of quartz rocks, scattered over the surface of the lands. Upper Georgia embraces a section with striking peculiarities of surface and great variety of soil. Northeast Georgia varies from 1,000 to 5,000 feet above sea level. Northwest Georgia, generally distinguished as the Limestone region, ranges from 600 or 700 to 2,500 feet, and has an extent of 3,360 square miles, covering the larger part of ten counties. Some of the features of these divisions of the state, particularly the topography, pass by almost imperceptible graduations into each other, but nevertheless become well marked distinctive characteristics of the geological divisions to which they pertain. About 3,000 square miles, near the Atlantic coast, has an altitude of 100 feet or less above the tide; 29,000, or about half of the state, ranges from 100 to 500 feet; 20,000 square miles, from 500 to 1,000 feet; and about 6,000 square miles is above the altitude of 1,000 feet. A large part of the last area consists of steep ridges and mountains, some of which, in the Blue ridge, reach an altitude of about 5,000 feet above sea level. The mountainous parts of the state lie in one degree of altitude north of the thirty-fourth parallel. The Appalachian chain enters the state with several parallel lines of elevations. The highest of these, the Blue ridge, has an altitude of from 3,000 to nearly 5,000 feet. The Cohutta range, continuous with the Unaka of Tennessee, 3,000 feet in altitude, with an abrupt escarpment toward the valley of the Oostanaula, on the west, lies about twenty miles west of the Blue ridge. Next in order, on the northwest, comes the Lookout and Sand mountain table lands belonging to the Allegheny system. Between the principal ranges of mountains here enumerated are the numerous minor elevations or ridges observing a general parallelism. These decrease in height toward the southwest, and ultimately die out, the most easterly ranges disappearing first, and the others in succession. The Blue ridge, as an unbroken chain, extends only about one-third the distance across the state, terminating abruptly. The Cohutta range continues into Alabama in a low elevation, known as Dugdown mountain; while the Table Land mountains, with their associate ridges, extend with decreasing altitudes many miles into Alabama.

MOUNTAIN ELEVATIONS.

The following are the elevations above the average sea level of some of the prominent mountains and other points of interest in the state, determined by the United States coast and geodetic survey: Sitting Bull (middle summit of Nantahela) in Towns county, 5,046; Mona (east summit of Nantahela) in Towns, 5,039; Enota, Towns, 4,797; Rabun Bald, Rabun, 4,718; Blood, Union, 4,468; Tray, Habersham, 4,403; Cohutta, Fannin, 4,155; Dome, Towns, 4,042; Grassy, Pickens, 3,290; Tallulah (northwest summit), Habersham, 3,172; Tallulah (southeast summit), Habersham, 2,849; Yona, White, 3,167; Walker, Lumpkin, 2,614; Lookout (at High point), Walker, 2,391; Pine Log, Bartow, 2,340; Lookout (at Round mountain), Walker, 2,331; Pigeon (at High point), Walker, 2,329; Skit, 2,075; Sawnee, Forsyth, 1,968; Kennesaw, Cobb, 1,809; Stone mountain, De Kalb, 1,686; Sweat, 1,693; Lavender, Floyd, 1,680; Cleveland Church, White, 1,616; Taylor's ridge, Chattooga, 1,556; Dahlonga Agricultural college, 1,518; Mt. Alto, Floyd, 1,505; Clarkesville court house, Habersham, 1,478; Carnes mountain, Polk, 1,296; Atlanta, Capital (flag staff), 1,163.

As would be expected, from the above data, the climate of Georgia is a varied one. Inasmuch as there is a fall of one degree in temperature for each 300 feet of elevation, this would give a variation of sixteen degrees in the state, and the difference of four and one-half degrees of latitude causes a variation of nine degrees. From the two causes—elevation and latitude—there arises a variation of twenty-five degrees. The records of the agricultural department show the annual mean for the state to be 65.1 degrees, the summer mean about 79.7 degrees, and the winter mean, about 50.1 degrees. In northern Georgia the summer mean about 75.3 degrees, the winter mean 42.8 degrees. In middle Georgia the annual mean is 63.5, summer 79.2, winter 47.2. In south Georgia the annual mean is 67.7, summer 81.3, winter 53.6 degrees.

This table of the agricultural department shows that the average summer temperature of Georgia is only 15 degrees above the average annual temperature, and our average winter temperature is but 15 degrees below the annual. It further shows that the average of spring is below that of our annual temperature. Our average fall temperature is a little above the annual. This table also shows that the average annual temperature of southeast Georgia was 9.7 degrees above that of North Georgia, the difference in the summer temperature of the two sections 6.1 degrees, and the difference in the winter temperature 12.8 degrees. Commissioner Henderson also tells us that comparing single localities, the highest annual average is at Blackshear—70.3 degrees—the lowest at Rabun Gap—56.3—a difference of 14 degrees. Blackshear is in latitude 31 degrees 15 minutes and 127 feet above the sea level. Rabun Gap is in latitude 34 degrees 55 minutes and 2,168 feet above the sea level. Thompson (McDuffie county), 531 feet above sea level, shows an average annual temperature within half a degree of the average annual of the state. Macon 1 degree above, and Augusta 1.1 degree below the average of the state.

TEMPERATURE AND RAINFALL IN CITIES.

The summer temperature of Athens is 79.7 degrees, identical with the state average, 79.7; Thompson, 2 degrees below the state average, and Augusta, 1 degree above the average summer temperature of the state. Comparing the average winter temperature of Swainsboro, Emanuel Co., Thompson, Macon and Augusta, with that of the entire state of Georgia, it was found that Swainsboro was 3 degrees above, Macon 2 above, Thompson 1 degree below, and Augusta 1.2 degrees below the average temperature of the state.

The following tables from the agricultural department, 1885, show the difference in temperature and rainfall in various sections of the state:

WINTER TEMPERATURE AT NOTED HEALTH RESORTS.

To illustrate one important factor in the climate of Georgia, i. e., temperature, I cite the following comparisons of winter temperature at renowned health resorts, foreign and American, giving the mean temperature of the following localities for the months of November, December, January, February and March, for a period of three to four years. This chart is to be found in a book entitled Climatology of Florida, by C. J. Kenworthy, M. D., Jacksonville, Fla.:

ATMOSPHERIC HUMIDITY.

The following table is from Dr. Kenworthy's pamphlet on the climatology of Florida, prepared by him to show the climatic advantages of that state. I insert it here because of the favorable showing which it makes for Georgia:

	Nov.	Dec.	Jan.	Feb.	Mar.	Mean for 5 mo.
Cannes and Mentone.....	71.8	74.2	72.0	70.7	73.3	72.4
Augusta, Ga.....	71.8	72.6	73.0	64.7	62.8	68.9
Breckenridge, Minn.....	76.9	83.2	76.8	81.8	79.5	79.6
Duluth, Minn.....	74.0	72.1	72.7	73.3	71.0	72.6
St. Paul, Minn.....	70.3	73.5	75.2	70.7	67.1	71.4
Jacksonville, Fla.....	71.9	69.3	70.2	68.5	63.9	68.8
Key West, Fla.....	77.1	78.7	78.9	77.2	72.2	76.8
Punta Rassa, Fla.....	72.7	73.2	74.2	73.7	69.9	72.7

It will be observed that Augusta is the point in Georgia selected for this comparison. The mean relative humidity of Thomasville, Ga., during the period of the year included in the above table was only 63.11. An examination of Dr. Kenworthy's tabular statement shows that Augusta, during the winter and spring seasons, has a mean relative humidity for the season less than any health resort in the table except Jacksonville, Fla., which has one-tenth of a degree less than Augusta. Augusta's mean relative humidity is 2.5 degrees less than Cannes and Mentone, 10.7 less than Breckenridge, Minn., 3.7 less than Duluth, Minn., 2.5 less than St. Paul, Minn., 7.9 less than Key West, Fla., and 2.8 degrees less than Punta Rassa, Fla. Now compare with these the humidity of Thomasville, which is dryer than Augusta, and we find as follows: For the same period of the year the mean relative humidity of Thomasville was 8.4 degrees less than Cannes and Mentone, 15.6 less than Breckenridge, 8.6 less than Duluth, 7.4 less than St. Paul, 4.8 less than Jacksonville, 12.8 less than Key West, and 8.7 degrees less than Punta Rassa.

The mean relative humidity of Atlanta for the five months has been, for thirteen years, 1871 to 1883 inclusive, 65.5. Therefore Atlanta's humidity was 6.9 degrees less than Cannes and Mentone, 14.1 less than Breckenridge, 7.1 less than Duluth, 5.9 less than St. Paul, 3.3 less than Jacksonville, 11.3 less than Key West, and 7.2 degrees less than Punta Rassa. Reports show that the mean relative humidity of Savannah was 70 degrees, for a period of thirteen years, 1871 to 1883 inclusive, for the five months, November, December, January, February and March. So that Savannah has a less mean relative humidity for the period under consideration than any of the noted health resorts quoted by Dr. Kenworthy outside of Georgia except Jacksonville, Fla., which is 1.4 degrees less than Savannah. I have attempted to obtain data as to temperature and relative humidity of Macon, Columbus, Rome, Gainesville, Marietta and other cities and towns in Georgia, but there are no signal service officers in this state except those in Augusta, Atlanta and Savannah.

ADVANTAGES IN PULMONARY DISEASES.

The data presented in this chapter conclusively demonstrate that with the exception of the mountainous regions of Georgia the prominent and characteristic features of our climate are dryness, mildness and uniformity. We are not subject to a prolonged low temperature and great and sudden atmospheric changes so characteristic of the winter climate of the northern and western states, where not infrequently the thermometer reaches from 10 to 40 degrees below zero. Occasionally a "cold snap" reaches us, but it lasts only a few days, and even at our coldest period it is far less than in the north. Zero is very rarely reached in Georgia. Snow is extremely rare in Georgia, and except in the mountainous regions it ceases to fall in a few hours, and rapidly melts before the warm sunshine. Climate has been properly designated, "one of the chief resources of restorative medicine." Sunshine as a therapeutic agent is not duly appreciated. In the winter season particularly sunshine is of great service to the pulmonary invalid, and those predisposed to various other constitutional maladies. In the extremely variable and extremely cold climate of the north and northwest, individuals affected with pulmonary diseases, or predisposed to these affections, are compelled to run the risk of exposing themselves to great and sudden atmospheric changes, or remain indoors, and thus subject themselves to the deadly influence of vitiated atmosphere and want of exercise, while in a dry, mild, equable climate, like ours, they could live in fresh air and sunshine, take daily moderate exercise by riding, driving, strolling, hunting, fishing, etc. While some few climatologists believe otherwise the overwhelming majority of the ablest clinicians and climatologists contend that a temperate, dry, sunny climate is essential to the best treatment of pulmonary affections, and statistics show that this class of diseases is vastly more rare in such climate than in a cold, damp, variable one.

Dr. J. H. Bennett in his Treatise on Pulmonary Consumption, says: "According to the Register General's Reports of the British Isles, and the mortality register all over the world, the healthiest winters are those that have the highest temperatures. The years of greatest mortality are those in which extremes of cold in the winter are reached. In temperate climates the deadliest seasons are those of greatest cold. Extreme heat and extreme cold not only interfere with the equilibrium of functional activity, throwing a strain on some of the vital functions of animal life to their serious risk and danger, but necessitates modes of existence detrimental to the healthy performance of these functions. Thus in very cold climates such as St. Moritz, in the Engadine, and St. Paul in Minnesota, United States, which have been recommended of late for phthisis in winter as well as summer, invalids have to live in winter for by far the greater part of the twenty-four hours in badly-ventilated rooms. When they go out they have to undergo the transition to a temperature 30 or 40, or even more, degrees less than that in which they live during the greater part of the twenty-four hours. Such confinement, such transitions, even much less marked ones, constantly give rise in all northern countries in winter, to inflammatory affections of the mucous membranes of the air passages, to pneumonia and pleurisy, and that in the healthiest members of the community. If it be so with the healthy, how can we expect those to resist such influences who are already diseased, who have morbid deposits, inflammatory, catarrhal, scrofulous, tubercular in their lungs, softened or not? How can those who have already local pneumonias, local pleurisies, expect to withstand their pernicious influences? Moreover, they do not live in the pure air they ascend to reach, but in an atmosphere vitiated by stove heating, by their own respiration, and by that of their companions."

CLIMATOLOGICAL DISTRIBUTION OF PULMONARY DISEASES.

No fact is better established in medicine than that pulmonary diseases are vastly more prevalent in cold, changeable climates than in temperate, equable ones. This fact is proven by every book of mortuary statistics in America. Blodgett, in his magnificent work on Climatology of the United States, gives the following table, showing the climatological distribution of pulmonary diseases in America:

An examination of this table shows the ratio of deaths from consumption to total mortality was less in Georgia than in any state in the Union. This table also shows that there is a progressive decrease in pulmonary consumption from Maine to Georgia.

Dr. Huntington Richards, the writer on climatology in the Reference Hand Book of the Medical Sciences, Vol. 1, page 443, says: "The following figures deducted by calculation from the statistics of the United States census for 1880, and showing the deaths attributed to consumption which occurred in every 10,000 of population, during the census year, are herewith presented to the reader: Maine, 28.18; Vermont, 24.46; Massachusetts, 29.20; Rhode Island, 24.98; New York, 25.29; New Hampshire, 24.95; New Jersey, 23.25; Connecticut, 22.67; Pennsylvania, 18.85; Georgia, 11.14.

GEORGIA'S MILD CLIMATE.

Dr. T. S. Hopkins, a distinguished physician of Thomasville, Ga., says: "Having for many years in my travels through this section of the country noticed the almost entire absence of consumption among the people, I addressed letters to a large number of physicians practicing in the district, asking them to report to me the number of cases of consumption coming to their knowledge during the previous years. I received replies from twenty engaged in active practice, and representing a population of 50,887. The total number of cases reported was three. I have no reason to doubt the honesty of this report. In the midst of this immense pine forest is situated the town of Thomasville, Thomas Co., Ga., two hundred miles from the Atlantic, and sixty miles from the gulf of Mexico. Thus situated, its immunity from the baneful influence of the sea winds is secured. They can reach us only after having traveled over hundreds of miles of pine forest, by which they have been sifted of all saline vapor and moisture, and are consequently innocuous. The town has an altitude of 365 feet above the sea. Its natural drainage is almost perfect, and art has supplied any deficiency. The soil is sandy, and the water pure freestone. There is no body of water within eighteen miles, and the nearest river is about four miles distant."

Dr. Alfred Loomis, of New York, one of the most renowned medical practitioners and climatologists in the world, on pages 234-5 Loomis' Practical Medicine says: "My favorite resorts in the winter, for those recovering from acute pulmonary diseases, are: Aiken, S. C., Palatka, Enterprise and Gainesville, Fla., Thomasville, Ga., and Nassau. Southern California, South Carolina and Georgia have a dry, warm atmosphere."

Dr. H. A. Johnson, of Chicago, said before the International Medical congress, 1876: "I had about fifty patients last winter in Florida and Georgia, and they came back better; even those in whose lungs cavities existed were better than they would have been had they staid in Illinois."

Copeland's Medical Dictionary, 1855, says: "For some years past we have been in the habit of sending such pulmonary cases, as we supposed would be benefited by a northern climate, into the interior of Florida and Georgia, in the pine region, where the dry air, and the mild, uniform temperature in connection with the aroma of the pine, seemed to exert a highly favorable influence. In our judgment the climate of no part of the West Indies can compare, in point of salubrity in such cases, with the above mentioned."

Dr. L. A. Dugas, of Augusta, Ga., one of the highest authorities in American medicine, writing on this subject in 1865 said: "It seems to me that the best test of the influence of climate upon the development of tuberculosis must be found in the relative frequency of such cases among the natives of this and other sections who remain at home. Judged by this standard, it will be readily ascertained that, while phthisis pulmonalis is very common in northern states among the natives, it is quite rare among our own people. I know of but very few native families in Augusta who have ever suffered from consumption, and these have lost only one or two members by it. I doubt that there are exceeding ten families who have been thus partially affected within my recollection. Again, if we confine our observation alone to those who have emigrated from the north of the United States and from Europe, it will be found that, although many bear with them the hereditary taint, comparatively few will experience its fatal development. The conclusion is, therefore, irresistibly forced upon us that this climate does exert a most beneficial influence over this class of affections."

Dr. W. H. White, formerly surgeon of the First Iowa volunteers, and for years after the war a resident of Atlanta, said of the climate of north Georgia: "The atmosphere is invigorating, and not subject to marked, unexpected changes, as will be seen by the meteorological table, taken from the official records of the military post at Atlanta. It will be observed that our coldest day in 1873 was fifteen above zero, in 1874, twelve above, and in 1875, four, making our mean winter weather about forty-five above zero; the mean heat of summer about seventy-five above, which is an average of from ten to fourteen degrees less than that of the middle and western states; while our atmospheric changes at all seasons are more gradual and less extreme. Having passed my early life in New York, practicing my profession in the northwest for fourteen years, and being stationed in and having passed over most of the south during the war, I have had opportunities of experiencing and observing the climatic effects of the several portions of the United States rarely enjoyed. My conclusion is that the climate of north Georgia, taking all seasons together, is the finest in America; and this is the opinion of all intelligent travelers I have ever met. I have found that pleurisy, pneumonia, catarrh, and all affections of the respiratory organs are rare here, as compared with those generally met with in the north and west; so with epidemic and typhoid forms of fever. I have also found that persons coming from those sections suffering from any weakness of the lungs, or catarrh, or a tendency to consumption, or suffering general nervous prostration, be the cause what it may, are almost certain to be benefited—yes, get well—by coming to this region of country. As illustrative of this fact, there are hundreds of old citizens and old persons in north Georgia enjoying, and who have enjoyed, good health, who came here years ago as a last resort, and they were believed by their friends to be consumptive. I can but think that these marvelously pleasant results are owing, in part, to the vast number of mineral springs which are everywhere to be found in upper Georgia. We have long been satisfied, and we believe results warrant us in saying, this section of country is far better for invalids than that of Florida, as it is less liable to sudden changes, free from unpleasant, depressing ocean and gulf breezes, loaded, as they are, with the chloride of sodium absorbed from the salt waters and miasma of its vast swampy bottoms and marshes; and, above all, there is constant want of a bracing, strength-giving atmosphere.”

SUMMERVILLE, RICHMOND COUNTY.

The village of Summerville, adjoining the western border of Augusta, is on the same “sand hills” ridge that Aiken, S. C., seventeen miles distant, is located. Its elevation above Augusta is 298 feet. Elevation above sea level is 463 feet. The healthfulness of Summerville is such that for 100 years it has been called “Mount Salubrity.” Dr. S. E. Habersham says of Summerville: “This plateau is, properly speaking, the true summit of the hills in this state, being the highest point attained by it, and upon its eastern terminus is situated a portion of the village, including the United States arsenal and grounds. The general slope of this plateau is to the south and east; the sandy nature of the soil, with the pine and oak growth (black jack), makes it extremely dry and well adapted for those pulmonary sufferers who require a very dry climate and low dew point; while the sides of the ridge being nearer the valley are better adapted to those for whom a semi-humid atmosphere is necessary. This condition can be increased or diminished by approaching to or receding from the valley, which fact makes the village of Summerville more suitable as a residence for the pulmonary sufferer than any locality I am aware of, since it is well known that though the great proportion of phthisical patients require a dry climate, yet there are occasionally those who are benefited by a comparatively humid atmosphere. This is particularly the case with asthmatic patients, who, in the great majority of cases, are benefited by residing here. As this peculiarity of constitution can only be determined by actual experiment we have, in the close proximity of these two hygometrical conditions, an easy and convenient means of determining the fact.

Summerville was originally designed to be simply a summer resort, by the wealthy citizens of Augusta, when that city was less healthy than it now is, but its air was found to be so healthful and bracing in winter, that they eventually made it their permanent abode, and now the population may be estimated at 800 inhabitants. It is regularly laid out in broad streets, lined with handsome elms and other shade trees, the houses being built in large enclosures, ornamented with shrubbery and flowers. It is not uncommon to see the camelia japonica in full bloom in the months of January and February, while the different azaleas are out in the early part of April. The salubrity of the climate is unquestioned. As an evidence of its healthfulness but fourteen deaths have occurred in this place during the four years 1864 to 1867. As far as I have been able to ascertain six of the persons were over three score and ten, viz.: One aged 102 years, one 94, one 84, one 75, 72 and 70 respectively. Two from accident, one from infant croup, two from congestive fever, contracted elsewhere and neglected, one from pneumonia, contracted elsewhere and neglected; one from congestion of the brain, one ascites, one tuberculous phthisis, developed elsewhere. During the prevalence of that fatal epidemic, the yellow fever of 1854, which infested our coast towns and even penetrated to villages which had before escaped its ravages, it finally made its appearance in the city of Augusta. Although an easterly wind prevailed for sixty days, before and during the epidemic, and consequently blowing directly to the hill across the city, there is no reason to suppose the atmosphere of Summerville was at all contaminated with the poison of this pernicious fever, as no case occurred here other than those contracted in the city, or by close confinement with those cases which were developed in the village. The residence of Col. John Milledge, which stands upon the most prominent situation due west of Augusta, and nearer to the city than any other in the village, was crowded with refugees from Savannah and Augusta who, including their servants and the family, numbered about sixty persons, yet among these not a single case of sickness of any kind occurred.

The same exemption from causes of disease claimed for other portions of this region applies to this village, and though malarial fevers exist in the valley and close upon its borders to some extent, yet the hill proper, upon which most of the village stands, is entirely exempt from this influence, being in every respect as healthful as Aiken, Columbia and Camden, in South Carolina, and Belair, Berzelia, Bath, and other sand hill villages in this state. To the lovers of the picturesque, the views from the various prominent points of the village are beautiful in the extreme, and so distant is the horizon as to require very little exercise of the imagination to fancy the wide expanse of the ocean spread out before the eye, while the broad valley upon which stands the city of Augusta, bounded by undulating hills, gives a charm and variety to the landscape seldom found even in mountain scenery. This village, being connected with the beautiful and growing city of Augusta, by a street railroad, the cars of which run at frequent and regular intervals between the two places, the time occupied being about thirty minutes, affords the residents of Summerville all the advantages of the city market, together with the quiet and beauty of a suburban residence. A good turnpike also offers inducements for pleasant drives to those who keep their equipages. To the pedestrian the fragrant pine woods in close proximity to the village not only afford protection from the winds, but also opportunities of agreeable recreation and healthful exercise. These advantages in connection with others which will readily suggest themselves, make this a most desirable residence for those who may wish to avail themselves of the remedial influences of the climate, as presented for their consideration in the preceding pages.

The meteorological register kept by the United States arsenal at Summerville for twenty years—1849 to 1869—daily thermometric observations at the hours of sunrise; 9 o'clock a. m.; 3 o'clock p. m., and 9 o'clock p. m. show the mean average temperature as follows: January, 46.7 degrees; February, 50.7; March, 58.8; April, 65.1; May, 72.2; June, 80.9; August, 79.7; September, 72.8; October, 63.5; November, 53.8; December, 46.3. Mean temperature of spring, 65.3; summer, 79.9; autumn, 63.4; winter, 47.9, Fahrenheit. The mean annual rainfall for the period of twenty years was 37.17 inches. Spring, 10.16 inches; summer, 14.14 inches; autumn, 6.95 inches; winter, 5.92 inches. Mean number fair days per year, 238; cloudy days, 70; snow about two days to every three years. Prevailing winds—Spring, northwest and southwest; summer, south and southwest, varying to south; autumn, north, northwest and southwest; winter, south, southwest, west, northwest and north. Unfortunately the meteorological register fails to show the atmospheric humidity of Summerville. Inasmuch as Summerville is located upon the same sand ridge as Aiken, I am satisfied that the humidity is practically the same if not identical in both places."

CLIMATIC TREATMENT OF PULMONARY TUBERCULOSIS.

Fashion has held high court in climatic treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis. Thirty years ago a warm, moist climate was regarded as best suited to this class of patients. Experience having demonstrated the fallacy of this opinion, the profession went to the other extreme and sent their patients to the frigid climate of Canada and Minnesota. This was found baneful and after the advent of listerism came the idea that altitude was the important factor in climatic treatment of phthisis. Investigators demonstrated that while the atmosphere of some cities contains 5,500 germs to every cubic meter, the number of germs constantly decreased with altitude until when 13,000 feet was attained no germs could be detected in the atmosphere. Then temperature, humidity, etc., were no longer considered in estimating the suitability of climate to pulmonary diseases, the sole question was altitude sufficient to insure freedom from disease germs. Altitude was everything in the climato-therapy of these affections. The profession accepted the theory and for years adopted it. The claim was boldly made that the dwellers on high mountains were free from pulmonary phthisis. Kutchinmeister showed that these mountaineers lost their immunity immediately that they exchanged a pastoral life for that of the workshop, as had been found to be the case in the Erz and Riesen Gebirge. Dr. German See combating the altitude theory said: "The best proof that altitude exercises only a questionable influence is that among the inhabitants of elevated regions, when crowded together in confined localities, as is the case in workshops like those at Joux and Chaux-de-Fond, in the Swiss Jura, at an elevation of 3,609 feet, one finds as many consumptives as in the city of Berlin." Investigation also discloses the fact that consumption was as rare at Madras, a seaport town, and in the Kirghiz steppes, which are below the sea level, as among the inhabitants of certain elevated regions. Several of the advocates of altitude in climato-therapy of pulmonary tuberculosis at the present day are among the ablest men of the profession of medicine. A greater number of the profession, however, contend that the beneficial effect of climato-therapy is dependent upon purity of atmosphere—not upon altitude. I believe with Loomis that high altitude of itself is not of the slightest importance in the climato-therapy of pulmonary phthisis; yet, if it really be an important factor, Georgia offers abundant facilities in this respect, in the mountainous regions of Towns, Rabun, Habersham, Fannin, Pickens, White and Lumpkin counties. If a warm, moist atmosphere be deemed serviceable in pulmonary affections it can be found in abundance in the low-lying sections of the state near the seacoast. If sea air be wanted it is to be had on the islands and in seacoast cities of Georgia. If a markedly dry, pure atmosphere be the desideratum, it exists in great abundance at Atlanta, at Thomasville, and at Summerville and Grovetown adjacent to Augusta, and in the thousands and ten thousands of acres of land in the pine-woods region of this state. The Sand Hill region of South Carolina and Georgia extends through the central portions of the two states. It begins in Chesterfield county, S. C., running in a southwestern direction until it reaches the Savannah river at the western side of Augusta. On the Georgia side it re-appears at the "Sand Hills," known as Summerville, a suburb of Augusta, extends through Georgia, and terminates in its southwestern border. The average width of this tract of Sand Hill region in South Carolina and Georgia is twenty miles. The maximum elevation is at Aiken, S. C., 565 feet above the sea level, and at Summerville, adjoining the western border of Augusta, 463 feet above the sea level. This sand hill region lies between the primary and tertiary regions, distinctly separating them. The soil of this region, as implied by its name, is made of fine, loose sand. It is known as the "pine barrens," because of the poverty of the soil in its natural condition for agricultural purposes. The sub-soil is extremely porous. The writer has repeatedly witnessed the following demonstration of porosity of the sub-soil of Summerville. At the residence of Mr. ———, a barrel with both ends knocked out was sunk in the ground so that the top of the barrel was a few inches below the surface of the ground. The excavation after receiving the barrel was then filled with brick-bats. The gutter, three inches in diameter, conveying the storm water from the roof of one-half of this large dwelling house, discharges directly over this barrel filled with brick. I have seen this solid stream of water three inches in diameter discharged into this pit for an hour or more, and so porous is the sand beneath I have never seen it overflow. I do not know the depth of the sand, but the fact above cited shows that it must extend many feet beneath the surface. Another evidence of the porosity of the soil is the fact that in this sand hill region water is rarely found nearer than eighty feet from the surface, and not infrequently it is 150 feet. The porosity of the soil is such that within a few hours after a heavy rain the ground is so free from dampness that one who had not known that it had rained heavily would scarcely believe it. Within a few hours after the heaviest rains in the winter season invalids can take outdoor exercise with perfect impunity. The sand hill section, or as it is sometimes called, "the hilly pine region of Georgia," is covered with pine forests of long-leaved or yellow pine (pinus Australis) and Black Jack (Quercus Nigra), a small-sized oak. The exact influence which pine forests exert in pulmonary affections is unknown. By some observers it is claimed that these trees, by generating ozone or per-oxide of hydrogen, add to the purity of the atmosphere. Elliott and Storer, in their book on organic chemistry, say: "the disinfecting power of ozone produced by the action of the atmosphere on turpentine is interesting in connection with the observed facts that ozone is abundant in the air of pine forests where turpentine abounds, and that pine forests are remarkably free from malaria." Be the explanation of the beneficial effects of pine forests on pulmonary affections what it may, the fact remains that this class of invalids are impressed from personal experience that the terebinthinate exhalations of pine forests is beneficial to them, we are, therefore, justified in claiming that extensive pine forests add markedly to the climate of a locality. Extensive pine forests not only protect a locality against winds, but it is a fact that the atmosphere thereof is warmer than one of oak and other trees. Weber cites, in substantiation of this proposition, the fact that he has often known tender exotics growing in a forest of firs to remain uninjured by the severe cold of winter when those in the more open situations in the same neighborhood were killed. Again, humidity is markedly less in a forest of pine trees, whose foliage is more dense. Forests also show absence of dust, which is so injurious to patients with pulmonary complaints.

EPIDEMICS AND ENDEMIC DISEASES.

Dengue has prevailed as a general epidemic in the more populous communities of the state in 1850 and 1880. While in the larger cities probably three-fourths of the inhabitants were attacked, it is doubtful if the mortality from both epidemics reached fifty. Smallpox has occasionally been imported into Georgia, and prevailed as an epidemic in various counties, but only once, 1865-66, did it prevail as an epidemic over a large part of the state. This resulted from being scattered from place to place by the Confederate and Federal armies. With the exception of the epidemic, 1865-66, the mortality from smallpox has been markedly light, inasmuch as it is one of the most manageable of diseases. It is readily jugulated by isolation of the sick, and disinfection of all the infected materials, together with vaccination of the public. Citizens are afraid of smallpox, and readily co-operate with the authorities in efforts to stamp it out. Measles, contrary to the public idea, is a disease attended by a large mortality. Few diseases show a larger mortality than measles. Not that the deaths per 1,000 cases are as numerous as in smallpox, scarlet fever, diphtheria, etc., but because the public regard it as a non-fatal affection, and make no effort to escape it. As a consequence an epidemic of measles generally attacks an entire community, the people seeming to force their children to take it by exposing them to it, under the idea that children stand the disease better than adults. No greater mistake has ever been made, for the mortuary statistics of every community demonstrate that but few diseases show a larger number of deaths than measles. The census of 1880 shows that it caused 496 deaths in Georgia. The census of 1890 shows 440 deaths from measles. These figures by no means represent the actual number of deaths from the disease. If the deaths from dropsy, diarrhoea, pneumonia, etc., directly caused by measles were added to the list it would show a mortality fully double that appearing in mortuary statistics as resulting from this malady. When it is remembered that almost the entire mortality from measles is confined to the helpless, innocent children, and that it is a wholly preventable disease, the responsibility for this slaughter of the innocents rests upon parents and the state. This shameful state of affairs will continue until public instruction and sanitary administration puts a stop to it.

Scarlet fever, although frequently prevailing as an epidemic over many of the northern and western states, has never, so far as I can ascertain, prevailed as an epidemic over this state. Occasionally the disease is imported into one or more of our populous communities and becomes epidemic, yet the total mortality is extremely light. In proof of this statement I cite the mortality record of the three principal cities in Georgia: Augusta, 1880 to 1892 inclusive, deaths from scarlet fever, 19; Atlanta, 49; Savannah, 23. The population of these three cities is largely over 150,000. Total mortality for Georgia in 1880 from scarlet fever was 31, and in 1890 was 8.

Diphtheria is rarely met with as an epidemic except in the larger cities, and never as widespread and fatal as in cities of similar population in the north and west. Atlanta, with an estimated population of 75,000 shows a freedom from epidemics of diphtheria which is truly surprising. I have compiled the following table from the annual reports of the boards of health of Augusta, Atlanta and Savannah, showing the mortality from diphtheria for the 13 years, 1880 to 1892 inclusive.

Augusta	9	12	9	4	5	1	3	5	11	5	2	10	10
Atlanta	5	2	8	6	1	3	5	4	1	7	4	14	7
Savannah	20	48	15	44	27	15	6	7	6	6	6	12	19

Total mortality from diphtheria for the state, U. S. census 1880, 588; census 1890, mortality from diphtheria and croup in Georgia, 553.

Typhoid fever.—According to the U. S. census of 1880 the mortality from typhoid fever in the state was 986; census of 1890, mortality from typhoid fever, 1,000. In the latter year almost every county in the state is represented in the mortuary record from typhoid fever. The board of health reports from Augusta, Atlanta and Savannah show the number of deaths from this fever as follows:

City.	1880	'81	'82	'83	'84	'85	'86	'87	'88	'89	'90	'91	'92
Augusta	14	42	15	24	3	29	18	20	26	18	11	26	21
Atlanta	25	68	53	79	51	41	29	68	105	48	99	89	74

This table shows a greater ratio of typhoid fever to total mortality in Atlanta than in any city in the state.

Malarial fever in its various types is the principal endemic disease of Georgia, as it is in almost all of the southern states, and several of the northwestern and western ones. The census of 1880 places the mortality from malarial fevers in this state at 1,060. The mortality from this class of fevers in 1890 was, according to the U. S. census, 937, which is one death from malarial fever to every 1,960 of the population of the state. This is the ratio for the entire state. It varies markedly in the various counties. In some of the counties in the swamp regions the mortality from malaria reached 1 to every 422 of the population. In other counties, particularly in the sand hill region and the mountains, the mortality is as low as 1 to every 15,186, while in other counties not a death is reported from malarial fever in 1880. Malaria is readily exterminated by thorough surface and sub-soil drainage. This disease was once as prevalent in England as it is in America, but it has been almost wholly banished by thorough drainage. It is marvelous that counties in Georgia will annually suffer malarial fever to kill from 1 to every 500 to 1,000 of the population yet make no effort to destroy this monster. All types of malarial fever, intermittent, remittent, congestive, and hemorrhagic are encountered in our state. The latter, commonly called hemorrhagic malarial fever, occurs only in the most intensely malarial regions. By some writers it is claimed that hemorrhagic malarial fever is a disease first making its appearance in the south after the war, 1865. This, however, is a mistake. Dr. Joseph Jones, of New Orleans, Louisiana, in his work on fevers, published in 1887, page 578, says: "As far as my individual experience extends, on the coast of Georgia, in 1848, cases presenting all the marked characteristics of malarial hæmaturia, which proved rapidly fatal, occurred in the months of September and October." It would be instructive to examine the various endemic diseases of Georgia in detail, but the limits of this paper forbids. The following table, from the U. S. census, showing the principal diseases occurring in Georgia in 1880, fairly represents the diseases occurring annually in our state—the number of cases of each disease varying, of course, with different years. (I have already commented on consumption and acute lung diseases.)

Smallpox, 2; measles, 496; scarlet fever, 31; diphtheria, 588; whooping cough, 650; fever, 281; cerebro spinal fever, 30; typhoid fever, 986; diarrhoea, 350; dysentery, 543; cholera infantum, 585; malarial fever, 1,060; erysipelas, 60; septicaemia, 14; septicaemia puerperal, 134; rheumatism, 35; consumption, 1,707; hydrocephalus, 48; dropsy, 871. HISTORY OF YELLOW FEVER IN GEORGIA.

Saint Mary's, Camden Co., Ga., was invaded by yellow fever the first and the only time in 1808. The summer season was unusually rainy, causing stagnant pools of water to be formed about the town, and the water in the wells became offensive to smell and taste. Yet the health of the population was as good as usual until Sept. 5, when the schooner "Polly" arrived from Savannah with two men sick with yellow fever. These were allowed to be landed from the schooner and conveyed to a house in the center of the town. Both patients died. Two men who nursed the cases died, one on Sept. 9, the other on Sept. 10. Next every member of the household developed yellow fever, and from this focus the disease spread over the town. The total mortality was eighty-four. The total number of cases is not known. The epidemic extended from Sept. 5 into the month of October. I cannot obtain the exact date of cessation.

The first epidemic of yellow fever in Savannah was that of 1820. The record shows that quasi epidemics occurred in 1807, 1808, 1817, 1818, and 1819, but in neither of these years did the disease reach epidemic proportions. Dr. P. M. Kollock, of Savannah, a believer in the local origin theory, in 1857 wrote the following account of the early history of the disease in Savannah: "The yellow fever was but little known until after the war of 1812. It was not until the winter of 1816 that foreign shipping began to resort to Savannah, and the next summer the harbor was crowded, no care to time the arrivals to the healthy months, and the seamen were strangers entirely unacclimated. In the month of August the yellow fever broke out. It was confined to the seamen, and continued until the shipping departed. There were not many cases. During 1818 there were but few arrivals, and all (the shipping) had left port before summer had fairly set in, and there was but little sickness. In the year 1819 many ships arrived, bringing many strangers, totally unused to the climate and unacquainted with the disease to which they were exposed. Early in autumn the yellow fever commenced its ravages, and in less than a month the whole number of passengers who had been brought by one ship had fallen victims; the disease continued until cold weather and was confined entirely to strangers."

The epidemic of 1820 began in May. The mortality for each month was as follows: May, 3; June, 14; July, 39; August, 111; September, 214; October, 196; November, 10; December, 3; total deaths from yellow fever from May 7 to December, 590. The mortality resulting from this epidemic has scarcely ever been equaled by any epidemic of yellow fever known to medical history. Dr. William R. Waring, in his official report to the city council of Savannah, in 1820, says: "The population, therefore, of white inhabitants remaining in the city during the whole season may be fairly estimated at 3,000, which would constitute a mortality of one in five." This mortality is calculated upon the number of the white population remaining in Savannah during the epidemic, and the deaths from yellow fever among the whites. While yellow fever is contracted by the negro population in equal proportion with the whites, yet the history of American medicine clearly demonstrates that yellow fever among the negro population is practically a non-fatal disease.

What was the source of this epidemic? Dr. Waring in his report says: "It was said by some individuals to have been brought from the coast of Africa, in a brig called "Raminez," which had on board a cargo of new negroes. Unfortunately, however, for this hypothesis, the "Raminez" did not only arrive with a healthy crew and an entire freedom from any malignant disease, but she arrived some time after the fever had grown into considerable extent and severity. I have already stated that some rapid and insidious cases occurred in June, and that fourteen deaths took place in that month. I have stated that Mr. Patrick Stanton even died of black vomit on July 16. The "Raminez" came into port on July 22.

It was not, and could not be an African disease. From May 23 to July 20 there came five vessels from the West Indies and one from New Orleans. I have not been able to learn of any others. On May 23 the brig "Rover," Capt. James, from Havana; on June 2 the schooner "Phantom," Havana, and on June 13 the schooner "Charles," New Orleans; on June 24 the sloop "Darien," St. Domingo; on June 27 the schooner "Isabella," Matanzas, and on July 20 a vessel to Green & Lippit from St. Domingo. It appears from inquiry as to the state of these vessels that the crews were healthy and there was nothing in relation to them which could authorize a belief of their having either severe disease on board, or the power of propagating any disease whatever." Here we find what has been found in every epidemic of yellow fever in every seaport in Georgia, without a single exception to the present day, i. e., immediately previous to the appearance of yellow fever in Savannah vessels arrived at the wharves of that city from infected ports—in this instance from the West Indies, the habitat of yellow fever, where this disease is always in existence. Because no one was known to have yellow fever on board of these vessels from infected ports it was accepted as proof positive that these vessels and their contents were necessarily free from infection, and also free of power to infect the city of Savannah. The fallacy of this position is now admitted by every learned sanitarian in America. It has been indisputably proven by scores upon scores of instances that every member of a crew may be immune by reason of having previously had yellow fever, yet the vessel and textile fabrics may be literally full of yellow fever germs. In 1827 and 1828 there were a few cases of yellow fever among the residents of Savannah, but in neither year did the disease assume epidemic proportions. The next epidemic of yellow fever in Savannah was that of 1854. It has been stated that the disease was epidemic in Savannah in 1839. But this is a mistake. There were a few cases among the inhabitants, and as the citizens feared an epidemic, many of them fled the city, but it did not assume epidemic proportions.

What was the source of these cases of yellow fever in 1839 among the residents of Savannah? Importation. From whence? Both Augusta and Charleston. Dr. R. D. Arnold, who stoutly adhered to the local origin theory, says: "From 1830 to 1839 I never saw a case of yellow fever in the city. For fifteen consecutive summers I was the attending physician of the city hospital, whither the worst cases of our ordinary climate fevers were conveyed. In 1839 the city of Augusta was ravaged by this scourge; it was denied at the time that yellow fever prevailed there. In the last of August a patient fresh from Augusta entered the city hospital and died in a couple of days. The diagnosis was verified by post-mortem examination. A short time afterward a patient from Charleston entered and died of yellow fever, also verified by post-mortem section. These cases were placed in the wards filled with bilious fever patients. There was no propagation. Later in the season I did meet with several cases of yellow fever, but they were so few in number that I did not consider them as entitled to be considered epidemic. They were isolated, occurred in different parts of the city, and had not the slightest connection with the cases of the hospital." Here then are two separate and distinct introductions of yellow fever within a week or two from Augusta and Charleston, into Savannah, where no case had existed from 1828 to 1839—Savannah absolutely free of yellow fever until these cases were imported. If yellow fever originated in Savannah in 1839 from local causes, is it not indeed strange that the disease appeared only after introduction of cases from Augusta and Charleston? Dr. Arnold says of the health of Savannah in 1839: "I still look back upon the year 1839 as the sickliest season I have ever experienced in Savannah, with the exception of the terrible epidemic of 1854. Old inhabitants will recollect it as the driest summer on record, when turnips were planted in the bed of the Savannah river opposite Augusta. It was also a hot summer. Bilious fever prevailed over the whole country in a malignant form. Contrary to what would seem the fact at first view, such a season was peculiarly calculated to generate the malaria, which is the generally acknowledged cause of bilious fever. It is conceded that mere moisture will not produce malaria, but mix vegetable matter with water, and subject it to heat, and the most malignant malaria will be generated. That year swamps and ponds which had been covered with water since they had been known to the white man were dried up and the vegetable debris which had been precipitating to their bottom for years and years were exposed to the action of the sun and air, and consequently decomposed and generated malaria. Now bilious fever prevailed with great violence in our city from early in July. I cannot imagine more favorable circumstances for the spread of yellow fever than accompanied the introduction of those two cases in our city."

Why did not the disease become epidemic? If local conditions could originate yellow fever in Georgia, certainly here, according to the theories of the believers in local origin, is the one time and place when the disease must of necessity have prevailed in giant proportions as to malignancy and extent. But it did not. Let the believers in the local origin theory explain it. Here, too, is a magnificent opportunity for those who claim that "malarial poison and the effects of extraordinary heat produce yellow fever" to explain why a frightful epidemic of yellow fever did not occur in Savannah in 1839. Here were both extreme heat and extreme malarial poison of the atmosphere of the entire city, yet no epidemic of yellow fever. To show the extensive prevalence and malignancy of malarial fevers in Savannah in 1839, I cite the fact that during the year there were 152 deaths from fevers in a population of 7,773. Of the epidemic of 1854, Hon. John E. Ward, then mayor of Savannah, says: "After an exemption of epidemics unknown to any other city, and the enjoyment of unexampled health for almost half a century, in the month of August last our citizens were startled with the announcement that the yellow fever had made its appearance as an epidemic. The first case of yellow fever occurred on Aug. 5 in a house situated at the southwest corner of Lincoln and Broughton streets. Regarded as merely a sporadic case it was not reported as yellow fever. Between that date and the middle of the month a few more cases occurred, but nothing to excite any alarm or create any apprehension of an epidemic among us. About that date it manifested itself in an epidemic form, and swept with a fearful desolation over our city." The mortality from this epidemic was 639,—whites 626, colored 13. The first case occurred Aug. 3, the last case Nov. 27. Mayor Ward's reports says: "The disease was exhibited in its greatest violence from Aug. 20 to Sept. 20 in the northeastern part of the city; it advanced directly to the southwest, spreading north and south until its influence was felt in every part of the city."

Causation.—On this point I quote the following from Mayor Ward's report: "One of the causes assigned was the removal of the mud in the dredging of the Savannah river, and depositing the same on the eastern wharves. I respectfully submit to you two letters, one from Lieut. John Newton, the engineer in charge of the work, and the other from Francis Cercopely, the superintendent of the same, which, clearly establishing the fact that the mud was not placed on the eastern wharves, or in any manner exposed to the atmosphere, destroys the theory of those who had traced the existence of the fever to that cause.

"Another cause assigned has been the condition of the rice lands in the immediate vicinity of our city. These lands at the time of the commencement of the fever, and during its greatest violence were in good order and never healthier. Vegetation was not decaying, and there was no adequate cause for the disease to be found in them. After the banks had been broken by the storm—with vegetation decaying, the lands overflowed, and everything tending to increase the disease if it had originated from that source—it commenced to decrease, and before the middle of October, without frost or any other agency to which we had looked for its removal, it ceased to exist among us as an epidemic.”

It was ascertained that the disease was introduced into Savannah by the Danish brig “Charlotte Hague”—three patients with yellow fever having been taken from this vessel and placed in a hospital in the city. In response to an official request of Mayor Ward, Dr. Mackall, the health officer, and Dr. Wragg submitted the following statement: “On June 30 last I was called to visit a vessel at Tybee reported as having sickness on board. I answered the call. Before reaching the vessel (which proved to be the Danish brig ‘Charlotte Hague,’ Capt. Buck), I found the captain and one seaman requiring medical services. The captain, however, had no fever and was evidently recovering from a mild attack of remittent fever, at least such was my opinion. The seaman I found sick with bilious remittent fever. I prescribed for my patients and returned to the city, reporting them to you in accordance with the above facts. On July 2 I was again called on a visit to the ‘Charlotte Hague.’ The captain met me on deck—the seaman was also on deck, and much better. Another seaman was called to me for examination (a similar case). I prescribed for them. Seeing that those patients would probably require more medical attention (which at Tybee was onerously expensive to the owners) I gave the captain permission to bring his sick to the city; this he did the following day (July 3) and entered with them into the Savannah infirmary, where I visited them in connection with my partner, Dr. J. A. Wragg, until July 5, on which day, being compelled to leave for the north on account of my own health, Dr. W. A. Chartres took my place and continued to visit them with Wragg. I have only to add that the symptoms these cases exhibited up to the time I left them, differed in no respect from a number of other cases of remittent fever under treatment in the infirmary at the same time, and showed no symptoms of yellow fever.—R. A. Mackall.” The statement of Dr. Wragg is: “The Danish brig ‘Charlotte Hague’ put into Cockspur roads about June 29 or 30, 1854, and was visited on June 30 by the port physician. On July 3 two of the seamen were brought to the Savannah infirmary, where they remained until July 7, and were discharged cured. They had not the least symptom of yellow fever. The captain was also admitted to the infirmary and discharged cured. He had not the least symptom of yellow fever. On July 7 they returned to the brig and she went to sea. The brig never came up to the city and the men brought up nothing but the clothing they had on.—John Ashby Wragg.”

Dr. Hume of Charleston, S. C., in the “Charleston Medical Journal and Review,” January, 1855, gives additional facts as to the part the “Charlotte Hague” played in introducing yellow fever into Savannah in 1854. He says: “We have obtained the following narrative of the introduction of yellow fever into Savannah in 1854 from Capt. King, commander of the Savannah pilot boat ‘John R. Wilder.’ On July 29, 1854, while cruising off Tybee, he fell in with the Bremen brig ‘Charlotte Hague,’ from Havana, in distress, with the captain and two of the crew sick with fever. He took the brig into Cockspur inlet. On the next day, the health officer, Dr. Mackall, visited the vessel. Finding it inconvenient to repeat his visits as often as necessary, he determined to carry the sick to Savannah, which he did on Aug. 3, and placed them in a private hospital in East Broad street. Capt. King never heard whether they lived or died, after their arrival in the city.

The sick were seen also by Dr. Caruthers. It is scarcely necessary to remind our readers that East Broad street was the first locality reported by the board of health of Savannah as infected with the disease; and from what we have observed from the behavior of the disease in Charleston, there is no reason to doubt that if introduced as related above, its progress would have been such as described by the Savannah papers, and exactly similar to what occurred in Charleston. There is no reason to apprehend that the narration of Capt. King is untrue. It contains nothing injurious to the character of anyone, and also saves Savannah from the imputation of being the unnatural mother who destroys her own children. Capt. King was one of the few engaged in the transaction, and the general impression so engrafted in the minds of the inhabitants of all the southern cities that yellow fever is indigenous to all, and that foreign importation is impossible, is a sufficient acquittal of Dr. Mackall of any part he may have acted, in providing a comfortable accommodation for the seamen of the distressed vessel under his charge. Capt. King has proved himself worthy of the highest commendation; he has seen his error, has confessed his sin, such as it was, and deserves forgiveness for the dreadful calamity he helped to inflict upon his cherished city. May the citizens profit by his confession, and prepare an appropriate place for the reception of sick seamen beyond the limits of the city, especially such as trade from the Havana to northern ports."

Here is the positive evidence of a vessel arriving on June 29 or July (Drs. Mackall and Hume differ as to date of arrival of the sick seamen), from the infected port of Havana, and sending three of her crew into the section of the city first infected. All the facts point to yellow fever as the disease prostrating the three members of the crew of the "Charlotte Hague." Drs. Mackall and Wragg, diagnosed their disease as remittent fever, but no proposition in medicine is better established than that mild cases of yellow fever—which are by no means infrequent even in this day—are very likely to be mistaken for remittent fever even by an expert. Dr. Arnold, a yellow fever veteran, said: "I do not deny that when no suspicion is aroused the first notice the physician has that he is treating a case of yellow fever, is the appearance of fatal black vomit. Nor must it be supposed that all cases of genuine yellow fever appeared in one stereotyped edition. There was every variety of grade and intensity, from the ephemeral attack of twelve hours of fever, followed by speedy convalescence, to the more prolonged paroxysm of seventy-two hours, ushering in a malignant or fatal case. Yellow fever is essentially a fever of one paroxysm; but that paroxysm is of very unequal duration. If the access of fever should not be marked, it could not be distinguished at first." All of the facts justify the conclusion that these three patients were ill with yellow fever when they were landed in Savannah, and also that they introduced the disease into the city. If it be objected that these three seamen with only the clothing they wore upon their persons were received into Savannah from the Hague, and for this reason could not have infected the city, I answer that the books are full of instances wherein towns and cities were infected under circumstances identical with that of the three seamen from the Hague infecting Savannah. I can fill a large octavo volume with the details of such occurrences. The next epidemic of yellow fever in Savannah was in 1858. I have endeavored to obtain data for a brief history of this epidemic but the effort failed. The mortuary record of Savannah discloses the fact that this epidemic caused 114 deaths.

SAVANNAH IN 1876.

The next epidemic of yellow fever in Savannah was in 1876. In the examination of the state board of health relative to the origin of the disease in Savannah in 1876, it was officially established:

*"First. That yellow fever was epidemic in Havana, Matanzas, Cienfuegos, Trinidad and Santiago de Cuba, during the months of June, July and August, 1876. That vessels directly from these infected ports did arrive at the port of Savannah immediately prior to and during the early development of the epidemic, is shown by the records obtained from the custom house authorities. The list demonstrates the fact, that in the month of July, 1876, three (3) Spanish vessels arrived at Savannah from Cuban ports, which were infected with yellow fever prior to their departure. One of these vessels discharged 100 tons of ballast at the Central railroad wharf, and her crew of fifteen men, with their mattresses, blankets and clothing, went into lodging houses in the western portion of the city. Two of these vessels discharged 190 tons of ballast at the Atlantic & Gulf railroad wharf, and their crews, consisting of twenty-four men, with their mattresses, blankets and clothing, went into the lodging house of Mrs. Redgate, which is but one square from the block first infected in the city. During the month of August, 1876, between the second and twenty-eighth of the month, four Spanish vessels arrived at Savannah from Havana, at which port, at the time of their departure, yellow fever was epidemic. One of these vessels discharged fifty tons of ballast at the Central railroad wharf, and her crew of ten men went, with their mattresses, blankets and clothing, to sailor boarding houses in the western portion of the city. Three of the vessels discharged 500 tons of ballast at the Atlantic & Gulf railroad wharf, and their crew of forty men, with their mattresses, blankets and clothing, went into sailor boarding houses in the eastern part of the city. But the inmates of these boarding houses did not take yellow fever for many days after other sections of the city were infected."

These data as to the length of time these vessels were quarantined are taken from the published report of Dr. Geo. H. Stone of the Marine hospital service. "As to the quarantine upon the Savannah river, the health officer of Savannah, testified that the quarantine station was at Tybee island, about seventeen miles below the city. Vessels from infected ports are there stopped until he can visit them, when he examines their papers, musters the crew and institutes especial inquiries as to any who may be missing. That the usual detention is ten days from port to port, if the vessel has a clean bill of health; any greater length of detention rests entirely with the health officer. At the quarantine station there is absolutely no means of enforcing sanitary orders. The crews of vessels can communicate with the city if willing to take the risk. The testimony of the health officer as to quarantine regulations is fully corroborated by that of his honor, the mayor of the city, and Dr. J. C. Habersham, who was for many years health officer of the port. Were either of these vessels infected with yellow fever, is a question which at this time assumes important proportions. The health officer testifies that the first vessel which arrived in the city to which suspicion of yellow fever was directed was the bark 'Maria.' In mustering the crew one man was missing, and it was reported that he had fallen from the masthead and been killed. Being satisfied that the statement was true, the vessel was permitted to pass up to the city. It is not stated, however, what caused the suspicion of yellow fever to be attached to the 'Maria.' The second case was of the bark 'Maria Carlina.' Again one man was missing, reported to have died of cholera morbus; one man was taken sick three days after arrival at Tybee. Of what? The health officer does not state, although he says: 'I expressed the opinion to the mayor that the man did not have the yellow fever. He afterward recovered. This vessel was thoroughly fumigated.' From the bark 'Olympia,' upon which vessel a case of yellow fever was known to have occurred, infection could have reached the city only by unauthorized communication with the vessel. The fact connected with these vessels, of interest to epidemiologists, which is at present absolute, is that they cleared from a port infected with yellow fever, and that prior to their arrival at the port of Savannah no authenticated cases of the disease had occurred in that city. The Cuban history of these vessels is absolutely unknown. They may have been infected with the disease while at anchor, before or after taking in ballast. What epidemic influences had their crews been subjected to? Were any of them convalescents from the Havana Marine hospital? It seems an absolute fact, that no case of yellow fever arrived at Savannah upon any of these vessels, unless it may be that the man taken sick at Tybee was a case of the disease; nor can this case be absolutely rejected from all consideration, although he was, upon October 9, admitted to the Marine hospital with that disease. The necessity of obtaining information as to the crews of these vessels is evident from the testimony of Mr. Angus McAlpine, who informed the board that he had been informed, when on board vessels at the Atlantic & Gulf wharf, in his official capacity as inspector of lumber, 'that the captain of the "Maria Carlina" had died at Havana of yellow fever; that the mate was also taken sick, but started for his home in Spain. The captain died on shore in Havana, the mate was sick at the Havana Marine hospital. The captain in command of the vessel on her arrival, was put in charge of her at Havana. The baggage of the first captain was on board; none was, to his knowledge, brought off the vessel.'

None of the first cases at Savannah could be traced to absolute contact with these vessels. The first case, Schull, of the schooner "Severs," was not known to have gone on board of either the "Ynez" or the "Maria," but he was taken sick after the "Severs" had been for some days at the same wharf with them. The boy Thomas Cleary positively denies that he or any of his comrades ever went on board any of these vessels. But Cleary was taken with the disease only after he had gone many times to dig among the ballast discharged from these vessels, and his comrades in this, with but few exceptions, all had the disease about the same time. Again, the locality in which the first group of yellow fever cases occurred, was the nearest block of tenements to the Atlantic & Gulf railroad wharf, and was directly in the line of communication between the city and vessels taking in cargo at that point. It is also a matter of significance that at this identical point all former epidemics of yellow fever originated. It is also demonstrated that two of these vessels discharged ballast and that their crews of twenty-five men, with mattresses, blankets and clothing, went upon shore and into boarding houses in the northwestern portion of the city. This fact certainly furnishes a clew by which the cases which occurred in that portion of the city may be traced.

The character of the ballast discharged at the Atlantic & Gulf railroad wharf is a matter of much interest. An examination of the custom house records at Savannah shows that in 1876 2,130 tons of this ballast were unloaded at the Atlantic & Gulf wharf. It has already been shown in this report that the board has taken cognizance of this view of the epidemic, and that it is fully aware of the intense malarial influences to which the inhabitants of that city are subjected. A tabular statement of the mortuary reports for six years has been presented, in which it is shown that the percentage of deaths from miasmatic disorders is very great. This becomes strikingly suggestive when it is shown that the deaths from such diseases in Savannah, with her less than 30,000 inhabitants, rival the death record from the same diseases in the city of New York with her 1,200,000 inhabitants, which she draws from all quarters of the globe.

That an epidemic of malarial disorders of an exceedingly acute grade was prevalent in the city of Savannah prior to and subsequent to the month of August, 1876, is shown by the testimony of Dr. J. C. Le Hardy and others, and the board is strongly of the opinion that to the excessive malarial charging of the atmosphere, the miserable sanitary condition of the city and its surroundings is to be attributed the intensity of the epidemic influences. But they fail to find any evidence which does away with or invalidates the circumstantial evidence in favor of the importation of the disease. Had there been no virulent outbreak of the disease at Havana, had there been no arrival of vessels open to the suspicion of infection prior to the Savannah outbreak, had the disease originated in, or during the early weeks of the epidemic shown its malignancy in those districts of the city most exposed to malarial influences there could be no decided question on the subject. But the epidemic of 1876 at Savannah can be found to differ in no essential from all other epidemics known in this country—so far as relates to its inception—since 1693. In view of all the evidence obtained, although it cannot be proved that any cases of yellow fever were carried into the city of Savannah by vessels from Cuba—while it cannot be proved that any of the early cases of the epidemic had personal contact with such vessels—still the fact remains that no cases of the disease occurred at Savannah until after the arrival of vessels open to suspicion of infection—that the outbreak of the disease did not occur at a point far removed from these vessels, but it did occur in the nearest inhabited block of the city to the wharf at which said vessels lay; and further, that the two first cases of the disease had been in the immediate vicinity of the suspected vessels.

THE EPIDEMIC AT OTHER LOCALITIES.

The Isle of Hope, ten miles below Savannah, was considered a point of refuge to the inhabitants of the city. Dr. S. F. Dupont states that at least 3,000 individuals were added to the resident population. The disease did not, at this point, occur until after the epidemic was fully established in the city. It is a fact of great significance that Bethesda school, which is situated but a short distance from the Isle of Hope, was entirely free from the disease. Dr. Wm. Duncan remarks: "If local cause gave rise to the disease at the Isle of Hope, the same cause would have given rise to it at Bethesda."

The first recognized case of yellow fever in the Savannah epidemic of 1876 was that of a man named Schull, who was admitted to the Marine hospital on July 28, from the American schooner "Severs." He had previously been treated for a fever of one paroxysm, which was followed by congestion of the lungs. When admitted to the hospital he had no fever. Previous to admission a blister had been applied to his back, the cuticle was removed, and the tissues were discolored and bleeding. On July 30, whilst sitting up in bed calm and cheerful, he was taken with sudden hemorrhage. The blood escaped from his mouth in quantities, was red and frothy, and death ensued almost immediately. Autopsy four hours after death. Skin yellow, lungs infiltrated and filled with blood, traces of incipient tubercles in lungs, ulcers on exterior surface of the same, liver of complete boxwood color. This record is taken from the official report of Dr. George H. Stone, assistant surgeon, Marine hospital service.

There is a further history of this case, which is as follows: The schooner "Severs" arrived at Savannah on July 10 with a load of ice. The ice was discharged at a wharf in the city, when the "Severs" dropped down the river to the wharf of the Atlantic & Gulf railroad company for a cargo of lumber. At the time the "Severs" was at this wharf there were two Spanish vessels, recently arrived from Havana, also taking on board lumber; these vessels were the "Ynez" and the "Maria." The "Severs" lay within a hundred yards of the vessels. While the "Severs" was receiving her cargo Schull was taken ill, was removed from the vessel, and was carried through the city to a boarding-house upon Indian street, in the extreme western portion of the city, and at no great distance from the wharf depot of the Central Railroad company, where he was treated by Dr. William Duncan, who diagnosed the case as one of congestive fever. From the house he was removed, without the knowledge of Dr. Duncan, to the Marine hospital, located in the eastern portion of the city. It will therefore be seen that this case of undoubted yellow fever was twice carried through the streets of Savannah prior to the general epidemic outbreak.

On Aug. 6 a boy named Thomas Cleary, who is about fifteen years of age, and who resides with his parents on Wright street, east of Broad, and between Bay and Broughton streets, was taken ill with what was undoubted yellow fever.

It is necessary to ask especial attention to the block into which Wright street runs; it is bounded by East Broad, Bay, Reynolds and Broughton streets. Upon the map of Savannah, published in 1868, this block is designated as "Garden." But Wright street pierces it on the west for one-half its width, while East Boundary pierces it on the north to one-third its depth. The portion of this block at the corner of Bay and Reynolds is occupied by the city gas works, while the sides of the block are occupied by small tenement houses.

Thomas Cleary was taken sick, as we have said, on Aug. 6. This sickness, as described by the boy and his mother, is as follows: "Was taken sick with pains in his bones, with yawning and stretchings, and became so weak and staggering that he had to go to bed. Had fever and great pain in front part of his head, wanted to drink all the time, had very short breath, and felt all the time as if he had to gasp to get it. When he got up he was very weak and could not walk; was very yellow all over." The fever in this case lasted ten days, during which time he was confined to his bed.

This boy states positively, and corroborates the statement under oath, that during the month of July, 1876, he, in company with several boys, named James McCarty, George Bussell, Bill Ray and George Lappin, was in the habit of going, after school hours, to the wharf of the Atlantic & Gulf railroad to look for shells and rocks amongst the ballast discharged from vessels.

Aug. 17.—James Patrick Cleary, aged 11 years, a brother of Thomas Cleary, and residing in the same house in which he had been sick, and in which he was convalescing, was taken with yellow fever. As the boy Thomas had been successfully treated without medical aid no physician was called to the case until Aug. 21, when Dr. Stone was called in. The case terminated fatally the same day. At the autopsy the surface of the body was found yellow as gold, the liver box-wood; further examination not permitted.

Aug. 18.—A mulatto boy living near the Atlantic & Gulf railroad depot was taken with yellow fever and died the same day. Reported by Dr. W. H. Elliott.

This locality is upon east Broad street, distant (according to map of the city), but three blocks from the Cleary case. Aug. 20.—Ella Scott, living on west side of Reynolds street, north of Broughton (in same block as the Clearys), had yellow fever, but recovered. The same day, the 20th, Lenia Smith, living on Reynolds street, nearly opposite to Ella Scott, took the disease, from which she died Aug. 26. Aug. 21.—Bill Ray, one of the boys who frequented the Atlantic and Gulf wharf with Thomas Cleary, and who lived on Broughton and East Boundary streets, was taken with yellow fever, but recovered. The same day John Fountain, living at the north end of East Boundary street, was taken with the same disease, but recovered. Aug. 22.—A child of John Lynch, who lived on Wright street, a few doors east of the Clearys, died of yellow fever. The same day, the 22d, Mrs. Keogh, living at the north end of East Boundary street, was attacked by the disease, and died Aug. 27. Aug. 23.—George Bussell, another of Thomas Cleary's companions, was taken ill with yellow fever, but recovered. The boy lived in East Boundary street, north of Broughton. Aug. 26.—John Lynch and Mrs. Lynch died of the same disease at the same place as that at which the case of Aug. 22 had died. The same day, 26th, Michael Delaney died in East Broad, two doors north of Broughton. Aug. 27.—Fred Lawson, living on Randolph and President streets, died. Aug. 28.—The children of Thomas Keogh, living on north side of Broughton street, west of Reynolds, are reported to have been sick with the disease—one case was fatal. The majority of these cases occurred in the practice of Dr. George H. Stone, and are reported from records obtained from his note-book; some are noted from the annual report of the mayor of Savannah in the "Morning News" of Jan. 8, 1877.

The disease spread rapidly in the immediate vicinity of this block first infested, and then appeared in, and spread from Stone street, a short street running from West Broad street between Liberty and Harris streets, on the opposite side of the city. The first of these cases occurred in the person of Mrs. Mary E. Malcomes. The same day a fatal case was reported on State street, between Whitaker and Bernard, in the person of Edward L. Drummond. It has been shown that prior to the occurrence of these cases the disease was under full epidemic headway in the northeastern portion of the city, from which locality it is simply impossible to trace any connection with those last noted, nor indeed is it considered at all necessary to do so, as the migrations of individuals and their effects cannot always be observed. It will, however, be shown hereafter that, in all human probability, a focus of infection was established in the northwestern portion of the city, as well as in the northeastern, for on Aug. 29 Dr. William Duncan reports a yellow fever death on Indian street lane. Attention is, however, asked to the case of one Lawrence Kelly, who is a foreman for the master stevedore of the city, and who resides at the corner of Joachim street and Indiana street lane. This man claims that on Aug. 11 he was taken with yellow fever after removing the ballast from the Spanish bark "Neuva Ygnacia," July 14, and the brig "Pepe" Aug. 1, at the Central railroad wharf.

YELLOW FEVER IN BRUNSWICK—1876.

The state board of health traced the origin of the epidemic of Brunswick in 1876 as follows: At almost the identical time at which the yellow fever outbreak occurred at Savannah, the same disease occurred at the port of Brunswick, Ga. The board present the evidence of Col. J. T. Collins, the collector of customs at that port, and of Dr. J. S. Blain, the health officer, in detail. He said: On the 15th of July an American schooner from Havana, with yellow fever, anchored in the sound and remained forty-eight hours. Distance, nine miles from the city. The water furnished her was by a water-boat; no assistance needed. Think she had no communication with the town. The Spanish bark "Marietta" was from Havana; arrived Aug. 1; cleared Havana July 20 and sailed on July 23; crew, fourteen; in ballast a mixture of dirt and pebbles; no yellow fever occurred on her during the voyage, but while at Havana her crew were taken sick with yellow fever; no sickness in port; cleared Aug. 26; ballast discharged on Cook's wharf, between high and low water mark; know of one case of fever, Capt. Bean, of the schooner "Ed Johnson," lay just to the north, twenty or thirty yards, from the Spanish vessel "Marietta;" Capt. Bean was taken sick Aug. 21 and died Aug. 24; cases of Zeigler, Toate, Hertzog and a Mrs. West, who died; Zeigler and Toate dined the captain of the Spanish bark on several occasions; Hertzog was a butcher who supplied the vessel with meat; Mrs. West did some sewing for the captain on clothing taken from the vessel. Two of the sailors of Capt. Bean's vessel, one of the schooner "W. H. Boardman," that lay alongside of the "Marietta," one of the schooner "M. M. Pate," that lay to the southward of the "Boardman" and alongside of the "Boardman;" these cases occurred within a week or ten days of Capt. Bean; Capt. Bean died at the hotel; all the cases were fatal. Do you think the port physician has sufficient authority? Answer: We have no suitable building for quarantine station, no provision made for fumigation of vessels, and none to prevent intercourse with the town by pilots. I know that I heard of the existence of yellow fever in Savannah prior to its occurrence here. On Aug. 22 I declined to send two men, who applied, to hospital in Savannah, because of yellow fever in Savannah.

Testimony of Dr. J. S. Blain: Health officer, and I have been since Sept. 9, 1876. From Sept. 7 to 12 Mrs. West, Messrs. Zeigler, Toate and Barnes died of yellow fever, but being unwell did not see most of them. The first case I saw on the schooner "W. H. Boardman," on Aug. 10. The captain called on me to visit the steward, who in my opinion had yellow fever, and the vessel sailed on the 22d. The captain said he had another sick man on board, but he was all right. This man died on the following day. The vessel discharged her ballast at Littlefield & Tyson's wharf, a little above high water mark, and took in her cargo at Carter's wharf. Capt. Bean, of the schooner "Ed. Johnson," boarded the "W. H. Boardman" while the dead man was on deck, previous to burial. Saw Capt. Bean on the 22d; died on the 24th of uremic poisoning, in a convulsion; no black vomit. The schooner "W. H. Boardman" was lying alongside of the "Marietta," which came from Havana with a crew of convalescents from yellow fever. The "Marietta" discharged her ballast at Cook's wharf. Messrs. Zeigler, Toate and Hertzog were on terms of companionship with the captain of the "Marietta," as also were Messrs. Peitzer and Doerflinger, who about the same time had yellow fever. (From Sept. 4 to Sept. 12.) The disease was carried to different points in the city, which acted as a radiating force. That it progressed against a northeast wind that prevailed during the whole of the epidemic. The town was perfectly healthy up to the time of the outbreak of the epidemic. It is customary for us to have malarial fever here after the prevalence of a northeast wind. There are absolutely no malarial influences affecting the town nearer than the rice fields, which are twelve miles off. I fully indorse all Col. Collins' statement concerning quarantine, and have this only to add, that the whole of the sea coast of Georgia should be taken in charge by the state or the general government, because of the inability of the city to establish and keep up suitable quarantine stations. I will add that yellow fever prevailed on the vessels in the vicinity of the "Marietta" twelve or fifteen days before the disease made its appearance among the residents.

In a private letter to Surgeon E. McClellan, U. S. A., Col. Collins states that he finds Mrs. West (one of the early cases at Brunswick) did no sewing for the "Marietta," but for the schooner "Johnson." Mrs. West went on the "Johnson" after the disease was among the crew, got two or three suits of woolen clothes, repaired them, pressed them with a hot iron, returned them to the vessel on the evening of Sept. 2, and was taken with yellow fever the next day.

Dr. Blain's Supplemental Statement.—The sanitary conditions of Brunswick are good. No fresh water streams, ponds or marshes are in or around it. Rain, when it falls, soaks in rapidly, or is carried off by the drainage. The drainage is sufficient to keep the place perfectly dry. There are no closed drains or sewers. Salt water has access to all these drains at each tide. We have no typhoid diseases except occasional accidental cases. We have but few malarial diseases, of a mild type. Our epidemics of scarlatina, etc., are of mild character and easily managed. The excreta from the privies is disposed of by burying it in the earth. Have no reason to suspect the drinking water, which is exclusively furnished by wells and pumps, is contaminated by drainage from the excreta. There are no conditions, in my judgment, to warrant the supposition that yellow fever could originate in the city. James S. Blain, M. D., health officer, city of Brunswick.

Will state that I rode all over the city with Dr. Blain and saw absolutely no cause for the generation of malaria or any other disease at this time. B. M. Cromwell, member of the state board of health.

Brunswick, 1893.—Dr. H. Buford, president of the board of health of Brunswick, in a letter to me, says: "The epidemics of yellow fever in Brunswick in 1876 and 1893 were traced to introduction through defective quarantine."

Darien, Jan. 3, 1877.—Doboy Island.—On Aug. 23 the Spanish bark "Valentina" arrived at Brunswick from Havana. Had no bill of health—was in ballast. Did not discharge at Brunswick, but left immediately for Doboy Island, where she discharged ballast and took in a cargo of lumber. Within ten days of her arrival yellow fever broke out on the island. (See testimony of Col. Collins and Mr. E. C. Davis and letter from Darien.)

Doboy Island, Jan. 1, 1877.—Col. John T. Collins, Brunswick, Ga. Dear Sir—As requested by you, I have made full inquiry concerning the fever that prevailed to such an extent on this island during the months of September and October last. I find that 101 persons had the fever—thirty-nine whites and sixty-two colored, but the number of deaths were equal, seven of each—and six of the seven whites were of foreign birth, the other one being that of the captain of the American schooner "Ralph Norris," who died and was buried at Darien. This does not include those who left the island and were taken sick elsewhere. There was no sickness here until after the Spanish bark "Valentina" discharged her ballast at the mill wharf, commencing Aug. 28 and 29. The first case that occurred was that of Mr. Jussley, the superintendent of the mill, who went to the hold of the vessel to ascertain its carrying capacity; and the next case of sickness was that of Mr. Harley, who had a general oversight of the wharves and store of Messrs. Hilton, Foster & Gelson in the absence of the latter gentlemen. Mr. Harley was about the vessel several times while they were discharging ballast, and, no doubt, contracted the disease there, from which he died Sept. 20, after a severe relapse of the fever, from which he had almost recovered. The next case was among the negro houses nearest where the ballast was deposited, and not more than 100 feet therefrom. These people commenced to be taken down from Sept. 5 to 10. Cannot learn from them the exact date, only that it was a few days after the bark discharged her ballast. From these houses of the colored people the fever appeared simultaneously almost all over the island. It was of quite a mild type, and with medical attention and nursing, no doubt the death rate would have been much less. The only wonder is that it was not much greater, as almost every person on the island was sick—hardly enough being well, at one time, to bury the dead, to say nothing of nursing the sick. There was no aid extended the sufferers from Darien, or any other quarter, and the only notice taken of the island was by a sanitary committee from Darien, who came down here on a junketing excursion, and after deciding that there was no yellow fever here, returned to town and left it to its fate. I understand that the Spanish bark "Valentina" lost her entire crew from yellow fever in Havana, just before coming here; and from all I can learn, have no hesitation in saying that the disease was brought here by that vessel. Any further information we can give you will be furnished with pleasure. Edwin C. Davis, Darien.

YELLOW FEVER IMPORTED.

The maritime quarantine of the past was necessarily a lamentable failure for the reason that the system was not founded upon an intelligent conception of the issues to be met. Take Charleston, S. C., a city so frequently and cruelly scourged by yellow fever, and an occasional source of yellow fever in Georgia. What were the quarantine regulations? They were as follows: 1. In summer all vessels from ports where yellow fever occurs are brought to quarantine; if all are well they are permitted to come up, and the vessel is permitted to come to the wharves of the city within five days, but the time may be extended at the discretion of the port physician. 2. If any are sick, the vessel is detained at quarantine, the sick sent to the lazaretto, and the cabin and forecastle cleaned and purified as far as practicable; we have no facilities for doing any more. 3. Vessels coming from any port or place whatever with infectious or malignant maladies on board shall be made to perform a quarantine of twenty days or more, if, in the judgment of the port physician a longer quarantine is necessary. Now for enforcement of this quarantine, the port physician, the sole quarantine officer, said: "I must, in candor, say that I do not believe the yellow fever was ever produced in Charleston from importation; and this is the result of an experience of thirty years as port physician, and twenty-four years as member of the board of health, many years of which I have been its chairman." Was ever a man known to enforce a system which he believed was useless? What was the result of administering quarantine by this officer who did not believe it necessary? Yellow fever attacked Charleston twelve times during his term of service. Dr. Hume, of Charleston, unquestionably traced six of these twelve infections of the city to foreign importation.

Examine the quarantine system of Georgia. The then health officer of Savannah, before the state board of health, in 1876, after the epidemic, said: "It has been the custom for years past to establish a quarantine on June 1. Upon the arrival of a vessel from an infected port I am notified by telegram from the quarantine station. The vessel cannot come up to the city until I visit her and give permit. The usual detention is about ten days from port to port, provided she has a clean bill of health. If there be any sickness on board, or there be any grounds for suspicion that there is, the health officer can use his discretion and keep her at quarantine as long as he please. Upon going on board of a vessel the first thing I do is to muster the crew. The crew list is produced, and I have the men arranged on deck and check them off. If any are missing I institute inquiries, and my action is guided by what I ascertain and believe. No vessel arrived at the city this season in less than ten days—sometimes as long as forty days or more, on their trips from South America. The usual time to keep vessels from infected ports in quarantine is ten days. Vessels coming from Havana with clean bills of health are allowed to come to port in ten days—that is, ten days from port to port. This has been the custom here so long as to almost become a rule. On some occasions I have made it fifteen days, in others thirty days or more. I have no guarantee after leaving vessels that I have quarantined that my instructions will be rigidly carried out; have no doubt the crews sometimes have communication with the sailor boarding-house runners, and they may come up to the city. There is no guard boat or river police, and hence there is nothing to prevent them from coming up to the city if they are willing to run the risk of penalty and imprisonment.

"There is certainly a very grave defect in the quarantine regulations here; there is no lazaretto or hospital at Tybee (the quarantine station), and no arrangements for treating sickness below the city."

Mayor Anderson said: "I think it likely that the sailor boarding-house runners do communicate with vessels in quarantine. There is nothing to prevent persons from visiting these ships, as there is no guard kept there. I heard through the health officer that vessels had arrived on which it was suspected there has been yellow fever. I think the entire quarantine system of the southern coast is very defective."

From the facts quoted from the officials of Savannah it is found that the maritime quarantine system of that port was utterly devoid of even the elemental principles of modern quarantine. Vessels came directly to the wharves of the city from several infected West Indian ports wherein yellow fever was prevailing epidemically, and ten days' detention from port to port, provided no cases of yellow fever were in existence on the vessel, was the extent of ship sanitation required before giving them pratique. If nobody on shipboard was sick on arrival at Savannah, it was accepted as proof positive that the vessel could be safely landed at the wharves of that city, and the crew were allowed to enter the boarding houses of Savannah and carry with them their clothing, mattresses and blankets brought from infected places, never having been disinfected. No fact is now better established in sanitary science than that every member of a ship's crew may be immune to yellow fever by having previously had the disease, and yet the clothing and bedding be dangerously infected, and disseminate this poison in a previously non-infected city soon after the fomites are admitted. So too may the vessel be dangerously infected and the crew show no case of yellow fever for the reason that each one had previously had the disease and was therefore immune. This was the case with the "Maria" and "Ynez," one or both, at Savannah in 1876, for Schull, the first case, certainly contracted yellow fever from one of them. The books are full of similar cases. I could fill a volume with published details of like instances. It is an established principle in ship sanitation that thorough disinfection of every part of a vessel, cabin, fore-castle, hold, ballast, bilge, bedding, clothing, hangings, etc., and thorough fumigation of freight is necessary in a vessel from an infected port, even if there be no case of yellow fever among crew or passengers. Yet Savannah had not the shade of a shadow of a plant equipped for germicidal treatment of infected vessels. The truth is, she had not so much as a proper apparatus for fumigation of vessels. It is true that the health officer said in 1876: "I had the vessel ('Maria Carlina') thoroughly fumigated." Savannah having at that time no equipment for thorough fumigation of a vessel, it is impossible that the "Maria Carlina" was thoroughly fumigated. By crude and wholly ineffectual appliances a given quantity of sulphur was burned, probably in the hold of the vessel, but the effort to so thoroughly fumigate this vessel was mere child's play, devoid of every elemental principle of scientific application of sulphur fumigation. Savannah has now a scientifically constructed apparatus for thorough fumigation and for thorough application of germicidal solutions to fomites, and for the application of dry and moist heat at a temperature of 250 degrees Fahrenheit, to all parts of vessels, which is known to be positively destructive of all kinds of micro-organisms. Not only do we find that Savannah had no equipment for sanitary treatment of infected vessels, but her quarantine system was most radically defective—one equally as essential as a disinfection plant, i. e., her health officer. No man had higher regard for the health officer than I had. He was a man of the highest integrity, an elegant gentleman, and a highly accomplished physician. But unfortunately for Savannah, he held the following opinions expressed by him to our state board of health in 1876: "I don't believe yellow fever can be imported; don't think quarantine would keep it out." No city, state or nation has the right to place in charge of her quarantine system a man who does not believe in its efficacy. Man's actions result from his conceptions of the necessities of measures, and no man since the dawn of creation was ever known to rigidly enforce a measure which his judgment impressed him would fail of success. A quarantine system should be administered only by a man thoroughly imbued with its necessity. A man who will rigidly enforce its every detail. The health officer of 1876 was by no means the only health officer of Savannah who held the same views as he did as to quarantine. But this does not vitiate the principle for which I am contending. I comment upon Dr. ———'s views because in 1876 he was the health officer, and I wish to show his views as a part of the lax system of quarantine operated in Savannah against the importation of yellow fever. There can be no question that a municipality has no right to commit so sacred a trust into the hands of a man who does not believe in the principles upon which it is founded. Likewise, it is a reflection on the common sense of our citizens and a disgrace to the municipality to place upon a medical officer so sacred a duty as protection of the public health and not provide him with every requirement necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of his office. Fortunately for Savannah she has remedied both defects. In her health officer, Dr. W. F. Brunner, she has an officer thoroughly equipped in knowledge of the great principles of modern ship sanitation, as well as zeal and fidelity in the discharge of duty. She has too, a thoroughly equipped quarantine system with approved modern disinfection apparatus for sanitary treatment of vessels from ports infected with yellow fever or any other infectious disease. I would not be understood as intimating that any of our other Georgia seaports had a disinfection plant. None of them had until recently. Brunswick, now under the supervision of the United States Marine hospital service, has a thoroughly efficient one, and in so far as thorough disinfection of vessels and their contents is concerned, she is amply provided for. The weak spot in Brunswick's quarantine system, and it is one fraught with danger, is the location of her quarantine station, being on the same peninsula with the town itself, and only two miles distant from the city.

YELLOW FEVER IN AUGUSTA.

Augusta has been visited by two epidemics of yellow fever, i. e., 1839 and 1854. She narrowly missed an epidemic in 1876, which will be detailed briefly, after considering the epidemics of 1839 and 1854. Augusta is located on the western side of the Savannah river, at the head of steamboat navigation, 130 miles above Savannah by water course; 130 miles northwest of Savannah by the Central railroad, and 136 miles from Charleston, S. C., via the South Carolina railway. Elevation of the city, 165 feet above sea level. Augusta has four direct connections with seaports of Georgia and South Carolina, i. e., by steamboats from Savannah, by the Central railroad, by the South Carolina railway, and by the Port Royal & Augusta railway with Port Royal, S. C. This latter railway company by branches runs daily freight and passenger trains to Augusta from both Savannah and Charleston. The history of the epidemic of yellow fever in Augusta in 1839 is briefly as follows: The epidemic was preceded by a long season of heat and drought. From June 10 to August 30 the thermometer in the shade at 3 o'clock p. m. ranged from 76 to 96 degrees Fahrenheit. At one time during the summer there was not even a shower of rain for seventy consecutive days. The extent of the drought throughout the upper section of the state is made manifest by the fact that the Savannah river was so low at Augusta that drays and other vehicles were driven daily through the river to Hamburg, on the Carolina side. The water of the river was so extremely low that Mr. H. Shults of Hamburg, a litigant against Augusta, planted a crop of turnips in a part of the bed of the river, thinking this would favor his law suit. The lowness of the stream continued so long that Mr. Schults' crop had nearly matured before it was covered with water at low water mark of the river. The first notice of the existence of an unusually grave form of fever among residents of Augusta is dated August 19, though the medical profession of Augusta unanimously reported to the mayor that the disease was not yellow fever, but, "unquestioned bilious remittent fever." As early as July 27 several refugees from Charleston had developed yellow fever immediately on arriving in Augusta. From August 6 to August 19 forty cases of yellow fever had occurred among residents of Augusta. From this time the disease spread rapidly over the entire city, attacking all classes, old and young, white and black, though few of the blacks died. The total mortality from yellow fever during this epidemic was 243, whites 206, colored 37. The following-named physicians contracted the disease while nobly serving their afflicted patients, and died: Dr. Milton Antony, Dr. John Dent, Dr. Griffith and Dr. Isaac Bowen.

The majority of the medical profession of Augusta, after the epidemic was recognized, centered upon the trash wharf as the cause of the disease, Dr. L. A. Dugas being the only one of the physicians of Augusta who dissented from this opinion. He maintained that the poison had been imported from Charleston, S. C., where yellow fever had been for some time previously prevailing. The trash wharf here referred to was an immense pile of garbage which had been from 1834 to 1839 daily carted from the streets to the northern side of the city and dumped into the river; this trash pile was estimated to contain 200,000 cubic feet. The garbage of the city was daily dumped from the carts into the river at this point, the lighter parts floating down the stream, the heavier sank to the bottom of the river. The pile was so large that it finally reached above the surface of the river at low-water mark. As already noted, in the early part of the summer of 1839 the Savannah river at Augusta almost literally dried up, leaving a large part of the bed of the river so dry that a crop of turnips was planted therein. Thus, this immense pile of putrescent animal and vegetable matter was exposed to the direct rays of the burning sun in July and August. On Aug. 28 this trash pile was covered with earth to a depth of four feet. The condition of this seething mass of animal and vegetable matter until covered with earth is attested by the fact that when the city authorities, in May and June, 1839, decided to remove the trash pile, after the outer crust was removed, the heat of the mass was so great that "the workmen, although wearing heavy shoes, were compelled to quit work for several hours at a time in order to suffer the mass to cool." The stench from this putrid mass is described as unbearable, and called forth many and loud complaints from citizens living in its vicinity. While this trash pile was a flagrant violation of even the elemental principles of sanitation, and in this day it is difficult to conceive how a cleanly, decent people could have permitted it to exist, yet I do not hesitate an instant in saying it did not produce yellow fever in Augusta. Strange as it may seem this trash pile had practically no baneful effect upon the health of the city. It had been in existence five years prior to the appearance of yellow fever, yet Prof. Milton Antony says: "For three years previously the city had enjoyed unparalleled health."

The fact is that Augusta was unusually healthy two months after yellow fever was epidemic in Charleston, S. C., which two cities were connected by the South Carolina railway. Augusta prior to the outbreak of yellow fever was full of refugees who had fled from Charleston after the disease had been declared to be epidemic in the latter city. Dr. Strobel of Charleston properly claimed that the disease was imported into Augusta from Charleston, and asked of those claiming local origin of the malady the following pertinent questions: "Why did not yellow fever manifest itself in Augusta at the same time it made its appearance in Charleston; why was the epidemic in Augusta deferred until Charleston was almost deserted by her inhabitants? Did the arrival of the people from the infected city of Charleston excite the extrication of pestiferous miasm from local causes which had lain dormant up to the time?" To this day no rational answer has ever been made to Dr. Strobel's pertinent questions. He might have added another very pertinent one on this line, which I now propound: Why was it that Augusta never had yellow fever until 1839, notwithstanding the fact that the disease was epidemic in Charleston thirty-one different years prior to 1839? The answer is easily given: Augusta was connected with Charleston by railway only in 1836, and Charleston citizens in their hegira from her infected atmosphere were, in the absence of railway facilities, forced to seek shelter in the country immediately adjacent; 1838 was the only year prior to 1839 in which yellow fever prevailed in Charleston after Augusta was connected with her by railway. The facts show that prior to yellow fever making its appearance in Augusta in 1839, not only was the city filled with refugees from Charleston, but Dr. Strobel cited the fact that the first cases of yellow fever in Augusta were among these refugees. Not only were infected persons and baggage from Charleston admitted into Augusta in 1839 without any restrictions of any kind whatsoever, but enormous quantities of decayed West Indian fruit was likewise brought into Augusta. This latter fact is significant when it is known that the yellow fever epidemic in Charleston in 1839 was imported from the West Indies, thirty-six vessels from the West Indies laden with fruit having landed at the wharves of Charleston from May 1 to July 30. This fruit was brought to Augusta in crates. The first case reported as yellow fever in Augusta in 1839 was in the early part of September, though the meeting of physicians on August 19 stampeded the citizens. They became convinced that the disease was yellow fever and in a few days the majority of citizens had fled to the country. The second and last epidemic of yellow fever in Augusta occurred in 1854. This year, as in 1839, the appearance of the disease was preceded by prolonged high temperature and remarkable drought. Again the Savannah was nearly dried up, extensive portions of the bed of the river being perfectly dry. However, this condition of the river was observed twice during the period between 1839 and 1854, and about the same prolonged and heated term as in 1839 and 1854.

In 1854 Augusta was connected by railway with Savannah via the Augusta & Savannah railway, also by steamboats on the river, but the boats were for several months prior to the appearance of yellow fever unable to ply between the two cities in consequence of the low river.

The first case of yellow fever among the residents of Augusta in 1854 occurred Sept. 12, but prior to this case fourteen citizens of Charleston and Savannah developed yellow fever after reaching Augusta. As to the healthfulness of Augusta at the commencement of this epidemic, I cite the following from the "Augusta Constitutionalist:" "From Sept. 1 to 17 there have been only sixteen deaths in this city. There has been no year within our memory since we have been resident in Augusta that the bill of mortality in September, up to the same period, will bear any comparison for lightness." Yet such was the rapidity of development and extent of yellow fever in Augusta that during the last half of the month of September the deaths numbered sixty-six. Fifty of these sixty-six died of yellow fever. The total mortality for the month of September was eighty-two. The last case of yellow fever occurred November 20. Total mortality, 123,—whites 110, colored 13. As to the origin of the epidemic of 1854 there is but one opinion among the medical profession of Augusta, i. e., that it was imported into the city from Charleston or Savannah—possibly both. Yellow fever had been in Savannah more than five weeks before it attacked Augusta, and more than seven weeks in Charleston earlier than in Augusta, and fourteen cases of yellow fever had occurred, among refugees from Savannah and Charleston before a single case occurred among residents of Augusta. Every possible source of local origin was closely examined, but the examination showed the city to be in exceptionally fine sanitary condition. There was no trash wharf or garbage pile in existence in the city, inasmuch as the garbage had for years been burned every day as it was dumped from the carts. There was only this one circumstance similar to that of 1839, i. e., yellow fever refugees with infected baggage, etc., were allowed to enter Augusta ad libitum. And thousands of these refugees availed themselves of the privilege. Augusta was literally full of the refugees from Charleston and Savannah. In 1854, as in 1839, scores upon scores of railway passengers and freight cars entered Augusta daily from the yellow fever infected cities of Charleston and Savannah. The freight cars were closed in the infected city, and opened only after arriving in Augusta, thus daily throwing into the atmosphere of Augusta the infected air of Charleston and Savannah. Under the fact of this epidemic there cannot be a shade of a shadow of doubt that the disease was imported into Augusta from Charleston and Savannah, and, furthermore, it cannot be doubted that if the policy of absolute non-intercourse quarantine had been operated against these cities, Augusta would not have been infected.

Yellow fever cases have on several occasions other than 1839 and 1854 been imported into Augusta from Charleston, S. C., Port Royal, S. C., and Savannah, Ga., but while a few of the citizens of Augusta developed yellow fever, the disease did not assume epidemic proportions. Augusta narrowly escaped an epidemic in 1876. Fourteen residents of the city contracted yellow fever—five of them died. In this instance the infection was undoubtedly brought from Savannah by infected baggage or railway freight cars. I believe the infection was brought in baggage or bedding of refugees from Savannah, though it may have been from infected freight cars. The first case in a resident of Augusta dates from September 19. Mr. H., living on Twiggs street, corner of Hale street. The next case occurred September 21, Mr. M., living three doors from the first case. Almost immediately on the opposite side of the street from where these two cases resided, was a family who had ten days previously refugeeed from Savannah. Yellow fever had been in existence in Savannah for three weeks prior to the time this family left that city, coming from there directly to Augusta, and bringing with them furniture, bedding and clothing packed in Savannah. This family rented the vacant house above referred to, unpacked their household goods and went to housekeeping. In the latter part of September, 1876, I was informed that two members of this family had had yellow fever before leaving Savannah, though this assertion was not proven. All of the cases of yellow fever in 1876 were located in the section of the city immediately adjacent to where this family of refugees resided. This infected section of the city was immediately west of the freight depot of the Central railroad, which directly connected Savannah with Augusta. The freight cars were loaded and closed in Savannah and opened only after arriving in Augusta. Although Savannah was infected with yellow fever as early as July 28, the fact was suppressed for several weeks, during which time numerous families of refugees, and scores of freight and passenger cars left the city coming directly to Augusta, before the latter city inaugurated a quarantine against Savannah. Local origin was suggested, and every effort made to trace these cases to insanitary conditions of Augusta, but the closest scrutiny of the entire city limits failed to bring to light any local cause for the disease. On this occasion, as on all others, the appearance of the malady in Augusta was subsequent to infection of a seaport in direct communication with Augusta.

In July, 1877, several cases of yellow fever occurred among citizens of Augusta who had not been out of the city limits, but the disease was directly in traceable connection with importation from Fernandina, Fla., and Port Royal, S. C. In the latter part of September, just prior to the application of non-intercourse quarantine by Augusta against infected cities in 1877, a refugee from Fernandina arrived in Augusta and went to the home of a relative on upper Greene street, where he developed yellow fever within two days of his arrival. This patient died of black vomit forty-eight hours from the commencement of his disease. He brought with him two large trunks of clothing packed in the infected town of Fernandina. The day after his attack a relative unpacked his trunks to get out some of his wearing apparel. A number of days after unpacking this trunk the lady who did this service was attacked with yellow fever, and one after another of the members of the family fell ill with the disease, until it attacked every member of the household. By thorough isolation and disinfection the disease was confined to the house and household in which it appeared. I saw the first of these cases in consultation with Drs. W. H. Foster, Steiner, Campbell and Coleman. The subsequent cases were attended by Dr. H. H. Steiner, a yellow fever expert. Therefore there can be no doubt as to the nature of the disease. These cases established beyond controversy the portability of the yellow fever poison, as there was not another case in the city during the year among residents of Augusta. The only other cases of yellow fever in Augusta in 1877 (and there has never been another case to the present day) were among refugees from Port Royal, S. C., which place had a few years previously been directly connected with Augusta by the Port Royal & Augusta railway. In the latter part of September a malignant fever appeared at Port Royal; the board of health fearing it was yellow fever sent an expert to Port Royal on Oct. 1, to decide the nature of the disease. The representative of Augusta, after consultation with the physicians of Port Royal, reported that the disease was not yellow fever, but a high grade of malarial fever. Returning to Augusta the next day, the expert sent to Port Royal found on the same train one of the cases of fever he had seen the previous day in the latter town. There was also on the same train a number of refugees from Port Royal to Augusta, bringing with them in some instances household furniture, bedding, etc., and all of them brought trunks full of clothing. The next day Dr. L. D. Ford, president of the board of health, visited the sick refugee from Port Royal, and promptly pronounced it a case of yellow fever. The fact was immediately reported to the board of health, and non-intercourse quarantine against Port Royal was at once applied, but, as is usual in such cases, the quarantine was not applied until infected persons and materials had already reached the city. Several others of these refugees developed yellow fever after reaching Augusta, though under the restrictive measures promptly and faithfully applied, the disease did not spread.

MACON.

In 1854, sometime after yellow fever had been declared epidemic in Savannah, the disease appeared in Macon. The first cases were among refugees from Savannah. The first cases among the inhabitants of Macon were in those who came in contact with the cases imported from Savannah, or with railway freight cars loaded and closed in Savannah and opened after they arrived in Macon. In 1854 the railroad depot was located on the east side of the river, and the vast majority of the cases among citizens of Macon were among those who lived immediately adjacent to the freight depot. Dr. Mattauer cited this fact before the state board of health in 1876, and estimated the number of cases in 1854 to have reached 100.

There were about seventy cases of yellow fever in Macon in 1876, forty-nine of them being inhabitants who had not left the city for several months previous to contracting the disease. The first cases were among refugees from Savannah and Brunswick, in both of which cities the disease was prevailing as an epidemic. Dr. Magruder cited the case of two refugees arriving from Savannah and bringing trunks of clothing and unpacking them in the house of a citizen of Macon. Before either of these refugees developed the disease the hostess became alarmed and requested them to obtain quarters elsewhere, yet she took the fever and died. The two refugees went to the Rutherford house, when one of them developed the disease. Dr. Magruder, who had previously been a believer in the local origin theory recanted it and said before the state board of health in 1876: "From what I saw here this year, I have been compelled to believe that it was introduced here, and it was by means of the railroad cars running from Savannah, fastened up perfectly tight until they got here, and then thrown open, and this infected air spreading itself through the neighborhood. All these cases occurred in the neighborhood of the freight depot. I found that all the cases that occurred here were due to immediate communication with persons that came from Savannah." Dr. Magruder also cites the following case: "Mrs. H. came here from Savannah, and brought all her clothes; she developed yellow fever on her way here, and died at her mother's on Bridge road, this side of the river. Her mother took the disease in about two weeks and died. Her sister also contracted the disease but recovered. These cases were in the neighborhood of the Savannah cotton depot." Dr. Mason testified that the health of the city was unusually good prior to appearance of yellow fever. There had been very little malarial fever here prior to introduction of yellow fever. All the cases of yellow fever occurring in citizens of Macon occurred sometime after refugees from Savannah and Brunswick developed the disease on arrival here. About those cases at the factory, there were two parties that came here from Savannah; one of them had the yellow fever; previous to their taking it they carried their baggage to the factory house, so they came in direct contact with these parties. In the first case I saw (it was on Third street) the case of Mrs. Higgins. She left Savannah at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, arriving here about 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, and took the chill about 7 o'clock. She died on the third day with black vomit. Her mother, who nursed her, and had not been to Savannah, from nursing her daughter took it, and then another daughter took it; there were two cases originating in that house from nursing Mrs. H. Then there was a case on the hill on the line of Third street, that of Mr. Penog. He had been exposed to it in Savannah and took it. I treated him. His sister who visited him took the disease and died. I did not treat her; she died before he did. He lasted some two or three weeks. He didn't take the black vomit, but had hemorrhages." Question—Is it not likely that the infection came from the cars? Answer—Yes sir, it originated in that way, but others contracted it from visiting and nursing them. Mrs. Conrey, an old lady, took the disease from nursing those who had it. She was the worst case that I had to recover.

Dr. Mettauer testified: I treated twenty-five cases of yellow fever in 1876.

Eighteen of these cases were citizens of Macon—the other five were refugees from Savannah and Brunswick. Question—Did you have any cases that you could trace to previously infected districts in Macon? Answer—I could not trace the origin of the disease to any other cause than by importation of atmosphere from Savannah. Question—Do you know that any of these cases were in communication with the trains or any other means by which infection could occur? Answer—The eighteen cases which occurred among our citizens who did not visit Savannah or Brunswick occurred on Fifth street, opposite the freight depot, where over a hundred thousand cubic feet of Savannah atmosphere was thrown out of the cars daily from empty cars brought from Savannah closed—the air imprisoned in the empty cars. Question—Were any of these previously employed on the road? Answer—One watchman, who remained at the depot every night. Question—What do you think was the origin of the fever? Answer—I think it depended wholly for its origin on the daily supply of infected Savannah atmosphere which was brought here imprisoned in the empty cars, these cars being opened at the depot opposite the locality where these cases occurred. I don't think there is any local cause for the disease. In the case of John Foughner, I have no doubt but that he got the disease by receiving crates of cabbage and fruit from Savannah, and opening them in his house. He slept there with his family. He died of the disease, and one of his children took it after his death. I cannot account for these cases in any other way. Every case that I have seen is traceable to Savannah atmosphere imported into our city.

JESSUP.

Yellow fever appeared in Brunswick in 1893, Sept. 12. The baggagemaster and telegraph operator at the depot developed the disease at the same hour of the day. The former handled all the baggage from Brunswick. The latter mingled with the train crews and entered the cars running directly from Brunswick. Sept. 23, 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30 and Oct. 1 cases occurred. The disease was declared epidemic Oct. 2. Total number of cases officially reported was 34; mortality, 3. Population remaining in Jessup, 709, whites and blacks. The disease was in existence from Sept. 12 to Sept. 30 before it was pronounced yellow fever. Dr. J. G. Tuten first diagnosed the malady, and was sustained in his diagnosis by Surgeon R. D. Murray, of the United States Marine hospital service, a yellow fever expert. The last case occurred Nov. 1. The disease not having been recognized until it had been in existence eighteen days, there was no effort made to jugulate the malady with the incipient cases. When yellow fever prevailed in Savannah and Brunswick (1876) no precautions were taken to prevent introduction of the disease into Jessup. A number of citizens of Savannah refugeeed to Jessup, and many of the business men went to Savannah daily and returned to Jessup to spend the night. Several of these refugees developed yellow fever in Jessup, but there was no spread of the disease. In 1888, when yellow fever was epidemic in Jacksonville, with which city Jessup has direct railway connections, there were no cases in Jessup in consequence of non-intercourse quarantine. Jessup had no quarantine in 1893.

An epidemic of yellow fever prevailed at Darien in 1854. The first case occurred about Sept. 1, the last case the latter part of November, after a heavy frost. There were not more than 100 white citizens in Darien during the epidemic, and fifty of them died of this one disease—a mortality rarely ever equaled in America. During the year 1854 no foreign steamer ran to Darien, but coastwise and foreign barks came to the port for lumber. Dr. Spalding Kenan, to whom

I am indebted for the facts relative to this epidemic, says: "It is positively known that the disease was brought to Darien from Savannah, but whether by steamer or stage I cannot learn, but regular trips twice a week were made between Savannah and Darien by both stage lines and steamers."

NOT AN ENDEMIC DISEASE.

It will be observed that I have not included yellow fever among the endemic diseases of Georgia. In my judgment no greater wrong has ever been done our state than by many of her physicians who have persisted in asserting that yellow fever originates in our climate, i. e., that yellow fever takes its origin in Savannah, for instance, from causes existing within her limits under the influence of peculiar conditions of soil and atmosphere; that it is capable of self-production, whenever these conditions exist, similar to bilious fever in the country whenever vegetation, putrefaction and temperature acquire a certain development. If this were so we would be liable to yellow fever at any time whenever intense malarial poison taints our atmosphere.

I contend that yellow fever never did exist in any portion of the United States except when imported during the heated terms of the year. It is an exotic disease in America. This country is not and never has been its habitat. It is a disease sui generis, is in nowise related to malaria more than is measles to smallpox. An individual exposed to malaria in the swamps or rice fields in the summer or fall prior to a "killing frost" will contract a malignant, even fatal, case of malarial fever, but never under any circumstances yellow fever. Local insanitary conditions of American cities, be they ever so foul, never did originate one single case of yellow fever. Insanitary conditions, putrefying substances, constitute a magnificent hot-bed for breeding yellow fever germs when once introduced from the West Indies or other yellow fever countries. But without importation of the yellow fever germ there has never been developed a case of yellow fever in America. In foreign countries—the West Indies, for instance, yellow fever finds a habitat—the disease is there a perennial. In America it is an annual, lives only during the summer and fall seasons, and is killed by frost. It has never survived the winter season in America. If yellow fever prevails in any part of America in 1894 it will surely be killed out by the cold of winter, and unless imported subsequently will never be known again in the United States. It is as thoroughly well demonstrated as any proposition in medical science that the disease has never obtained a permanent abode in any portion of North America, has never become naturalized in our climate, and this is even so of the extreme southern portions of Florida, which are below the frost line. These statements are in perfect accord with the opinions of the overwhelming majority of the ablest sanitarians in America. Yet they are by no means new. The fact is that up to the year 1800 yellow fever was universally considered an exotic to this country. One hundred and fifty years ago Dr. John Lining, of Charleston, S. C., writing to Dr. Whytt, professor of the practice of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, draws this graphic picture of yellow fever in America: "This fever does not seem to take its origin from any particular constitution of the weather, independent of infectious miasmata, as Dr. Warren (of Barbadoes, p. 8th) has formerly well observed. For within these twenty-five years it has been only four times epidemic in this town, namely, in the autumns of the years 1732, 1739, 1745 and 1748, though none of these (excepting that of 1739, whose summer and autumn were remarkably rainy) was either warmer or more rainy (and some of them less so) than the summers and autumns were in several other years, in which we had not one instance of any one being seized with this fever, which is contrary to what would have happened, if particular constitutions of the weather were productive of it, without infectious miasmata. But that this is really an infectious disease seems plain, not only from this, that almost all the nurses caught it, and died of it, but likewise as soon as it appeared in town, it soon invaded newcomers, those who never had the disease before, and country people when they came to town, while those who remained in the country escaped it, as likewise did those who had formerly felt its dire effects, though they walked about town, visited the sick in the different stages of the disease, and attended the funerals of those who died of it. And lastly, whenever the disease appeared here, it was easily traced to some persons who had lately arrived from some of the West Indian Islands, where it was epidemical.

"Although the infection was spread with great celerity through the town, yet if anyone from the country received it in the town and sickened on his return home, the infection spread no further, not even so much as to one in the same house." In 1800 Dr. Ramsey of South Carolina, writing to Dr. Miller of New York, says: "There is but one opinion among the physicians and inhabitants of Charleston as to the origin of yellow fever here, and that is, that the disease was neither imported nor contagious." Unfortunately for the south this became the accepted doctrine of the medical profession of our section under the domination of Rush and La Roche of Philadelphia, and Barton of New Orleans. Such is the power of authority to trammel research. To even question the local origin theory of yellow fever was regarded as heresy. Convinced of the correctness of the domestic origin of this disease the profession of medicine for decade upon decade made no effort to trace its origin to foreign sources. If a bold, scientific brother pointed out facts which incontestably proved that the fever followed importation of cases from foreign sources he was ridiculed, and his convincing array of facts considered the theory of a crank. To show the predilection men have for preconceived opinions, I cite the fact that even so late as 1876, in so learned a medical profession as Savannah—admittedly one of the ablest in the south, all of the physicians of that city who appeared before the state board of health except two, Drs. Duncan and Elliott—affirmed their conviction that the yellow fever epidemic of that year originated from unsanitary conditions, in and around the city, together with meteorological peculiarities. One of these learned men seriously claimed that "malarial poison and the effects of extraordinary heat produce yellow fever." Other physicians contend that the rice fields produce yellow fever, others attribute it to filthy sewers and stagnant filth in canals, on the surface of the streets, lots, etc., while others insist that the disease originates from excavations of the soil of cities, etc., etc.

The reason of all this confusion is the failure to discriminate between origin and propagation. They are as different as day and night. The old theory of causation of yellow fever in America by annual importation from foreign sources has been demonstrated to be true by the researches of modern medicine. The germ theory of disease has thrown a flood of light on this long mooted point. While the germ of yellow fever is to the present hypothetical—no microscopist having ever detected it, or demonstrated its existence, yet the profession of medicine of to-day is practically a unit in regarding it a germ disease, i. e., that its origin is due to a specific germ, microbe, as is smallpox, typhoid fever, cholera, etc. One of the fixed certainties of modern microbiology is the inconvertibility of germs, i. e., that every disease germ is the product of a previous germ, and this germ is peculiarly the causative agent only of one disease, and this germ cannot under any condition or conditions cause any other disease. There is no such thing as spontaneous generation of living organisms.

At the birth of a germ or germs whether development and multiplication will ensue depends upon finding lodgement in a suitable soil. In other words, the environment must be suited to the necessities of that particular seed, germ. But without the parent germ there can be no subsequent one, and the progeny will be identical with the parent. As corn invariably produces corn only, so does the germ of yellow fever, for example, produce yellow fever only. It would be just as easy for the husbandman to grow wheat by planting seed corn, as for the physician to produce yellow fever by sowing the germs or seed of malaria. It never has been done. It never can be. It may be true, as claimed, that the same factors, soil and environment, which favor the growth and multiplication of the germ of malaria, are equally favorable to the growth and multiplication of the yellow fever germ in the city. But this by no means proves their identity. The same factors, soil and environment, are alike favorable to the growth of wheat and oats, yet they are two separate and distinct entities. It is true that yellow fever usually prevails in localities where malarial fevers exist, but malaria prevails in thousands of localities where yellow fever has never been known. Yellow fever is pre-eminently an urban disease, malaria is pre-eminently a rural disease. The poison of malaria is not portable, that of yellow fever is markedly so. Malaria prevails annually in a malarial locality, yellow fever rarely ever does. One attack of yellow fever is protective against a second manifestation of the disease, one attack of malaria makes the individual more susceptible to a second attack than if he had never had the first one.

Twenty years ago Parkes said: "During the last few years the progress of inquiry has entirely disconnected yellow fever from malaria, though yellowness of the skin is a symptom of malarious fevers. Yellow fever is a disease of cities and parts of cities, being often singularly localized, like cholera. In the West Indies it has repeatedly attacked a barrack (at Bermuda, Trinidad, Barbadoes, Jamaica), while no other place in the whole island was affected. In the same way (at Lisbon, Cadiz, and many other places), it has attacked only one section of a town, and, occasionally, like cholera, only one side of a street. In the West Indies it has repeatedly commenced in the same part of a barrack. In all these points, and in its frequent occurrence in non-malarious places, in the exception of highly malarious places, in its want of relation to putrifying foecal and other animal matters, its cause differs entirely from malaria. If these points were not sufficient, the fact that the agent or poison which causes yellow fever is portable, can be carried and introduced among a community, and is increased in the bodies of those whom it attacks, indicates that the two agencies of yellow fever and malarial fevers are entirely distinct.

"That great point being considered settled, the inquiry into the conditions of spread of yellow fever becomes easier. The points to seize are its frequent and regular localization and its transportation. The localization at once disconnects it with any general atmospheric wave of poison, it is no doubt greatly influenced by temperature, and is worse when the temperature is above 70 degrees Fahrenheit; though it will continue to spread in a colder air than was formerly supposed, it does not spread rapidly, and appears to die out, but even temperature does not cause it to become general in a place."

Meteorological conditions, coupled with unsanitary surroundings, putrefaction of vegetable and animal substances vitiate the atmosphere of cities—this atmosphere is impure from a sanitary point of view, but such an atmosphere contains no single element, or combination of elements, capable of originating yellow fever. Another element must be added to this impure atmosphere before the disease is generated therein, that element is the germ or seed of this malady. This is the leaven that leaveneth the whole lump. It appears in American cities in only three ways, one or all in combination, i. e.: 1. An atmosphere charged with yellow fever germs contained in vessels, cars, etc. 2. Yellow fever fomites, i. e., germs, in the baggage of passengers recently arrived from an infected locality. 3. By persons having imbibed the disease in an infectious locality and falling ill of the malady after reaching the non-infected city. In this latter instance the germs multiply in the body of the yellow fever patient, and after leaving the body multiply in the atmosphere in sufficient number to make it infectious. It has never been demonstrated how the yellow fever germ finds exit from the body of the patient. The late Dr. Parkes of England, admittedly the highest sanitary authority in the world, was probably correct in calling it "a foecal disease." On this point he says: "The localizing causes are evidently connected with accumulation of excreta round dwellings, and overcrowding. Of the former there are abundant instances, and it is now coming out more and more clearly that, to use a convenient phrase, yellow fever is a foecal disease. And here we find the explanation of its localization in the West Indian barracks in the olden time. Round every barrack there were cesspits open to the sun and air. The evacuations of healthy and sick men were thrown into the same places. Grant that yellow fever was somehow or other introduced, and let us assume (what is highly probable) that the vomit and foecal matters spread the disease, and it is evident why at St. James' barracks at Trinidad, and at St. Ann's barracks at Barbadoes, men were dying by the dozens, while at a little distance there was no disease. The prevalence on board ship is as easily explained; granted that yellow fever is once imported into the ship, then the conditions of spread are probably as favorable as in the most crowded city, planks and cots get impregnated with the discharges, which may even find their way into the hold and bilge. No one who knows how difficult it is to prevent such impregnation in the best hospitals on shore, and who remembers the imperfect arrangements on board ship for sickness, will doubt this. Then, in many ships, indeed in almost all in unequal degrees, ventilation is most imperfect, and the air is never cleansed."

Thorough drainage, sewerage and scavenging of a city no doubt markedly decrease its liability to infection from yellow fever when the germ of the disease has been introduced. Thorough drainage dries the soil and atmosphere, thereby decreasing the vitality of the yellow fever microbes; perfect sewerage promptly and efficiently removes all liquid household filth beyond the inhabited area, which liquid filth would, in the absence of sewerage, be thrown upon the street or lot surface there to putrefy and furnish pabulum for these microbes. Thorough scavenging promptly and efficiently removes the solid filth of a community and thereby robs these microbes of food from this source. Yet with all this perfection of sanitary administration should yellow fever patients be admitted into such a community, even though they had been divested of all fomites before being admitted, there is still marked and unquestionable danger of infection of the atmosphere unless all dejecta of such patients be thoroughly disinfected immediately that they leave the body, for as has already been shown, the microbes of yellow fever grow and multiply in the body of the patient and pass out in the dejecta, to find even more favorable growth and multiplication in media external to the body of the living host. Medical history has, however, indubitably proven the fact that yellow fever does not always infect a city even when a number of persons sick of the disease, and bringing with them yellow fever fomites, are admitted. Indeed, history shows that in the majority of such cases no spread of the malady results. Yet the fact that infection is the exception and non-infection the rule, furnishes no justification for admitting these persons and fomites into a community, for it is not in the power of the most learned sanitarian in the world to foretell at what introduction it will or will not spread and scatter desolation and death in a city. The portability of the poison being proven, the golden rule of prophylax is non-intercourse with infected localities, persons and materials, i. e., that before persons and materials from a city infected with yellow fever can be safely admitted into a community the period of incubation must have passed and all materials thoroughly disinfected, as well as ventilation and disinfection of boats, cars, etc., plying between the infected locality and the healthy one. No fact is better established in medical history than that one determining factor in the propagation and dissemination of yellow fever is human intercourse. In the vast majority of epidemics of yellow fever in America infection has been directly traced to arrival of infected boats, cars, fomites or persons. And all of them could be so traced could all the facts be ascertained. It is often impossible to trace the source of the first case of smallpox, scarlet fever, or measles in a community, yet every intelligent physician knows that the poison was imported into the previously non-infected community. The agency of human intercourse in scattering the seeds of this disease is conclusively demonstrated by the fact that medical history is full of examples wherein monasteries, prisons, etc., in the midst of decimating epidemics, have wholly escaped infection by observing the rule of non-intercourse with those outside of their walls. It has been proven over and over again that winds or atmospheric currents have little or no influence in scattering yellow fever from one section of a city to another. The poison travels as rapidly against as with a wind. Almost every epidemic has shown that a certain district, or districts, of a large city had been the field of a general, decimating prevalence of the disease, and few if any cases occurred outside of the infected locality or localities, except such persons as had visited the infected center. Experience has abundantly demonstrated that yellow fever often remains confined to a single square of a city, or a single street, and that the poison does not cross the square or street unless it be carried across by some person visiting the infected place. The progress of the disease has often been known to be arrested by a stream of water or by a high wall.

SCIENTIFIC QUARANTINE ESSENTIAL.

Freedom from yellow fever in America is to be secured only by the administration of a thoroughly scientific quarantine, such as the one inaugurated at New Orleans, La., in 1885, by Dr. Joseph Holt, president of the state board of health of Louisiana. Many years ago quarantine meant the detention of passengers from infected places for forty days on ship board or in a lazaretto. In this day quarantine means the detention of such persons in a properly equipped lazaretto or refuge camp until the period of incubation shall have passed, when, after thorough disinfection of all fomites, the individuals are allowed to go to their respective destinations. Formerly, indeed so late as 1876 in Georgia, mere detention for forty days was considered sufficient to stamp out infection in a ship, which, by reason of its construction, could not be even ventilated. In very rare instances ignorant and crude efforts were made to disinfect the cabin and fore-castle by burning a few pounds of sulphur therein, but the hold, filled with the foreign yellow fever atmosphere and the putrescent bilge, was left unmolested until the vessel was admitted to pratique; to open their hatches at our wharves, there to discharge their long pent-up air, reeking with yellow fever poison, into the atmosphere of the very heart of the city. Mere detention of a vessel, even for a period of twice forty days, did not divest her of her deadly infection. At the end of eighty days' detention at the quarantine station she was as capable of infecting the port as if she had never been detained one hour. This fact has been proven over and over again, yet blind adherence to the local origin theory on the part of the port physician caused the mere detention idea to prevail and thus sow the seeds of disease and death in the community. Is it anything strange that yellow fever occasionally visits us? Should we not rather be amazed that we so frequently escaped? Happily all is changed. Modern ship sanitation has eliminated every vestige of cruelty from quarantine, shortened the period of detention, brought order out of chaos, and supplanted failure with success. Ship sanitation under the Holt system is as scientifically correct and its results as exact as modern antiseptic surgery. Indeed, the system consists of applying to vessels and their contents exactly the same treatment as is applied by modern antiseptic surgery to hospital wards, patients and fomites. If modern quarantine and germicidal treatment of ships, railway cars, houses, fomites, etc., together with detention of suspects until the period of incubation shall have passed, is unnecessary and unscientific in warfare against yellow fever, admittedly a portable disease, then modern antiseptic surgery is equally as unnecessary and unscientific. Let it always be remembered that the quarantine system of to-day operated against yellow fever is as necessary, and fully as protective against importation of cholera, typhus fever, measles, smallpox, scarlet fever, etc. Inland cities must wage warfare against infection from yellow fever by absolute non-intercourse quarantine, for the reason that no city can be expected to erect and maintain detention camps and disinfection appliances at a station on every railway leading into the place. Unless yellow fever refugees have been detained beyond the period of incubation of the disease, and all fomites thoroughly disinfected before being admitted into a community, it is just as rash and unscientific to admit such refugees and their fomites as it would be for the surgeon to admit a case of erysipelas into a surgical ward. Absolute non-intercourse quarantine operated by inland cities has failed only when the measure was inaugurated after refugees or fomites had gained admittance prior to the inauguration of the measure. Every fair-minded man must admit that in the past the existence of yellow fever in a city was kept a profound secret by the authorities until the disease had become epidemic, and before this event numbers of the citizens had caught on to the state of affairs and fled the place, many of these refugees having imbibed the poison, and developed the disease after arriving in the city of refuge, not only these refugees unknowingly infected, but their baggage likewise. Every city owes it as a duty to its neighbors as well as its citizens to announce the first case of yellow fever immediately that the disease has been diagnosticated. The mere announcement of the first case has no power in itself to cause the disease to extend into an epidemic, but it puts her citizens and neighbors upon notice of impending danger, and enables them to prepare to meet it in their own way. The law should make it a penal offense for the officials of a city to conceal from its citizens the existence of yellow fever within its limits. No city has the right to murder her citizens by forcing them to unknowingly dwell amid pestilence for fear of damaging her commercial interests. The trouble in the past has been that in sanitary matters human life has been held of inferior value to commerce. Whenever it becomes a question of fostering commerce at the expense of human health and life, commerce should be restrained rather than sow the seeds of pestilence among an innocent people. Under the enlightened quarantine system of the present, there is no conflict between quarantine and commerce, and no intelligent commercial body in America known to me regard it as a hardship upon commerce. In fact rational quarantine is the ally of commerce.

PUBLIC HEALTH LAWS—SANITATION.

The sanitary laws of Georgia are general in nature and provide: How and by whom hospitals for contagious diseases may be established. Maritime quarantine, how prescribed and regulated. Towns may establish quarantine. Vessels may be removed to quarantine grounds. Persons escaping quarantine; how dealt with. Masters of vessels must deliver bills of health, etc. Inland passengers to perform quarantine when ordered by authorities to do so, if they come from a place infected with a contagious disease. Duty of pilots before entering vessels. Persons on board of an infected vessel shall observe quarantine. Governor empowered to give orders to prevent the spread of contagious diseases within the state, and make such appointments and regulations concerning the same, as deemed proper by him. Violators of quarantine may be indicted. Persons concealing smallpox indictable. Fines and forfeitures arising out of violation of quarantine; how disposed of. Performance of quarantine; how certified. Fees of health officer; how paid. Smallpox hospitals may be constructed in towns and counties in which the disease appears. Towns and counties may provide necessary regulations to prevent the spread of smallpox. Governor is required to procure the necessary vaccine virus and have it transmitted to the ordinaries of each county for immediate use. These laws are to be found in the code of Georgia, sections 1375 to 1393 inclusive. Nuisances injurious to the public health may be abated under sections 4090 to 4097 inclusive of the code of Georgia. In addition to these sanitary laws certain towns and cities have special grants from the legislature either in charter provisions, or special sanitary laws, to protect the public health under ordinances enacted by the authorities of these communities.

The principal local boards of health are those of Augusta, Atlanta, Savannah, Macon, Brunswick and Darien. The board of health of Augusta is organized under a special act of the legislature, and vested with plenary power to enact and enforce sanitary ordinances in Augusta. It has power to promulgate and enforce quarantine regulations against all persons coming from localities where infectious and contagious diseases dangerous to the public health exist. The board has quarantine jurisdiction for forty miles surrounding it on all sides within the state of Georgia. It likewise has sole control of the construction and maintenance of the sewerage and drainage systems of the city. The work of the board in Augusta has been most successful, having reduced the death rate from 30 per 1,000 inhabitants in 1871 to 19.61 in 1893. This has been accomplished by vigilant sanitary police of lots, alleys and streets, as well as private and public sewers, prevention and control of contagious and infectious diseases and extension and perfection of the system of sewerage and drainage, etc. Five sanitary inspectors constantly overlook all lots, alleys and streets, sewers, drains, etc. Every sewer in the city is flushed and disinfected twice each month. The outlet to the sewerage system is the Savannah river at lower end of the city limits. The sewerage and drainage systems are being extended each year, and the beneficial result upon the public health has been strikingly apparent. The board consists of the following members: Eugene Foster, M. D., president; T. D. Coleman, M. D., G. C. Dugas, M. D., chemist; E. C. Goodrich, M. D., W. C. Jones, W. B. Young, J. H. Alexander, mayor; G. J. Howard, J. J. Dicks, A. F. Austin, G. R. Lombard and A. J. Barnes, representatives from the city council, and C. S. Bohler.

The board of health of Macon is organized under a special act of the legislature—the law is substantially a copy of the act organizing the Augusta board of health. Rigid sanitary police, prevention and control of contagious and infectious diseases with perfection and extension of the sewerage and drainage systems constitute the main work of the board. Macon is now constructing a separate sewer system for the entire city. This must of necessity greatly improve the public health. The board of health of Macon is constituted as follows: W. R. Winchester, M. D., chairman; N. G. Gewinner, M. D., chairman pro tem.; J. A. Etheridge, M. D., Max Jackson, M. D., John Ingalls, Chas. Wachtel, Wm. A. Goodyear, Bridges Smith, secretary.

The board of health of Atlanta is organized under the ordinance of the city council. The board has authority to elect all officials serving under its authority and affix the pay of each. It also has authority to enforce the sanitary ordinances of the city, though it has no power to enact such ordinances. The latter power vests in the city council. The board has plenary authority over the subject of quarantine, personal or otherwise. The board of health of Atlanta is financially better supported than that of any other board in the state—the city of Atlanta expends $63,000 annually for maintenance of her health department. The board of health is constituted as follows: J. F. Alexander, M. D., president; J. C. Avery, M. D., secretary; F. W. McRae, M. D., R. T. Dorsey, John Tyler Cooper, John B. Goodwin, A. J. Shropshire.

The board of health of Brunswick has only an advisory relation to the city council. The power to enact sanitary ordinances vests in the latter body. A board of health having only an advisory relation to the city government can never do a highly efficient service in maintenance of the public health, no matter how honest, faithful and competent the membership of such board may be. An efficient sanitary board must needs be composed of men possessing special knowledge of hygiene, and be vested with adequate power to enact and enforce sanitary regulations. The average councilman is utterly devoid of the technical education necessary to enable him to wisely enact sanitary laws, and this lack of knowledge of hygiene forbids an intelligent conception of the necessity of strict enforcement of such laws. Again, a board of health should be wholly separated from politics. The defect of the board of health of Brunswick, as also of Savannah, lies in want of plenary power to enact and enforce sanitary regulations. The boards of health of these two cities are composed of good and true men, but their powers should be enlarged so that each of them should possess plenary power in public matters. The members of the board of health of Brunswick are: H. Burford, M. D., president; A. V. Wood, secretary; S. C. Littlefield, C. G. Moore, C. D. Ogg, J. P. Harvey, superintendent, and H. M. Branham, city physician. Sanitary committee: H. T. Kennon, chairman; A. J. Crovatt, C. Downing.

Sanitation in Savannah is under the supervision of a board of sanitary commissioners, consisting of the mayor, the health officer, two aldermen and three citizens appointed by the mayor. The sanitary ordinances of the city are enacted by the city council, the board of commissioners' duty being to supervise the administration of all the health laws of the municipality. The commissioners have actively, faithfully, discharged the duties imposed upon them. But the high annual rate of mortality in Savannah shows that there is a vast improvement needful in the sanitation of the city. The commissioners are: Mayor J. J. McDonough, chairman; R. B. Harris, M. D., W. F. Brunner, M. D., health officer; B. I. Purse, M. D., H. Meyers, P. J. O'Connor, J. F. B. Beckwith.

The following tabular statement shows the annual death rate in the three principal cities of the state for the thirteen years—1880 to 1892 inclusive:

THE STATE BOARD OF HEALTH.

In February, 1875, the legislature, after persistent efforts of the physicians of the state under the leadership of Dr. J. G. Thomas of Savannah, enacted a law creating "The Board of Health of the State of Georgia." The law required the governor to appoint nine physicians of skill and experience, regular graduates of medicine, and practitioners of not less than ten years, one from each congressional district in the state, who, together with the comptroller-general, and attorney-general and state geologist, shall constitute the board of health, to be called the board of health of the state of Georgia, the term of each member being six years. The members of the board received no salary, but the actual personal expenses of each member while engaged in the duties of the board were allowed. The salary of the secretary was $1,000. The principal features of the law organizing the board were as follows: To take cognizance of the interests of health and life among the people of the state; they shall make inquiries in respect to the cause of diseases, and especially epidemics, and investigate the sources of mortality, and the effects of localities, employments, and other conditions upon public health. They shall obtain, collect, and preserve such information relating to deaths, diseases, health, etc., as may be useful in the discharge of its duties, and contribute to the promotion of the health, or the security of life, in the state of Georgia; and it shall be the duty of all health officers and boards of health in the state to communicate to said state board of health copies of all their reports and publications; also, such sanitary information as may be useful; and said board shall keep record of its acts and proceedings as a board; and it shall promptly cause all proper information in possession of said board to be sent to the local health authorities of any city, village or town in the state which may request the same, and shall add thereto such useful suggestions as the experience of said board may supply; and it is hereby made the duty of said health authorities to supply like information and suggestions to said board of health; and said state board of health is authorized to require reports and information (at such times, and of such facts, and generally of such nature and extent, relating to the safety of life, and the promotion of health, as its by-laws or rules may provide) from all public dispensaries, hospitals, asylums, prisons and schools, and from the managers, principals and officers thereof; and from all other public institutions, their officers and managers, and from the proprietors, managers, lessees, and occupants of all places of public resort in the state; but such reports and information shall only be required concerning matters and particulars in respect of which it may, in its opinion, need information for the proper discharge of its duties. Said board shall, when requested by public authorities, or when they deem it best, advise officers of the state, county, or local governments, in regard to sanitary drainage, ventilation, and sanitary provisions of any public institution, building, or public place. They shall also give all information that may reasonably be requested concerning any threatening danger to the public health, to the health officers of the ports of Savannah, Darien, Brunswick and St. Mary's, and to the commissioners of quarantine of said ports, and all other sanitary authorities in the state, who shall give the like information to said board; and said board and said officers, said quarantine commissioners and sanitary authorities, shall, as far as legal and practicable, co-operate to prevent the spread of diseases, and for the protection of life, and the promotion of health within the sphere of their respective duties. The board shall have the general supervision of the state system of registration of births, marriages, and deaths; the said board shall recommend such forms of amendments of laws as shall be deemed to be necessary for the thorough organization and efficiency of registration of vital statistics throughout the state; the secretary of said board shall be the superintendent of registration of vital statistics, as revised by said board; the clerical duties and safe keeping of the bureau of vital statistics thus created shall be provided for by the comptroller-general of the state, who shall also provide and furnish such apartments and stationery as said board shall require in the discharge of its duties. To make annual reports to the legislature of all its acts, as well as the sanitary condition and prospects of the state; also reports upon vital statistics, and such other useful information as the board may deem proper, together with suggestions for any further legislative action or precautions deemed proper for the protection of the public health. To require of every practitioner in the state to report to the ordinary of his county all births and deaths occurring in his practice, and affix a penalty for every failure to comply with this law. There was appropriated $1,500 for expenses of the board for the year 1875.

The governor appointed the following physicians as members of the board: J. G. Thomas, Savannah; Benjamin F. Cromwell, Albany; George F. Cooper, Americus; G. W. Holmes, Rome; Henry F. Campbell, Augusta; H. H. Carlton, Athens; F. A. Stanford, Columbus; C. B. Nottingham, Macon; Joseph P. Logan, Atlanta. The above named, together with N. J. Hammond, attorney-general; W. L. Goldsmith, comptroller-general; and George Little, state geologist, constituted the state board of health of Georgia. Dr. J. G. Thomas of Savannah was elected president and Dr. V. H. Taliaferro of Atlanta secretary. During the first year of its existence the board did valuable work in efforts to educate the people of the state upon questions of public hygiene. One of the first acts of the board after organizing was, as it should have been, to invite the cordial support and co-operation of local boards of health and physicians of the state in its work, and invited suggestions in furtherance of its duties. The first annual report of the board submitted Nov. 15, 1875, is a valuable document, embracing 215 pages of printed matter. It contains: Law creating the board; its proceedings and its organization; address to the medical profession; constitution and rules, together with the laws; form of a return of a birth to ordinary; form of a return of a marriage to ordinary; form of a return of a death to ordinary; form of a transcript from ordinary's record of births; form of a transcript from ordinary's record of marriages; form of transcript from ordinary's record of deaths; form of ordinary's record of births; form of ordinary's record of marriages; form of ordinary's record of deaths; circular of instructions to ordinaries; report of expenditures; report of vital statistics; books of record of births, marriages, and deaths for secretary's office; report upon the organization and duties of local boards of health. In addition to the above, and many valuable suggestions in the minutes as printed, I find the following able papers: "Registration of Sanitation—Their Value," by Henry F. Campbell, M. D., of Augusta; "The Hygiene of Schools," by C. J. Nottingham, M. D., of Macon; "Hygiene of Schools," by F. A. Stanford, M. D., of Columbus; "The Influence of Trees on Health," by B. F. Cromwell, M. D., Albany; "Sale of Poisonous and Other Articles Detrimental to Health," by F. A. Stanford, M. D., of Columbus; "Poisons—Their Sanitary Condition and Needs in Georgia," by G. F. Cooper, M. D., Americus; "The Most Effectual Means of Preventing Smallpox in Georgia," by Joseph P. Logan, M. D., Atlanta.

FIRST YEAR'S WORK.

As previously stated, the first year's work of the board was almost wholly of an educational nature, the board wisely realizing the fact that public instruction as to the possibilities and necessities of sanitary measures must always precede the enforcement of sanitary laws. The duty of public instruction was ably discharged by the board. The act creating the board of health was radically defective in several particulars. First, The law conferred upon the body no power to enforce one single necessary sanitary law already existing, nor did the board possess the power to enact necessary sanitary laws. Its sole power consisted in an advisory relation to the people of the state, with the one power to collect vital statistics. Second, Insufficient funds. The legislature voted the board $1,500 for public health administration in Georgia—including instruction upon hygiene. What a spectacle! A great and powerful state doling out the pitiful sum of $1,500 a year to promote the health of 1,360,000 citizens—a sum not one-third as large as is annually expended in an average-sized county in Georgia to suppress crime within its limits.

During 1876 the board of health continued its labors, to the greatest possible advantage, according to the scope of its powers. The second annual report (1876, a volume of 186 pages) shows in detail the work of the board, and presents suggestions for additional sanitary laws, and enlargement of the powers of the board. This report also contains all the facts relative to yellow fever in Georgia in 1876, by testimony taken by the board in the various cities in which the disease appeared. In this volume is a valuable and instructive paper from the pen of Dr. Ely McClellan, surgeon of the United States army, on The Relations of Health Boards and Other Sanitary Organizations with Civic Authorities. Also one from Judge B. H. Bigham on Lunacy in Georgia.

The law creating the board was amended in 1876 so as to organize a county board of health in each county to co-operate with the state board. The county boards to have supervision of the sanitary condition of their counties respectively, subject to the direction of the state board of health. Every county board was to consist of three members, the ordinary and two practicing physicians, the latter to be appointed annually by the grand jury of the county. The following counties organized boards of health under the law: Campbell, Cherokee, Decatur, Dougherty, Echols, Effingham, Fannin, Fayette, Fulton, Harris, Lowndes, Macon, Mitchell, Monroe, McDuffie, Pulaski, Randolph, Richmond, Rockdale, Troup, Quitman. The state board was active in efforts to organize a county board in every county in the state.

While the effort to collect vital statistics was but partially successful, yet the success of the undertaking was as great as could have been reasonably expected. Physicians and laymen had to be educated up to an appreciation of the fact that a complete registration of vital statistics was of fundamental importance to the successful administration of a public health service. Had the board been maintained with sufficient power and money, Georgia would to-day have had a complete record of vital statistics from each county in the state, and would thereby have known the sanitary condition and needs of every community in the state. As a consequence of failure to collect vital statistics, no citizen or official of Georgia has even an approximately correct idea of the prevailing diseases in the various counties, except as they are gathered once each decade by the United States census enumerators, and these, being obtained from non-medical sources, are necessarily inexact. In vain the board labored to educate the legislature to an appreciation of the fact that maintenance of the public health is the greatest element, indeed the first cause of prosperity and wealth to the state. Utterly devoid of appreciation of the possibilities and economy of a public health service, the Georgia legislature, in 1877, blotted the state board of health out of existence by refusing to vote the paltry sum of $1,500 a year for its maintenance. This one act, resulting from shameful ignorance, has done more to retard the prosperity of the state than any other act done since the settlement of the colony. An examination of the mortuary record of Georgia for 1880, as compiled from the United States census, shows a total mortality numbering 21,549. Of this number 1,905 died of unknown causes, leaving 19,634 from known causes. I cite the mortality resulting from each of the following diseases: Smallpox, 2; measles, 496; scarlet fever, 31; diphtheria, 488; whooping cough, 650; typhoid fever, 986; malarial fever, 1,050; erysipelas, 60; total, 3,833 deaths from above specified causes. Every one of these diseases, and many others causing a large mortality, are preventable under thorough sanitation. The state in failing to maintain an efficient public health service is responsible for these deaths. Laying aside the sacredness of human life, let us ascertain the loss to the state in dollars and cents by this neglect to provide and sustain an efficient public health service. Political economists estimate every citizen to be worth to the state $1,000. Taking this as a basis of calculation, we find an annual financial loss to the state amounting to $3,830,000, resulting from preventable deaths. Sanitarians, from reliable data, have shown that for every preventable death during the year there are five preventable cases of sickness. This would give us 19,165 unnecessary cases of sickness each year. So that counting the financial value of citizens, the cost of funerals, the loss of time, and expenses consequent upon unnecessary sickness and death in Georgia, amounts to fully $5,000,000 each year. As an evidence of the "penny wise and pound foolish" policy of Georgia in neglecting the health of her citizens, I cite the fact that the epidemic of yellow fever in Savannah in 1876 resulted in a financial loss to that city amounting to $2,500,000. Savannah's loss is the loss of the state. Damage to Savannah is damage to the entire state. If Georgia would maintain her proper position among the states she must protect the health of her citizens as the other commonwealths are doing.

INDIFFERENCE TO THE LAWS OF HYGIENE.

One of the chief impediments to the upbuilding of Georgia is the popular impression in northern and western states that yellow fever is one of the endemic diseases of our commonwealth. As already shown, this disease is not, and never has been, endemic among us. It is always imported when it reaches us. It is a historic fact that from the settlement of the colony to the present day yellow fever has prevailed less frequently in Georgia than in any northern or southern state bordering the Atlantic and Gulf. It is a fact that the one epidemic in Memphis, Tenn., in 1878, was attended with a mortality three times greater in number than the total mortality from yellow fever in Georgia during her entire history. Yet the authorities of Georgia do not publish these facts to the world and thus remove the unjust and damaging impression that this pestilence is generated in our state. Though it may reflect upon the high officials of Georgia, the fact should be published to the world that yellow fever has never existed in Georgia except through ignorance of or indifference to the laws of hygiene. The ignorance and indifference of our citizens in sanitary matters is amazing. Our legislators and governors have vied with the populace in displaying ignorance of or indifference to hygiene. It is a disgrace to Georgia that she has not even the semblance of a state sanitary organization. In this day of rapid transit by steamships and railways distance has been abolished, and through the daily comingling of states and nations they are really one people. Thus the deadly portable diseases of one nation are the common heritage of them all, except as they are restrained by the faithful, intelligent application of sanitary measures. A moment's thought on this subject will convince the most skeptical person of our danger. Let us illustrate it. Havana is the hot-bed of yellow fever every year. Individuals can imbibe the poison of the disease in Havana, cross over into Florida, and, by railways, reach almost any state in the union before falling ill of the malady. Individuals can imbibe the poison of smallpox, measles, etc., in France, England, or Germany, travel by steamship to America and reach almost any state in the union before the disease manifests itself. With these established truths of medical science staring us in the face this grand old state—a model in all things else—does absolutely nothing to protect her citizens against “the pestilence which walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday.” A scene occurred two years ago which fully demonstrated the estimate which high officials of Georgia placed upon the health of our people. Yellow fever—a portable disease—was prevailing as an epidemic in Florida, and the citizens of infected places, by hundreds, began to crowd into Georgia, bringing with them their infected baggage, and were only stopped by the United States authorities, and detained at camps just within our state until the period of incubation had passed, and all baggage disinfected. And thus some portion of Georgia was saved from pestilence. The governor, like his predecessors on similar occasions, went not in person, nor even sent an official, to the state line to protect our people to whom the constitution guarantees protection of the commonwealth in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property. Last year two sluggers went to Florida for a prize-fight, and being fearful that the governor would prevent the bout in that state, as he threatened to do, it was rumored that they would cross over the line into Georgia and fight. Immediately after this rumor reached our capital the governor of Georgia opened telegraphic and mail communication with the sheriffs in the counties bordering the Florida line and ordered each of them to summon a posse to arrest the sluggers should they dare to attempt to profane Georgia soil by a prize fight. Not only were the civil authorities instructed to prevent this slugging match, but the governor, as commander-in-chief of the military forces of Georgia, went in person to the rumored seat of war, ordered the military companies to his aid, threw a military cordon around the Georgia-Florida line, and awaited the appearance of the enemy. But the foe appeared not. In the fashionable and aristocratic city of Jacksonville, Fla., the sluggers fought, without molestation from the civic or military powers of our sister state, while the civil and military forces of Georgia, under personal command of our governor, stood guard over an enemy who never so much as started for Georgia. After the war was over the governor of Georgia allowed the civil and military forces of the state to go in peace to their homes. What a picture! An army solemnly stationed, by the governor, and under his personal command, at the Florida line, to prevent a rumored slugging match in our state, yet the previous year, when our commonwealth was actually in process of being overrun with yellow fever refugees from Florida, neither the civil nor military powers of Georgia were commanded by his excellency, nor even so much as one man sent, to protect our people from invasion by one of the most frightful pestilential diseases known to man. Section 1384 of the code of Georgia reads as follows: "The governor of this state may, by proclamation, whenever he shall deem it necessary, give such orders to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious diseases within the state, and make such appointments and regulations concerning the same as shall by him be deemed proper, and be stated in such proclamation, and any person violating such order or regulation may be fined or imprisoned at the discretion of any court having jurisdiction." Under these facts I think I am justified in insisting that there is urgent need that the highest officials in Georgia shall be educated into an appreciation of the elemental principles of sanitary civilization.

It is a sacred duty of the state to protect its citizens from foreign invasion by pestilence, or at least to seek the aid of the general government to render this service. Even though the United States government undertakes this duty the state of Georgia should employ an expert sanitarian to see that everything possible is done to protect her citizens. In the past this duty has been discharged by the various cities, towns and villages for themselves, the state having ignored this sacred trust. It is a great wrong for the state to place this burden upon the various communities of Georgia. The state should stand guard over our state lines to repel invasion by epidemic diseases. If this were done the extraordinary expenses of the various cities, towns and villages for this purpose would be annulled. Georgia has four seaports, and, therefore, is in constant danger of invasion by portable diseases brought from foreign countries, unless constant, intelligent, faithful sanitary surveillance be exercised over these ports. In thus protecting these seaports she will protect the entire state. Let it not be imagined that I consider the prevention of portable diseases the sole function of a properly organized and equipped public health service. Far from it. The most urgent need is a sanitary administration which will educate the people upon the possibilities and necessity of private and public hygiene in every community in Georgia, a public health service which can exterminate malaria, prevent pollution of water and soil, drain waterlogged lands, prevent and stamp out contagious and infectious diseases, etc., etc. Deadly as are contagious diseases, it remains a fact that the vast majority of preventable diseases, diseases which are attended by greatest mortality in the aggregate, are non-contagious. They are diseases to which the people bow submissively as though they were a necessity, yet as a fact exist only because of neglect of private and public hygiene. Twice in the past eight years the medical profession of the state, together with local sanitary organizations, urged the legislature to organize, thoroughly equip and maintain a public health service in Georgia, and the governor in his message last year recommended it, yet the legislature turned a deaf ear to these appeals. Let us hope the next general assembly will show itself wiser than its predecessors. At present no officer of the state is charged with the duty of protecting the public health. Possessing as we do an almost matchless climate the intelligent, constant application of the laws of hygiene would render Georgia one of the healthiest places on the face of the globe.

LAWS GOVERNING PRACTICE OF MEDICINE IN GEORGIA.

In 1825 the general assembly at the request of the physicians of the state passed an act organizing a state board of medical examiners of the regular school of medicine. The duty of the board was: To meet annually or oftener, at the call of any three of their members; to elect all officers and fill all vacancies; to be a body corporate, with the right to exercise all the powers usual in such associations that are necessary to their organization, if in conformity to the constitution and laws; to grant licenses to all applicants who under the law are entitled thereto, and to fix the fee therefor when not fixed by law; to prescribe a course of reading to those who study medicine under private instruction which shall be obligatory upon all who may apply to the board for examination; to grant licenses to practice to all physicians of their school who present their diplomas from incorporated medical colleges of Georgia without examination; to grant licenses to all other persons who undergo a satisfactory examination, and to revoke such license whenever satisfactory evidence is produced to said board of irregular and unprofessional practices calculated to discredit the medical profession or to result in injury to the people; to grant license to practice in any particular branch of medicine or to treat any form of disease if satisfied upon the examination that the applicant is thus competent; to grant licenses to apothecaries upon their standing a satisfactory examination as to their knowledge of drugs and pharmacy. Section 1400 provided for the establishment of the board of reformed practice, and section 1402 a penalty for unauthorized practice. Neither board could license persons to practice in a school of medicine different from their own. Physicians belonging to a school of medicine not represented by a board of physicians could practice under their diploma alone, and if they had none, were liable as though they had no license and were required to have one. These boards continued in existence until 1880, when, by act of the legislature, they were abolished. The members of the board of medical examiners of the regular school of medicine were, in 1851: L. D. Ford, Augusta; I. P. Garvin, Augusta; R. W. Moore, Athens; J. Branham, Eatonton; B. F. Keene, Hillsboro; E. A. Broddus, Monticello; H. T. Shaw, Covington; R. Banks, Gainesville; G. D. Phillips, Clarksville; J. Persons, Columbus; W. J. Johnson, Fort Gains; W. K. Burroughs, Savannah; J. M. Green, Macon; M. A. Franklin, T. Fort, B. A. White, C. J. Paine, T. F. Green, G. D. Case, S. G. White, Milledgeville.

LAW OF 1880.

The act of the legislature of 1880 governing the practice of medicine is as follows: Section 1409. (a) Who may practice medicine. No person shall practice medicine within this state, unless he has been heretofore legally authorized to do so, or shall be hereafter authorized so to do, by a diploma from an incorporated medical college, medical school or university, and by compliance with subsequent sections of this chapter. Section 1409. (b) "Practice medicine" defined. For the purposes of this chapter, the words "practice medicine" shall mean to suggest, recommend, prescribe, or direct, for the use of any person, any drug, medicine, appliance, apparatus, or other agency, whether material or not material for the cure, relief or palliation of any ailment or disease of the mind or body, or for the cure or relief of any wound, fracture or other bodily injury, or any deformity, after having received or with the intent of receiving therefor, either directly or indirectly, any bonus, gift or compensation. Section 1409. (c) Practitioners must register. Every person not lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine within this state, shall, on or before the first day of December, eighteen hundred and eighty-one, and every person hereafter duly qualified to practice medicine shall, before commencing to practice, register in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county wherein he resides and is practicing, or intends to commence the practice of medicine, in a book kept for the purpose by said clerk, his name, residence, and place of birth, together with the authority for practicing medicine, as prescribed in this chapter. The person so registering shall subscribe or verify, by oath or affirmation, before a person duly qualified to administer oaths under the laws of this state, an affidavit containing such facts, and whether such authority is by diploma or license, and the date of the same, and by whom granted, which shall be exhibited to the county clerk before the applicant shall be allowed to register, and which is willfully false shall subject the affiant to conviction and punishment for false swearing. The county clerk to receive a fee of fifty cents for each registration, to be paid by the person so registering. Section 1409. (d) Must register again on removal. Any registered physician in this state, who may change his residence from one county into another county in this state, shall register within the clerk's office of the county to which he removes and wherein he intends to reside, and to practice medicine as provided in the preceding section. Section 1409. (e) Penalty for illegal practice. Any person who violates either of the four preceding sections, or who shall practice or offer to practice medicine, without lawful authority, or under cover of a diploma or license illegally obtained, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, or more than five hundred, or by imprisonment for not less than thirty or more than ninety days, or both. The fine when collected shall be paid, the one-half to the person, persons or corporation making the complaint, the other half into the county treasury. Section 1409. (f) Medical officers excepted. Nothing in this chapter shall apply to commissioned medical officers of the United States army or navy, or to the United States hospital service, or to legally qualified dentists in the practice of their profession, or to any woman practicing only midwifery.

In 1883 the following amendment to the medical practice act of 1880 was adopted by the general assembly: Section I. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this act, section 1409 (a) of the code of 1882 be amended by adding the words, "or has, after attending one or more full terms at a regular chartered medical college, been in active practice of medicine since the year 1806," between the words "university" and "and," in the fourth line of said section, so that said section when amended shall read as follows: No person shall practice medicine within this state unless he has been heretofore legally authorized to do so by a diploma from an incorporated medical school or university, or has, after attending one or more full terms at a regular chartered medical college, been in active practice of medicine since the year 1806, or who was by law authorized to practice medicine in 1806. Section II. Be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby repealed.

The law governing the practice of medicine in this state is the act of 1880, as amended in 1883. If the intention of the legislature was to suppress quackery, the law is utterly worthless. In fact, this law should be styled "An act to promote quackery in Georgia." 1st. Our law permits any person holding or claiming to hold a diploma in his or her name from an incorporated medical college, school or university, to practice medicine. It is not required that a diploma from colleges in other states should have the seal of the commonwealth attached, attesting the fact that the college issuing it is an incorporated medical college under the laws of that state. 2d. Even though the college issuing the diploma may be incorporated, this by no means proves that it is a reputable institution. For many years the celebrated Dr. Buchanan made a business of selling medical diplomas at ten dollars each to whomsoever would buy one of him. His institution was incorporated under the laws of the state in which he lived, yet any person who had never been inside of a medical college even upon a visit of curiosity, could, for ten dollars, purchase one of these diplomas, move to Georgia and be placed by our law upon the same plane with the most highly educated physician in our state. 3d. Ridiculous as it may seem, yet the fact remains, the person claiming to hold a diploma is not required to exhibit it to the registrar. He merely takes an oath that he has such a diploma, and the clerk of the superior court is compelled to register him as a legally qualified practitioner of medicine in that county. 4th. Under the law it is not made the duty of any officer to ascertain if or not the oath taken by said licensee is false. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. Therefore the villain is free to palm off upon the unsuspecting citizens of Georgia as a doctor of medicine even though he has never walked into a medical college, or gone to the trouble or expense to purchase one of the Buchanan type. 5th. The law fails to make it the duty of any officer to see that its provisions—as elastic as they are—are carried out. As a consequence the state is literally overrun with quacks—many of them permanently located in the various counties of the state, while scores of them travel from county to county, and advertise themselves as graduates of the most celebrated schools of the world, and thus, protected by a farcical state law, swindle our citizens. So bold are these quacks that when, in 1893, the Medical Association of Georgia attempted to have a law enacted for a state board of medical examiners, before whom all persons claiming to be graduates in medicine should stand an examination in medicine and thus demonstrate their fitness for the high office of physician, quacks sent two of the most distinguished lawyers in Georgia before the legislature to protest against the enactment of such a law. One of these lawyers, an elegant gentleman, and an ex-judge, when asked whom he represented frankly avowed that he was “there in the interest of Dr. ———,” who is a celebrated quack from Massachusetts. The other lawyer—apparently a pleader for a fee—when asked by members of the legislature who he represented, refused to divulge the name of his client, and, with the cunning of the pleader, replied: “I am here to represent every man, woman and child in Georgia.” He misled no one, for his ignorant charges against, and unjustifiable attack upon the regular profession, together with his defense of quackery, but too plainly evidenced the fact that he was the paid attorney of some quack who feared that he and his ilk would no longer be allowed to deceive and swindle the citizens of Georgia. What a mortifying spectacle! Quacks, through paid attorneys, permitted to boldly invade the halls of the general assembly and demand the right under legal protection to carry on their nefarious work. The bill of the State Medical association was the same as that passed by the legislature in December,* 1894, except that the bill proposed in 1893 provided for only one board of medical examiners, before whom all applicants for license to practice medicine in Georgia should appear and demonstrate their fitness as physicians. The bill of 1893 contemplated a board composed of fifteen physicians, thirteen of whom should be from the regular school of medicine, two homeopaths and one eclectic. It provided that homeopaths and eclecticists should stand the same examination as required of the regular physicians on all the fundamental branches of medicine except materia medica and therapeutics, but that upon materia medica and therapeutics homeopaths and eclectics should be examined only by the members of the board belonging to these respective schools of medicine.

All the medical colleges of Georgia of the regular school heartily favored the bill and endeavored to secure its passage. The Atlanta Medical college favored the bill, but requested to be exempted from its provisions until 1895. The bill passed the senate, but was killed in the lower house through the influence of ignorant physicians of the regular school of medicine, together with the homeopaths, eclectics and quacks. The laws of Georgia provided a board of pharmaceutical examiners, and requires of every person to stand an examination before the board, and thus demonstrate his competency as a pharmacist before he can follow that calling.

THE LAW GOVERNING MEDICAL PRACTICE.

In December, 1894, the legislature enacted the following bill, entitled: An act to establish boards of medical examiners for the state of Georgia; to define their duties and powers; to protect the people from illegal and unqualified practitioners of medicine and surgery; to regulate the issuing and recording of licenses; to prescribe penalties for the violation of this act; and for other purposes. Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that within thirty days after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the governor to appoint for this state three separate boards of medical examiners of five members each, as follows: One board to consist of five members of the regular school of medicine, one board of five members of the eclectic school of medicine, and one board of five members of the homeopathic school of medicine. The members of each of said boards shall be men learned in medicine and surgery, and of good moral and professional character, and graduates of reputable medical colleges; but none of them shall be members of the faculty of any medical college. Each of said three boards shall be wholly independent of and separate from the other two in the performance of the duties herein required of each of said boards. A majority of each board shall constitute a quorum.

Section 2. Be it further enacted, that the term of office of said members shall be for the term of three years; provided, that two members of each board shall first be appointed for one year, two for two years, and one for three years; and subsequently each appointment shall be for the full term of three years. Any vacancy that may occur in said board, in consequence of death, resignation, removal from the state, or from other cause, shall be filled for the unexpired term by the governor.

Section 3. Be it further enacted, that immediately and before entering upon the duties of said office, the members of said board of medical examiners shall take the following oath: "I do swear that I will faithfully perform the duties of a member of the board of medical examiners for the state of Georgia, to the best of my ability, so help me God." And shall file the same in the office of the governor of the state, who, upon receiving the said oath of office, shall issue to each examiner a certificate of appointment.

Section 4. Be it further enacted, that immediately after the appointment and qualification of said members, each board shall meet and organize. The officers of said board shall be a president, vice-president, and secretary (who shall act as treasurer). Said officers shall be members of and elected by their respective boards. Each board shall hold two regular meetings in each year. One meeting shall be held at such time, on or just before graduation day of each medical college now chartered, or that may hereafter be chartered, in this state; and the board of examiners, after consultation with the faculty of said college, shall fix a time for its meeting to suit the majority of the students graduating from said college; the other on the second Tuesday in October. The first meeting shall be held in the city of Atlanta, and the succeeding meetings of each board may be held in such city as each board may determine for itself. Special meetings may be held upon the call of the president and two members of each board; but there shall not be less than two regular meetings in each year. Each board may prescribe rules, regulations, and by-laws for its proceedings and government. And each board shall examine and pass upon the qualifications of applicants for the practice of medicine in this state, as herein provided.

Section 5. Be it further enacted, that it shall be the duty of each board, at any of its meetings, to examine only persons making application to it who are graduates from an incorporated college, school or university that requires not less than three full courses of study of six months each, who shall desire to commence the practice of medicine or surgery in the state, and who shall not by the provisions of this act be exempt from such examination; but any person now matriculated as a student of medicine at any medical college, after graduation, and any person from another state who shall have graduated prior to April 1, 1895, at a lawfully chartered medical college requiring only two full courses of study, shall be eligible for examination and license; provided, always, that the applicants for such examination shall have a lawfully conferred diploma from an incorporated medical college which conforms to the system of practice represented by the board to which the application shall be made, unless the applicants desire to practice a different system from that recognized in his diploma; then he shall appear before the board which represents the system that he proposes to practice. But in no event shall an applicant who stands rejected by one of said boards be examined or licensed by either of the other boards. If the applicant desires to practice a system not represented by any of the boards hereby established, he may elect for himself the board before which he will appear for examination. When an applicant shall have passed an examination satisfactory as to proficiency before the board in session, the president thereof shall grant to such applicant a certificate to that effect. A fee of $10 shall be paid to such board, through such officer or member as it may designate, by each applicant, before such examination is had. In case an applicant shall fail to pass a satisfactory examination before the board, he shall not be permitted to stand any further examination before any of the boards within the next three months thereafter. Nor shall he again have to pay the fee prescribed as aforesaid for any subsequent examination; provided, that when, in the opinion of the president of any board, any applicant has been prevented by good cause from appearing before said board, the president and two members of said board designated by him shall constitute a committee who shall examine such applicant, and may, if they see fit, grant him a certificate, which shall have the same force and effect as though granted by a full board, when, if the applicant fail to appear for examination, said certificate shall be void.

Section 6. Be it further enacted, that the funds raised from the fees aforesaid shall be applied by each examining board to the payment of its expenses and to making a reasonable compensation to the president, secretary and members thereof.

Section 7. Be it further enacted, that before any person who obtains a certificate from any board, or from a committee of any board, may lawfully practice medicine or surgery in this state, he shall cause the said certificate to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court in the county in which he resides. But, if he does not reside in the state of Georgia, he shall require said certificate to be recorded in any county within his state in which he offers to practice. The certificate shall be recorded by the clerk, in a book to be kept for that purpose. It shall be indexed in the name of the person to whom the certificate is granted. The clerk's fee for recording a certificate shall be the same as for recording a deed.

Section 8. Be it further enacted, that this act shall take effect from and after the first day of January, 1895, and that it shall be unlawful thereafter for any person to commence the practice of medicine or surgery in this state without complying with the provisions of this act. But nothing in this act shall apply to persons now lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine or surgery in the state of Georgia, to any commissioned medical officer or contract surgeon of the United States army or navy or marine hospital service, in the performance of their duties as such, nor to any physician or surgeon residing in any state or territory of the United States, or in the district of Columbia, who may be, bona fide, called in consultation in a special case with a physician or surgeon residing in this state; nor shall this act be construed as affecting or changing, in any way, laws in reference to license tax to be paid by physicians and surgeons; provided, that a non-resident physician or surgeon, called in consultation in a special case, as above prescribed; shall not be permitted to engage in continuous practice or consultation in connection with any resident physician or surgeon under any form of contract or agreement, direct or indirect.

Section 9. Be it further enacted, that any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine or surgery, within the meaning of this act, who shall prescribe for the sick or those in need of medical or surgical aid, and shall charge or receive money or other compensation or consideration, directly or indirectly; provided, however, that midwives and nurses shall not be regarded as practicing medicine or surgery.

Section 10. Be it further enacted, that any person who shall practice medicine or surgery in this state in violation of the provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction, be punished as prescribed in section 4310 of the Code of the State of Georgia, for each offense; and it shall not be lawful for him to recover, by action, suit, motion, or warrant, any compensation for services which may be claimed to have been rendered by him as such physician or surgeon.

Section 11. Be it further enacted, that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are, hereby repealed.

The bill was promptly approved by Gov. Atkinson, and thus became a law.

BOARDS OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS.

The governor appointed the boards of medical examiners, as follows: Board of examiners for regular school of medicine: F. M. Ridley, La Grange, three years; J. B. Baird, Atlanta, one year; A. A. Smith, Hawkinsville, two years; E. R. Anthony, Griffin, two years; W. A. O'Daniel, Milledgeville, one year. Homeopathic board: C. C. Schley, Savannah, three years; R. A. Hicks, Rome, one year; M. A. Cleckley, Augusta, two years; Charles A. Geiger, Roswell, two years; E. B. Schley, Columbus, one year. Eclectic board: M. T. Salter, Atlanta, one year; M. K. Phillips, Bremen, two years; John F. Harris, Dalton, two years; J. Frank Harris, Thomas county, three years; W. V. Robertson, Rehobath, Morgan Co., one year.

While there was no necessity whatever for these boards, the law must be gratifying to all friends of higher medical education in Georgia. While the act is imperfect, it is beneficial in that it is a death-blow to short college courses and low standards of medical education. These boards of medical examiners have it in their power to enforce a high standard of medical education among graduates of medicine who shall hereafter enter upon the practice in this state. If the standard of medical education be not raised in our commonwealth, the fault will rest with the examining boards, for they have plenary power in the matter. The appointees to membership in these examining boards are reputable and intelligent members of their respective schools of medicine, and to these boards the people of Georgia look for protection against the medical ignoramus, no matter what school of medicine graduates him. Another great benefit of the law, indeed its greatest benefit, is that the horde of unprincipled traveling medical mountebanks can no longer infest the state of Georgia.

MEDICAL SCHOOLS IN GEORGIA.

The medical college of Georgia at Augusta, now the medical department of the university of Georgia, is the oldest medical college in Georgia. Dr. Milton Antony, of Augusta, was its founder. Dr. Antony's connection with the college is set forth in the biographical sketch of this distinguished man. The college began as the medical academy of Georgia, incorporated by the general assembly in 1828. The trustees were: Drs. W. R. Waring, John Carter, Lewis D. Ford, I. P. Garvin, B. A. White, J. G. McWhorter, W. P. McConnel, W. H. Weems, W. P. Graham, T. P. Gorman, A. Jones, Milton Antony, J. I. Boswell, Thomas Hoxey, J. P. Screven, W. C. Daniel, Richard Banks, Henry Hull, John Dent, Thomas Hamilton, Nathan Crawford, O. C. Foot and John Walker. On March 2, 1829, the trustees of the medical academy of Georgia met in the council chamber; Dr. Thomas Hoxey was called to the chair, and Dr. I. P. Garvin appointed secretary. There were present Drs. Antony, Ford, Crawford, Banks and Jones. The following were elected professors of the academy: Lewis D. Ford, M. D., professor of materia medica, chemistry and pharmacy; Milton Antony, M. D., professor of institutes and practice of medicine, and midwifery and diseases of women and children; William R. Waring, M. D., professor of anatomy and surgery.

The act authorized the trustees "to establish within the corporate limits of the city of Augusta a medical academy for the state of Georgia, on such principle, and under such rules and regulations, and with such professors, instructors and officers as may be best calculated to perpetuate the same, and promote the improvement of its pupils in the several branches of the healing art." It was further provided that the trustees should annually assemble at the medical academy for an examination into its affairs, five to be a quorum, and that the said "trustees, together with the regular professors and teachers in the institution, shall constitute a board of examination to decide on the merits of such candidates as may have studied in the said institution at least once a year, and complied with all the conditions imposed by the board of trustees as preliminary to such examination, and confer the degree of bachelor of medicine on such as in their judgment may be worthy of the same." The trustees were to keep a record "in which shall be registered the name, age and place of nativity of each and every person who shall receive from this institution the degree of bachelor of medicine, and the time when the said degree was conferred, together with the names of the board of examination present." The trustees were allowed to hold real and personal property for the uses of the medical academy to the amount of $100,000, and the graduates of the institution were to be allowed to practice medicine and surgery as if licensed by the state board of physicians.

By an act of the legislature passed Dec. 19, 1829, the name "Medical Academy of Georgia" was changed to "the Medical Institute of the State of Georgia," and the trustees of the institution were empowered "to confer the degree of doctor of medicine upon such applicants, in such manner, at such times, and under such circumstances as may to the said board seem fit and proper, provided that the degree of doctor of medicine shall in no case be conferred on any person who shall not have attended two full courses of lectures in the institute, or one course in some other respectable medical college or university, and one in the institute in addition to the usual term of private instruction required by other institutions of a like kind." The meeting of the board on April 9, 1832, added three more professorships, making a faculty of six: Milton Antony, professor of obstetrics and diseases of children; L. A. Dugas, professor of anatomy; J. A. Eve, professor of materia medica and therapeutics; L. D. Ford, professor of chemistry and pharmacy; Paul E. Eve, professor of surgery; John Dent, professor of practice of medicine. The first commencement exercises occurred on April 17, 1833, at the institute, on the lot now occupied by the Widows' home. The address was delivered by A. B. Longstreet, Esq., the president of the board, the first graduates being: Isaac Bowen, Edward A. Eve, Thomas W. Grimes and John McD. Borders. The number of matriculates was thirty. The institution continued to succeed, and in 1833 the name was changed to the "Medical College of Georgia." By an act passed Dec. 20, 1833, the name "the Medical Institute of the State of Georgia" was changed to "the Medical College of Georgia," which it has since retained. The act appropriated $10,000 "for the purpose of enabling the board of trustees of said institution to procure a suitable piece or lot of land, erect thereon such buildings, and make such other improvements as may be necessary for the various purposes of a medical college, and to procure a suitable library, apparatus and museum for said institution, and such other things as may be necessary to the proper and successful operation of the same." It was also provided that fifty lots on the town commons of Augusta, to be designated by the city council, should be sold and the proceeds paid over to the college. By an act passed in 1826 the bank of Augusta was empowered to increase its capital stock up to $600,000, one-sixth of an increase made to be reserved to the state at par up to the end of the legislative session ensuing such increase, and by act of Dec. 23, 1835, the medical college of Georgia was given the same rights of priority and all advantage derivable therefrom as to the increased stock of this bank as the state had under the act of 1826. The donation from the latter source was estimated to be $25,000. The city council of Augusta donated the sum of $5,000 to the college, and the members of the college faculty subscribed $10,000 to the enterprise. The trustees of the academy of Richmond county donated the lot on which the building stands. With these several sums of money the trustees erected an elegant Grecian Doric building, divided into a library room, three lecture rooms, a chemical laboratory, anatomical rooms, biological laboratory and museum. The building was erected in 1835. The library of the college numbers 5,000 volumes. The museum is one of the largest and most valuable among the colleges of America, consisting in part of anatomical and pathological specimens, many of which were purchased in Europe. The biological laboratory is thoroughly equipped for practical work in physiology and pathology.

After Dr. Antony's death the faculty was constituted as follows: George M. Newton, M. D., dean of faculty and professor of anatomy; L. A. Dugas, M. D., professor of physiology and pathological anatomy; Alexander Means, M. D., professor of chemistry and pharmacy; Paul F. Eve, M. D., professor of principles and practice of surgery; Joseph A. Eve, M. D., professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and infants; Lewis D. Ford, M. D., professor of principles and practice of medicine; I. P. Garvin, M. D., professor of therapeutics and materia medica; Henry F. Campbell, M. D., demonstrator of anatomy. This college has an early and most creditable record on the subject of higher medical education. The late Prof. Joseph A. Eve, in an address before the class of the college in 1848, said on this subject:

When this college was organized, the faculty and trustees, especially the illustrious founder, Dr. Milton Antony, deplored the defectiveness of the system of medical education in the colleges of the United States, and earnestly endeavored to correct it. They recognized the shortness of the collegiate term as the principal and radical defect, and in fact the foundation of all or nearly all the rest.

So zealous were our trustees and faculty for reformation—so determined at all hazards to effect it—so confident were they of the approbation and support of the liberal and enlightened members of a liberal and learned profession, that they extended their regular collegiate course from the usual term of four, to six full months, no portion being taken up by preliminary lectures not included in the regular course. Trusting that the advantages of the long term would be appreciated and acknowledged by physicians and students, they persevered, but with little encouragement or patronage, to lecture six months, for five successive years. Although all professed to approve their plan, very few were found willing to remain here six months when they could accomplish the same object, the acquisition of a degree in other schools, in four; for, unfortunately, with too many, a diploma appears to be the loftiest object of aspiration—the determining motive in attending lectures—when it should be regarded as a trivial circumstance, only a secondary and unimportant consequent thereon, as the mere shadow to the substance. They had the mortification to lecture to seats almost vacant, and to behold medical students hastening in crowds to fill the halls of four months' colleges. Convinced by fair experiment that they could not effect a reformation without a concurrence of other medical institutions, in 1835 they addressed a circular to all the colleges in the United States, suggesting to them the propriety of a convention to consider the subject of reform and to adopt some plan for the accomplishment of that great and desirable object. In this circular it was proposed, in compliment to the university of Pennsylvania, the oldest college in the United States, to leave the time of meeting, the number of delegates from each college, etc., to be determined by them. From some colleges replies were received favorable to the proposed object. Some expressed themselves as disinclined to make any innovation, whilst others, unwilling to commit themselves, remained silent. Great hope was entertained that the university of Pennsylvania would be found ready to second the enterprise, but this expectation was not realized; the reply received from that university is as follows: Philadelphia, Nov. 15, 1845.—Dear Sir: Shortly after the receipt of yours of May 19, I informed you of the fact, and of my intention to lay the communication on the subject of modifying the terms of admission into the profession of medicine before the medical faculty at their first business meeting. Having lately executed this promise, I have now to state that the medical faculty, after giving it full consideration, have thought it better for each school to adopt such regulations as might suit its particular views, than to enter into any general obligations on the subject when there exists no competent power to prevent their violation. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. E. Horner, dean, etc.

Last year, 1847, the university of Pennsylvania extended their regular course of lectures to five months, with an additional month of preliminary lectures unconnected with the former, since which they have claimed priority of movement in establishing a six months' course, and called on the profession to sustain them in this effort. Can they do this with justice? Disappointed in their endeavors to induce other schools to come up to a higher standard, the faculty of the college were at last compelled to come down themselves and adopt the four months' term, and content themselves with remodeling and improving their course of lectures—making their examinations more rigid, and requiring higher qualifications in their graduates. After the adoption of the four months' term their classes increased rapidly, far beyond the expectations of their most sanguine friends. But the Medical college of Georgia have never been satisfied with success based upon the abandonment of the principal and distinctive advantage in their own, and the adoption of what they condemn as a radical defect in the system of instruction in other colleges. They have been reluctantly constrained to submit, by the force of circumstances which they could not control; but they have ever anxiously awaited opportunity to return to their original plan. With joy they heard in 1846 a call made, by a physician in New York, to assemble a convention of professors and physicians, and with deep regret an illiberal endeavor to frustrate it, by a professor in the same city. They have been ever ready to co-operate in any enterprise for the improvement of medical education, and to adopt any practicable measures that might be proposed by the convention.

Opposed to reformation, as our northern brethren appeared to be, when the call was made from the south, we rejoice to find they have awakened to its importance and become convinced of its necessity. The meeting of the National association at Baltimore in May afforded an excellent opportunity to ascertain the views of the profession on this subject. Among physicians unconnected with colleges there was but one sentiment; among professors, too, there was great unanimity with respect to the necessity for reform, but some differences as to the means by which it should be accomplished. The American Medical association at this meeting confirmed the following resolutions, which had been adopted by the National Medical convention in Philadelphia, May, 1847: "Resolved, First, that it be recommended to all the colleges to extend the period employed in lecturing from four to six months."

The Medical college of Georgia have prolonged their lectures to five months, the longest period to which any college have extended their term, exclusive of preliminary lectures not essential to or connected with the regular course. They would have gladly complied with the recommendation of the convention from the very first and to the very fullest extent; but it is not surprising that they should be cautious in resuming a position from which they have been compelled to retreat, after a self-sacrificing struggle of five years, until it could be ascertained whether there would be a concurrence of any other schools in the south and west; they, determined, however, after the meeting of the association they would adopt the five months' course. Six months would have been preferable, but prudence had been taught by experience—they were content to take one step at a time.

From the above it will be seen that to the Medical college of Georgia is due the distinction of being the first American medical college to insist upon six months' course of lectures, and an endeavor to make this the rule of practice in all American colleges, and only gave up the struggle after five years of fruitless endeavor to enlist the co-operation of other colleges. Several years after the war it reduced the length of session to four months, but soon after it resumed the five months' session.

In May, 1893, the faculty of the school was reorganized. The faculty immediately determined to elevate the standard of medical education, to enlarge its clinical facilities, and to make several important changes in its curriculum. The course of the present year differs from that of previous years in several particulars. First: Preliminary education. The following are the existing requirements for matriculation: A student applying for matriculation must possess the following qualifications, viz.: He must hold a certificate as a pupil of some known reputable physician showing his moral character and general fitness to enter the study of medicine, and he must possess a diploma of graduation from some literary or scientific institution; or a certificate from some legally constituted high school, the general superintendent of some county board of public schools, attesting the fact that he has at least the educational attainments required of a second grade teacher of public schools. Provided, however, that if a student is unable to furnish the foregoing documentary evidence of literary qualifications, he may by a preliminary examination satisfy the faculty that he is possessed of these attainments, and if he fails in this he may be permitted to matriculate and receive medical instruction as other students and qualify himself in the required literary departments and stand the examination as above specified prior to offering himself for graduation. Second: Requiring three courses of six months each, instead of two courses of five months. Third: Graded course.

First course students are required to attend lectures and instruction in the following departments only, viz.: Anatomy, physiology, chemistry and materia medica and therapeutics, and are not required to attend clinics, but may do so if they so desire.

Second course students, in addition to the above, must attend all the lectures and all clinics. At the end of this course the student must apply for final examination in anatomy, physiology, theoretical chemistry, and materia medica and therapeutics. If he fails to pass any or all of these examinations satisfactorily, he may come up again at the end of the third course.

Third course students, who have passed satisfactory final examinations on anatomy, physiology, theoretical chemistry and materia medica, are not obliged to attend lectures on these branches, but must attend all other lectures and all clinics, and take laboratory courses in histology, pathology, operative surgery and practical chemistry. Each student is required to dissect every part of the body. The dissecting should be done during the first and second courses.

Requirements for Graduation.—A candidate for the degree of doctor of medicine must be twenty-one years of age, of good moral character, and have attended three courses of lectures of not less than six months each in three different years, the last of which shall have been in this college. (This does not apply to those students who have attended a full course of lectures before the session of 1893-94, and apply at the end of the session of 1894-95.) A student who has attended two full courses of lectures on anatomy, physiology, theoretical chemistry, materia medica and therapeutics, must come up for final examination on these branches at the end of the second course. A candidate for graduation must show satisfactory evidence of having dissected every part of the human body and taken the prescribed laboratory courses in histology, pathology, chemistry and operative surgery. Hygiene, medical jurisprudence, practical microscopy and practical pharmacy have been added to the curriculum. The didactic and clinical instruction in this school is equal to that of any medical college in the south. The clinical advantages are greater here than in any southern school known to me. The City hospital, the Freedman's hospital, the jail, the Medical and Surgical polyclinic and two medical dispensaries are under the sole control of the faculty of the college.

In August, 1872, by formal action of the board of trustees of the university of Georgia, the Medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, was constituted the medical department of the university of this state, and it still holds this position. The graduates from this college number 2,000, among whom are many of the most eminent medical men in the south. Many graduates of this school have held, and now hold, professorships in some of the most renowned medical colleges in this section of the United States.

This school has numbered among its teachers some of the ablest men known to American medicine. Such men as L. A. Dugas, Lewis D. Ford, Henry F.

Campbell, Paul F. Eve, Joseph A. Eve, Milton Antony and George M. Newton. The present faculty is constituted as follows: Wm. E. Boggs, chancellor, D. D., LL. D., Athens; Geo. W. Rains, M. D., LL. D., Augusta, emeritus professor of chemistry; DeSaussure Ford, A. M., M. D., Augusta, professor of the principles and practice of surgery; Thos. R. Wright, M. D., Augusta, professor of operative and clinical surgery, dean; Theodore Lamb, M. D., Augusta, professor of the principles of medicine and diseases of the chest; Wm. H. Doughty, Jr., A. B., M. D., Augusta, professor of anatomy and clinical surgery; Geo. A. Wilcox, M. D., Augusta, professor of materia medica and therapeutics and gynecology; Eugene Foster, M. D., Augusta, professor practice of medicine and state medicine; James M. Hull, M. D., Augusta, professor of ophthalmology, otology and laryngology; Thomas D. Coleman, A. B., M. D., Augusta, professor of physiology and pathology, secretary; Joseph E. Willett, A. M., M. D., Ph. D., LL. D., Augusta, professor of chemistry and pharmacy; Joseph Eve Allen, M. D., Augusta, professor of obstetrics and pediatrics.

The Atlanta Medical College.—This institution was organized in 1854 with the following corps of professors: Horace Nelson, M. D., of New York, professor of anatomy; John W. Jones, M. D., of Auburn, Ala., professor of theory and practice of medicine; Willis Westmoreland, formerly of this state, but for some time past resident at Paris, France, professor of surgery; James M. Gordon, M. D., of Savannah, Ga., professor of surgery; John S. Duval, M. D., of Texas, professor of chemistry; R. A. T. Ridley, M. D., La Grange, Ga., professor of physiology and pathological anatomy; John B. Calhoun, M. D., of Newnan, Ga., professor of surgical anatomy and medical jurisprudence; John G. Westmoreland, M. D., of Atlanta, Ga., professor of materia medica. In 1855 the faculty was reorganized, and constituted as follows: A. H. Buchanan, M. D. (of the Nashville university), professor of anatomy; W. F. Westmoreland, M. D., professor of surgery; John W. Jones, M. D., professor of practice; Jesse Boring, M. D., professor of obstetrics; Joseph P. Logan, M. D., professor of physiology; Henry W. Brown, M. D., professor of chemistry; J. G. Westmoreland, M. D., professor of materia medica and therapeutics; S. W. Anthony, M. D., demonstrator of anatomy.

"The Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," October, 1855, has the following notice of the college: "The Atlanta Medical college has recently closed its first session, having a respectable class of seventy-eight students. The trial of a summer session has therefore proved to be quite a successful experiment. Its faculty deserves much credit for their laudable zeal, and have every reason to be gratified at the result of their efforts." This college continued a successful career until the civil war, when, in common with all southern colleges, it suspended until hostilities closed. The college was then re-organized, and for years has been, and is now, more prosperous than any of the Georgia medical colleges. Throughout the career of this institution it has numbered among its faculty some of the most distinguished practitioners and teachers in the United States. The college building is a handsome, commodious structure; divided into lecture rooms, pathological laboratory, chemical laboratory, practical anatomy rooms, museum, etc. The course embraces the entire domain of medicine, including practical training in chemistry and microscopy. Clinical medicine is duly appreciated, and abundant clinical instruction imparted to the student through the clinics at the college building and the Grady hospital, five of the members of the college faculty being on the visiting staff of the Grady hospital.

The catalogue for 1894-1895 states the requirements of the institution for graduation of students to be as follows:

Requirements for Graduation, Session 1894-5.—The candidate must be twenty-one years of age, of good moral character, and must present to the proctor the requisite evidence of having studied medicine three years, inclusive of attendance upon lectures. He must have attended two courses of lectures of five months each in two separate years, in a recognized medical college, the last of which shall have been in this institution. He must present to the proctor, by the first of February, a thesis of his own composition, and in his own handwriting, on thesis paper, on a medical subject. The amount of graduation fee must be deposited with the thesis; in case of failure to pass a satisfactory examination, the money will be refunded. A report of any of the clinics will be accepted in lieu of the ordinary thesis. He must pass a satisfactory examination on anatomy, physiology, chemistry, materia medica, practice and general pathology, obstetrics and diseases of women and children, diseases of the eyes, ear and throat, surgery and physical diagnosis.

Educational Requirements.—First course students at matriculation will be required to give satisfactory evidence to the faculty of such educational qualifications as will be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of their medical studies. These requirements will be similar to those of other reputable medical colleges in this country. But if a student so applying be unable to furnish evidence of such literary qualifications, he will be permitted to matriculate and prosecute his medical studies, and be allowed to qualify himself prior to application for graduation.

*The Last Session of the Two Years' Course.—Recognizing the demands of the present day for a higher standard of medical education and a more thorough preparation for the practice of medicine, the Atlanta Medical college will hereafter require attendance upon three courses of instruction as a preliminary to graduation. This requirement will be applied only to students who take their first course of lectures subsequent to the issue of this catalogue. Students who have already attended one course of lectures in a regular medical college in good standing will be allowed to graduate after attending the session of 1894-95 in this college and passing a satisfactory examination.

Faculty.—A. W. Griggs, M. D., emeritus professor of practice; William Abram Love, M. D., professor of physiology and pathological anatomy; A. W. Calhoun, M. D., LL. D., professor of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat; H. V. M. Miller, M. D., LL. D., professor of principles and practice of medicine, and dean of the faculty; W. S. Armstrong, M. D., professor of anatomy and clinical surgery; J. S. Todd, M. D., professor of materia medica and therapeutics; Virgil O. Hardon, M. D., professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children; Louis H. Jones, A. M., M. D., professor of general and medical chemistry and medical jurisprudence; W. F. Westmoreland, M. D., professor of principles and practice of surgery; W. S. Kendrick, M. D., professor of clinical medicine and physical diagnosis, and proctor.

Southern Medical Institution.—This institution is located in Atlanta. It has had a prosperous career during the sixteen years of its existence. The building is of modern construction, commodious and fully equipped for advanced medical teaching. The course of instruction will cover a graded course of three terms of lectures of six months each, in three separate years, divided between the years as follows: First year.—Anatomy, chemistry, physiology, materia medica, histology, and microscopy. Second year.—Anatomy, chemistry, physiology, materia medica, surgery, pathology and pathological anatomy, practice of medicine and obstetrics. Third year.—Surgery and clinical surgery, medicine and clinical medicine, operative surgery and venereal diseases, obstetrics and gynecology, diseases of the eye, ear, throat and nose, bacteriology and urinary analysis. Students who so desire can stand examinations at the end of the second term and receive certificates of proficiency in the branches of anatomy, materia medica, physiology and chemistry. No further examinations will then be required in these studies. Clinical instruction in this institution is furnished from two sources. First, the clinics held daily in the college building; second, Grady hospital. Two members of this faculty are members of the visiting staff of Grady hospital. Clinical material is abundant in quantity at this school. The faculty is an able one, and the course of instruction is thorough.

Requirements for Matriculation.—Every student applying for matriculation must possess the following qualifications: He must hold a certificate as the pupil of some known reputable physician, showing his moral character and general fitness to enter upon the study of medicine. He must possess a diploma of graduation from some literary or scientific institution of learning, or certificate from some legally constituted high school, general superintendent of state education, or superintendent of some county board of public education, attesting the fact that he is possessed of at least the educational attainments required of second grade teachers of public schools; provided, however, that if a student so applying is unable to furnish the above and foregoing evidence of literary qualifications, he may be permitted to matriculate and receive medical instruction as other students, and qualify himself in the required literary departments, and stand his required examination as above specified prior to offering himself for a second course of lectures. The foregoing diploma or certificate of educational qualifications, attested by the dean of the medical college attended, together with a set of tickets, showing that the holder has attended one full course of medical lectures, shall be essential to attendance upon a second course of lectures.

Requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Medicine.—1. The candidate must be twenty-one years of age, of good character, and must have attended three full courses of lectures of six months each in a medical school recognized by this institution, the last of which shall have been in this college. 2. He must have dissected the different parts of the body in this or some other regular medical school during two terms of lectures. 3. He shall undergo a personal and satisfactory examination before the faculty. This examination must take place at the close of the session. 4. He must have attended, actually, three-fourths of each course of six months spent in this school, as required by the laws of Georgia. 5. He must have settled all indebtedness to the college, as shown by the books of the proctor. 6. He must have attended a laboratory course in each of the following: Chemistry, histology and operative surgery. 7. He must have attended two courses of clinical or hospital instruction. His conduct while in college must have been unexceptionable. (Note.—The requirements in reference to attendance upon three courses of lectures, two courses of dissecting, and laboratory courses, apply only to students who have not attended a course of lectures before Sept. 1, 1893.) Any student who attended a course of regular lectures before that date may attend the course of 1894-5 in this institution, and apply for graduation at the end of that term. By the ruling of the Southern Medical College association, this is the last opportunity offered for such student to graduate without attending two full courses in addition to that already taken. After 1894-5 every student will be required to present tickets for three full courses as a requisite to graduation.

Faculty.—Thomas Spencer Powell, M. D., professor of obstetrics and diseases of women, and lecturer on medical ethics; Wm. Perrin Nicolson, M. D., professor of anatomy and lecturer on clinical surgery, and surgeon to Grady hospital; Gustavus Garnett Roy, M. D., professor of materia medica and therapeutics, and lecturer on diseases of children; James McFadden Gaston, M. D., professor of principles and practice of surgery; Charles Shepherd Webb, Ph. B., M. D., professor of the principles and practice of medicine; William Simpson Elkin, M. D., professor of operative surgery and genito-urinary diseases, and surgeon to Grady hospital; Henry F. Harris, M. D., professor of chemistry and lecturer on pathology and histology; Floyd Wilcox McRae, M. D., professor of physiology and lecturer on clinical surgery and diseases of the rectum; Logan M. Crichton, M. D., professor of diseases of nose and throat; Dunbar Roy, A. B., M. D., professor of diseases of the eye and ear; J. B. S. Holmes, M. D., adjunct professor of obstetrics and gynecology.

Oglethorpe Medical College.—This college was located in Savannah. It was organized in 1855, with the following corps of medical teachers: H. L. Byrd, M. D., late of Savannah Medical college, professor of principles and practice of physics; E. LeRoy Antony, M. Marsh, John A. Mayer, and John A. Owens. How long this school existed, and what success it met with, I am unable to state. I applied to physicians in Savannah for data to write the history of this school, but could not get the necessary information.

Savannah Spring School of Medicine.—“The Southern Medical and Surgical Journal” for 1856 has the following notice of the above named institution: “Savannah Spring School of Medicine.—An organization under the above name has been formed in our city. The term of lectures is to be from the middle of March to the end of June. The lecturers are Holmes Steele, M. D., on obstetrics, the physiology of generation, and diseases of women and children; John M. Johnson, M. D., on medical chemistry and materia medica; Joseph J. West, M. D., on anatomy, the physiology of the viscera, etc., and Charles H. Colding, M. D., on minor and operative surgery. Fee, $50, in advance.”

Savannah Medical College.—This college was organized in 1853. The course commenced with the following corps of professors: Dr. R. D. Arnold, on the theory and practice of medicine; Dr. P. M. Kollock, on obstetrics and diseases of women and children; Dr. W. G. Bullock, on the principles and practice of surgery; Dr. G. W. West, on medical chemistry; Dr. H. L. Byrd, on materia medica and therapeutics; Dr. E. H. Martin, on physiology; Dr. J. G. Howard, on anatomy; Dr. J. B. Read, demonstrator of anatomy, on pathological anatomy. Nunn, of Georgia; George W. Cleland, of Georgia; Joseph J. West, of Georgia. During the session of 1854 the class numbered forty-nine, of whom seventeen were graduated. In 1855 the graduates numbered twelve. This institution continued its exercises for a number of years, and met with reasonable success. In 1879 the faculty was constituted as follows: W. M. Charters, M. D., professor of obstetrics; J. G. Thomas, M. D., professor of the theory and practice of medicine; W. H. Elliott, M. D., professor of the principles and practice of surgery; W. Duncan, M. D., professor of clinical medicine, and dean of faculty; B. S.

Purse, M. D., professor of materia medica and therapeutics; J. P. S. Houstoun, M. D., professor of physiology; George H. Stone, M. D., professor of anatomy.

THE MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

In February, 1849, the faculty of the medical college of Georgia, feeling the necessity of organizing the medical profession of the state, published the following notice in the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," issued at Augusta:

"To the Physicians of Georgia.—The faculty of the medical college of Georgia suggest to the medical profession of the state the propriety of organizing an association. Since the institution of the National or American association, our sister states, Alabama and South Carolina, have taken action on the subject. It is therefore proper to call a convention of the physicians of Georgia, to be held in the city of Augusta on next Tuesday, Feb. 20; then to adopt such measures for the improvement and benefit of the profession as they may deem proper." After the publication of the above notice the Georgia Medical society of Savannah suggested that the meeting be held in the city of Macon March 20, Macon being more centrally located than Augusta. The faculty of the medical college of Georgia, desirous of unanimity on the subject, accordingly issued a circular and addressed it to all the Georgia subscribers of the "Journal," stating their cheerful acquiescence in the suggestions of the medical society of Savannah. The meeting, therefore, of the physicians of the state was called for March 20 in the city of Macon.

In pursuance of the above call the convention assembled in Macon at 10 o'clock on the morning of March 20, 1849. About eighty delegates were present, the delegates representing the counties of Baker, Baldwin, Bibb, Burke, Chatham, Clarke, Cobb, Crawford, Dooley, Fayette, Floyd, Gwinnett, Henry, Houston, Jasper, Jones, Lee, Madison, Meriwether, Monroe, Morgan, Muscogee, Oglethorpe, Pike, Richmond, Stewart, Sumter, Troup, Twiggs, Upson and Washington. On motion a committee of one from each county represented was appointed by the chair to select permanent officers for the convention. The convention being thus organized, on motion the president designated the following gentlemen a committee to draft a constitution and by-laws: Drs. R. D. Arnold, J. M. Green, Thos. Hoxey, Chas. West, Hugh J. Ogliby, R. Q. Dickinson, James M. Gordon. After some discussion and modification the constitution and by-laws were unanimously adopted. The convention then resolved itself into "The Medical Society of the State of Georgia." The first business in order being the election of officers, a ballot was ordered, and the following gentlemen were declared duly elected: President, Dr. Lewis D. Ford; first vice-president, Dr. R. D. Arnold; second vice-president, Dr. Thomas R. Lamar; corresponding secretary, Dr. James M. Green; recording secretary, Dr. C. T. Quintard. The society then proceeded to ballot for delegates to the "American Medical association." On counting the votes it appeared that the following gentlemen were elected, viz.: Drs. Thos. Hoxey, T. F. Green, H. J. Ogliby, E. L. Strohecker, Robert Campbell, I. E. Dupree, W. B. Stevens. The following committee was appointed to memorialize the legislature on the necessity of instituting a regular registration of marriages, births and deaths: Drs. Arnold, Strohecker, Ogliby, Geo. A. Winn, G. F. Cooper. A resolution was introduced and adopted that a committee of one from each congressional district, of which the president of the society shall be chairman, be appointed to address the profession at large on the expediency of forming auxiliary societies and other matters. The president appointed the following: Drs. L. D. Ford, Thos. Stewardson, Chas. West, E. F. Knott, W. P. Beasley, Wm. N.

King, W. L. Jones, Asbury Kingman. A resolution was passed that the next annual meeting of the society take place in the city of Macon on the second Tuesday in April, 1850.

The constitution states the objects of the society and qualifications for membership as follows: The object of this society shall be for the advancement of medical knowledge, the elevation of professional character, the protection of the interests of its members, the extension of the bounds of medical science, and the promotion of all measures adapted to relieve suffering humanity and to protect the lives and improve the health of the community. Sec. 1.—The society shall consist of every person now present as a member of the state medical convention, who is a graduate of a respectable medical college, or who may be authorized to practice by the legislative act of 1839, re-constituting the medical board of the state, and who shall conform to the regulations of the society. Sec. 2.—Any member of the profession thus qualified can hereafter, on written application to the society through the corresponding secretary, be admitted to it by a vote of two-thirds of the members present. Sec. 3.—The society shall hold an annual meeting on the second Wednesday in the month of April of each year. The place of meeting shall be determined for each succeeding year by a vote of the society. The constitution also provided for the organization of auxiliary societies in the various counties of the state, and required such societies to conform to the constitution of the State Medical society and the code of ethics of the American Medical association.

A MIGRATORY BODY.

The society has always been a migratory body, meeting each year in some one of the large towns or cities of the state. The society continued under the constitution of 1849 until 1868, when a new constitution was adopted. The objects of the society have always been as declared in article 2 of the original constitution. The constitution of 1868 withdrew the privilege of membership from licentiates of the state board of medical examiners, and adopted the following article: "The members of this institution shall collectively represent and have cognizance of the common interests of the medical profession in every part of the state, and shall hold their appointment to membership, either as delegates from local institutions, as members by invitation, or as permanent members. The delegates shall receive their appointment from permanently organized medical societies, medical colleges, hospitals, lunatic asylums and other permanently organized medical and sanitary institutions of good standing in the state. Each delegate shall hold his appointment for one year, and until another is appointed to succeed him, and shall participate in all the business and affairs of the association. The permanent members shall consist of all those who have served in the capacity of delegates, and of such other members as may receive the appointment by a two-thirds vote, and shall continue such so long as they remain in good standing in the body from which they were sent as delegates. Permanent members shall at all times be entitled to attend the meetings and participate in the affairs of the association so long as they shall continue to conform to its regulations. Every member elected prior to the permanent organization of the annual meeting or before voting on any question after the meeting has been organized, must sign these regulations, inscribing his name and address in full, specifying in what capacity he attends, and if a delegate the title of the society and institution from which he has received his appointment, at the same time stating that he is a (regular) graduate of medicine from some regularly chartered college."

The constitution of 1868 also changed the name of the society and adopted that of "The Medical Association of Georgia." In 1873 a new constitution was adopted, the only material changes being the article on membership. Article 3 of the existing constitution, adopted in 1873, reads as follows: "Sec. 1.—There shall be only one class of members in this association. Every regularly educated medical man within the limits of the state who is a graduate of a regular medical college in good standing, and who adopts and conforms to the code of ethics of the American Medical association, shall be eligible to membership in this body." The other material change in the organic law of the association was the organization of a high court in the body, known as "the board of censors." The duties and powers of the board of censors are as follows: Sec. 1.—The board of censors shall hold annual meetings, concurrently with the annual sessions of the association, to whom shall be referred all applications for membership with vouchers from two members, and in such case their decision shall be reported to the body for action. Three of their number shall constitute a quorum, and the chairman and secretary shall be designated by the president." Sec. 2.—They shall take cognizance of all offenses against the association or its code of ethics, and shall be authorized to strike from the list of membership all violators of its regulations, and shall report the names of individuals and the offense for which action has been taken immediately to the association, at which time or at the next succeeding meeting all such individuals may have the right to appeal to that body.

EVERY DISTINGUISHED PHYSICIAN A MEMBER.

The association has since its first organization embraced in its membership every distinguished physician in Georgia. At its annual meetings numerous medical papers are read and discussed. The year book issued by this body is regarded among the ablest issued by the various state medical societies in America. The medical association of Georgia is, and has ever been, conspicuous in American medicine by reason of the marked ability of many of its members. Many of the ablest papers in the year books of the American Medical association, the American Public Health association, the American Surgical association, the American Gynecological society, the International Medical congress of 1876, and the Pan-American Medical congress of 1892, are from the pen of members of our State Medical association. Many of its members have attained world-wide fame. The association has been constant and zealous in promoting the objects of its organizations. Its membership numbers 369, from various counties in the state. There are about 1,500 regular physicians in Georgia, all of whom should be active members of an association with the high aims and purposes which animate the state association. Yet it seems impossible to enlist their co-operation. As a consequence of the lack of interest in the state association on the part of the majority of the physicians in our state the profession is utterly devoid of influence in shaping medical legislation. As individuals the physicians of Georgia are foremost in public confidence and respect in their respective communities, but collectively, it must be confessed, no equally reputable body of men is so poor in public influence in matters pertaining to their own calling. So far as my information extends the physicians of the state have failed to secure the passage of any medical bill carried before the general assembly. I cite a few recent instances: In 1875 the association sent a committee of its members before the legislature asking that the state establish an inebriate asylum, but the general assembly refused the request. In 1889 the Medical Association of Georgia, alive to its duties as conservators of the public health, prepared and presented to the legislature a bill for a state board of health. The bill contemplated the support of the board by use of the annual state tax on doctors. But the "Potiphar peagreens" in the assembly promptly killed the bill because it cost something and that something only the annual tax wrongfully imposed upon physicians of the state. Here is a high tribute to the unselfishness of the medical profession of Georgia. Striving as a body to decrease the burden of preventable sickness and death in the entire state, and to the extent that the effort should be successful, thus sacrifice their professional incomes, yet hindered in their noble, self-sacrificing effort because of the insignificant annual cost of maintenance of a state sanitary board.

In 1893 the association renewed its efforts before the legislature to secure a state board of health. But this effort failed of success. In 1893 the State Medical association, desiring to elevate the standard of medical education in Georgia, drafted a bill solely in the interest of higher medical education in this state and asked the legislature to enact this bill, but it was defeated by the ignorance of our school of medicine with the aid of the irregulars and quacks.

MEDICAL JOURNALS.

"The Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," published at Atlanta, Ga., was the first medical journal published in the southern states so far as known to me. Indeed at the date of its entry into the field of journalism there were not more than six or eight medical periodicals in America. The publication of this journal originated with Dr. Milton Antony, the illustrious founder of the medical college of Georgia. Dr. Antony was the editor, with Dr. Joseph A. Eve as associate editor. The first number was issued Oct. 1, 1836. It was published monthly, each number containing sixty-four pages. The object of the journal was declared to be as follows, from the introductory of the editor: "The profession at the south have long regarded and anticipated as a most desirable object the establishment of a journal that should collect and preserve the valuable discoveries and improvements of southern practitioners relative to the nature and treatment of diseases incident to southern climates." But it would be a mistake to conclude that this journal confined itself to the narrow field outlined in the introductory. It was a thoroughly first-class publication in every particular, covering all departments of medicine. Each issue presented original articles from some of the ablest physicians, surgeons and obstetricians in the south. It was divided into other departments than original communications, such as editorials, native and foreign correspondence, selections and articles from American and European journals, reports of medical societies, reviews of current medical literature, medical items of interest, etc. One of the striking features of the journal throughout its entire publication was the marked ability of its editorials. It differed from medical periodicals of to-day markedly, in the fact that it depended for support on the merit of the journal, that is, upon the high order of its medical literature, rather than revenue from advertisements. Published in Augusta, noted for the learning of its practitioners of medicine, these distinguished physicians made the journal the object of their love and pride, and vied with one another in contributing frequently and ably to its pages. The ablest physicians in Georgia and of the south made numerous and valuable contributions to this journal. An examination of all the volumes of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," embracing a period from 1836 to 1866, demonstrated the fact that it was one of the ablest medical periodicals ever published in America. Throughout its long, useful and honorable career, the "Journal" was singularly devoted to the promotion of medical science, professional brotherhood and medical ethics. It had a large circulation in all of the southern states, and exerted a powerful influence in the upbuilding of medical science. With the publication of the first volume, Dr. Joseph A. Eve withdrew as associate editor, leaving its editorial management solely in the hands of Dr. Milton Antony. Upon the death of Dr. Antony in 1839 the "Journal" was suspended until Jan. 1, 1845, at which date its publication was resumed under the editorial management of Profs. Paul F. Eve and I. P. Garvin, members of the faculty of the medical college of Georgia. These gentlemen continued the editorial management until 1847, when Prof. Garvin retired leaving Prof. Paul F. Eve as editor. In 1850 Prof. Eve retired from the editorial chair, being succeeded by Prof. Garvin, who was succeeded in 1851 by Prof. L. A. Dugas. In an editorial in May, 1851, page 315, I find the following reference to the career of this journal: "This journal has, therefore, been edited during the issue of the nine volumes (old and new series) preceding the present one, alternately by Profs. M. Antony, Joseph A. Eve, Paul F. Eve and I. P. Garvin. That these frequent changes were the result neither of fickleness nor of ill success is abundantly established by the progressive increase in the number of subscribers, and the high estimation in which the work has been held throughout the country. The true cause is to be found in the vast amount of labor required for its creditable management, and in the extensive professional engagements of the parties. No one who has not tried it can justly appreciate the task of editing such a periodical and of attending at the same time to the harassing duties of a large practice.

"The multiplicity in our land of medical periodicals is regarded by many as a decided evil. This, however, is a great error. Every new medical journal increases the number of readers as well as of writers. When the 'Southern Medical and Surgical Journal' was first issued it was rare that the voice of a Georgian was heard upon medical topics. By a reference to the original communications it contains we find that they number 412, and that they were written by 146 different physicians, the large majority of whom are Georgians, and the remainder from the adjacent states. With such facts before us, we feel that the career of our journal must continue to be one of progressive prosperity and usefulness. As a native Georgian, we feel proud of our rapid advance in refinement and science; as the editor of this journal, we desire to honor those who have by their contributions made it what it is."

The names of Georgia contributors are given in the editorial. Prof. Dugas edited the journal until 1855, when he associated with him in the editorial chair Dr. Henry Rossignol. They continued to edit the publication until 1857, when they were succeeded by Drs. Henry F. and Robert Campbell. The Drs. Campbell continued in its editorial management until 1862, when, in consequence of the civil war, the publication was suspended from 1862 to 1865 inclusive. The war having terminated in April, 1865, disastrously to the southern cause, the poverty of the physicians, in common with other citizens of Georgia, made it appear well nigh impossible to successfully re-establish the "Journal." Notwithstanding the difficulties surrounding the enterprise, Drs. L. A. Dugas, W. H. Doughty and De Saussure Ford assumed charge of the "Journal," and its publication was resumed under their editorial management. Each of the editors labored faithfully to re-establish the "Journal," and each of them contributed able editorials and other articles to the pages of the periodical. At no period of the life of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal" was it edited with more signal ability than during 1866. At no period of its existence did the "Journal" publish a higher order of medical literature. It contained in 1866 numerous articles from many of the ablest medical men in Georgia, yet the poverty of our people was such that it was found impossible to continue the publication. It suspended through lack of financial support because of the poverty of the physicians of Georgia through the disaster of the civil war. In the last year of the "Journal," as throughout its entire career, the effort of its editors was to furnish the profession a high order of medical literature and to promote the dignity and honor of the medical profession.

The "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal."—When the Atlanta Medical college was organized in the summer of 1855 it was thought advisable to issue a journal as an adjunct of the college. Such was the origin of the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal." The "Journal" was the child of the college, and the object of its pride and care. The "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" first appeared September, 1855, edited by Drs. Jos. P. Logan, professor of physiology and pathology, and W. F. Westmoreland, professor of surgery. The new journal was well received and patronized, and the early numbers give evidence of careful editorship and successful management. It was thus conducted by the above gentlemen until September, 1860, when they were succeeded by Dr. John G. Westmoreland, professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the college. Soon after the outbreak of the war, the "Journal" ceased publication—September, 1861. An attempt was made to revive it in the fall of 1867 by the two Drs. Westmoreland, but only a few numbers were issued. In March, 1871, it was re-issued under the same editorial management, and published continuously up to 1873. It then passed into the hands of Dr. Robert Battey, W. A. Love and V. H. Taliaferro. This management continued two years and a half, when Dr. W. F. Westmoreland again became editor, assisted by Dr. W. S. Kendrick. This management lasted two years and the "Journal" died again. In the summer of 1881 it was exhumed by Drs. Jas. B. Baird and J. Thad. Johnson, and named the "Atlanta Medical Register." Under this management it was published from October, 1881, to September, 1883. Then it was suspended again. In March, 1884, it resumed publication under its original name, edited by Drs. W. F. Westmoreland, H. V. M.

Miller and James A. Gray. It stated editorially that the journal "now commences her third series under flattering auspices and bright prospects." On this staff Dr. Gray particularly was active and energetic in the work of rehabilitating the journal. He added to the subscription list, increased the advertising business and placed the property on a sound financial basis. Under the management the journal was made the official organ of the State Medical association in 1885, and published all the papers of the association. He was a highly accomplished gentleman and physician, and well qualified for the duties of medical journalism. His death in 1887 was a misfortune to the journal, as well as a loss to the state profession.

After the death of Dr. Gray the ownership and editorial management of the journal witnessed many changes in quick succession. Within a few years the editorial staff at different times was composed of Drs. A. B. Ashworth, W. S. Kendrick, V. O. Hardon, F. W. McRae, L. P. Kennedy, M. B. Hutchins and L. B. Grandy. Since March, 1892, the property has been owned and conducted by the last two gentlemen just named, Dr. Grandy as managing editor, and Dr. Hutchins as business manager. The "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" has had its periods of elevation and depression. It has seen many changes, sometimes good, sometimes bad, but it has a clean record in seeking to represent that which is only honorable and professional in journalism and medicine. It began as the organ of a college. The present management reject the "organ" idea, and endeavor to conduct the journal as a free and independent publication, untrammelled of all college affiliations. Under its present management the journal has taken a high stand in favor of a state medical examining board and the necessity for better medical education. An editorial in the November, 1892, issue was the beginning of the movement which has only lately resulted in the establishment of medical boards for the state. The journal now ranks among the best of its class—the monthly medical journal. It has departments devoted to original communications, reports of medical societies, correspondence, editorials, selections from other journals, book reviews and medical items of general interest.

The "Southern Medical Record."—This journal is published monthly in Atlanta. The first number was issued January, 1873. Dr. T. S. Powell and Dr. W. T. Goldsmith were the first editors. In 1877 Dr. R. C. Word was added to the editorial corps. Its present editorial staff is as follows: A. W. Griggs, M. D., W. F. Westmoreland, M. D., J. M. Gaston, M. D., L. H. Jones, M. D., and D. H. Howell, M. D. The editorial management is one of ability, and the editors have labored to promote the best interest of the profession. The "Record" covers the whole field of medicine, being divided into departments: Original articles, society reports, selections and abstracts, editorials, prescription department, etc.

"Savannah Journal of Medicine."—This publication was inaugurated in May, 1858. It was published bi-monthly in Savannah. Its editors were Dr. Juriah Harris, professor of physiology in the Savannah Medical college, and Dr. J. S. Sullivan. Dr. R. D. Arnold, professor of principles and practice of medicine in the Savannah Medical college, was associate editor. In August, 1859, Dr. Sullivan retired from the editorial chair, leaving Dr. Juriah Harris as editor. Dr. R. D. Arnold continued as associate editor. This periodical was published from May, 1858, to October, 1861, and was one of the ablest journals in the south.

"Oglethorpe Medical and Surgical Journal" was published in Savannah. It was a bi-monthly and contained sixty-four pages. It was under the editorial management of Dr. H. L. Byrd, professor of principles and practice of physics in the Oglethorpe Medical college, and Drs. Holmes and Steele and V. H. Taliaferro. The first number was published April, 1858. In 1859, Drs. Steele and Taliaferro retired from the editorial management and Dr. William Hauser was added. In 1860 Dr. Hauser retired and Dr. J. C. C. Blackburn succeeded him. This journal was discontinued April, 1861.

INSANITY.—LUNATIC ASYLUM.

In December, 1837, the legislature enacted a law providing for the establishment of a state lunatic asylum, and directed the governor to appoint commissioners empowered to purchase a site and erect the necessary buildings. The appropriation for this purpose amounted to $24,000. Fifty-seven and one-half acres of land, about two miles from the then capitol at Milledgeville, were purchased from Mr. Hines at a cost of $4,000. Immediately thereafter the erection of two separate buildings, one for males, the other for females, was commenced. The work was slowly carried on until the winter of 1841, when the commissioners were directed to stop work on one of the buildings, and as rapidly as possible complete the one nearest finished. This structure was completed in October, 1842. The building was thirty-nine feet wide, 129 feet long, four stories high, and contained sixty-three rooms, nine by ten feet each. The total capacity of the building was sixty-three patients. The institution was opened for reception of patients Dec. 15, 1842. At the winter session of the legislature, 1841, an act was passed organizing the asylum and placing its management in a board of trustees. The superintendence of the institution was vested in board of trustees and steward until such time as, in the judgment of the board, the increased number of patients should render it necessary to elect a resident physician, which officer should also be the superintendent. But until a resident physician should be a necessity the needful medical services should be rendered by one of the physicians of the neighborhood, at a salary of $200 per annum.

The institution was opened for reception of patients Dec. 15, 1842. The law at that time required that the board of pauper patients should be paid by the counties from which they were sent. The expenses of non-pauper patients were paid by relatives or guardians. The legislature in 1843 amended the law so as to relieve the counties of the cost of maintenance of their pauper patients in the asylum and placed this duty on the state. The amended law allowed $50 per annum for support of each pauper patient, and authorized the board of trustees to draw warrants on the governor from time to time for such portions of this fund as were found necessary. In 1845 the legislature again amended the law and substituted for the $50 per capita per annum appropriation the present plan of appropriation of such amount as deemed necessary for the ensuing two years. In January, 1843, the board of trustees decided that the number of patients in the asylum rendered it necessary to elect a "resident physician and superintendent." Dr. David Cooper was then elected to fill the position. He continued in office until January, 1846, when Dr. Thomas F. Green was elected superintendent and resident physician. The law organizing the institution authorized the commitment to the asylum of all idiots, lunatics and epileptics, and requires that all such persons, who are residents of this state, and whose pauperism is certified by the court committing them, shall be supported in the institution by the state; all others were required to pay board at such rate as may be determined by the trustees. The charge at that time was one hundred dollars per annum, the friends of the patients supplying all clothing necessary. In the fall of 1847 the second building was completed upon the same plan as that first erected, and furnished a separate department for the use of female patients. In the early history of the institution a very large proportion of the patients were of the worst possible description. From the general want of proper information among the mass of the people in relation to such institutions, the incomplete condition of the establishment, and the influence of other causes, such only were sent to the asylum as had become burdens at home, too intolerable to be longer borne, certainly in very many instances from the influence of no hope of benefit to them, as their state was such that, in a number of cases, they did not survive a month after their reception.

ASYLUM IMPROVEMENTS.

The completion of the second building in 1847 enabled the trustees to make markedly beneficial changes in the asylum. The female patients were placed in the new building—thus entirely separating them from the males. This enlargement also offered greater facilities, and the increased appropriation of money for maintenance enabled the authorities to make many improvements, the substitution of white attendants for negroes who had formerly discharged this duty being one of them. The amount expended for fifty-seven acres of land and the two buildings was $38,000.

In 1849 it was found urgently necessary to make additional provision for the insane of the state. Plans and estimates were submitted to the legislature for enlarging the asylum accommodations. The plan contemplated a large, showy building to be erected in front of the existing wings and additions to the latter, which would make the structure in the shape of the capital E, which is known in insane asylum architecture as the Kirkbride plan, so called because it was the plan originated by Dr. Kirkbride, superintendent of a Pennsylvania asylum, and subsequently recognized by insane asylum superintendents as the best shaped building for treatment of the insane. The legislature appropriated $10,500, and in 1851 $24,800, for the enlargement of the institution. Every dollar of this appropriation was expended upon the foundation of the present center building before the walls had reached the surface of the site. Supplemental appropriations were made as follows: 1853, $56,500; 1855, $110,000; 1857, $63,500; 1858, $30,000. This building was completed in 1858. In addition to furnishing quarters for asylum officials, and the necessary offices, it provided accommodations for a large number of patients—each patient occupying a separate room ten feet by twelve feet. This building, as all others attached to it, is divided into sections or wards, each provided with a dining room, parlor, etc., and all modern improvements. In 1870-71 an appropriation amounting to $105,855 was voted for enlargement of the asylum. This sum was expended in enlarging the main building. In 1881, at the urgent solicitation of superintendent Powell and the board of trustees, the legislature decided to erect two separate buildings for white convalescents, one for males and the other for females, and appropriated $165,000 for this purpose. In 1883 a supplemental appropriation amounting to $92,875 was voted by the legislature. In 1893 the legislature, after an urgent appeal from the board of trustees, voted $100,000 for erection of additional buildings for white and colored insane. Plans have been drawn and accepted, and contract awarded, for a building for whites with a capacity for 500 patients, and two annexes for negroes. Emancipation of the negro population in 1865 necessitated asylum accommodations for the insane of this race. In 1866 the legislature appropriated $11,000 for an insane asylum for negroes. The building was located on the grounds of the asylum for the whites. In 1870 additional accommodations for insane negroes being necessary, the legislature appropriated $18,000 for enlargement of the negro building. In 1879 the legislature appropriated $25,000 for enlargement of the negro building. These several enlargements provided for 541 negroes. The overcrowded condition of the negro building and the urgent demand for care of a number of negro insane who could not be admitted for want of room caused the board of trustees to begin enlargement by adding two annexes 128x31 feet each, four stories, to the existing negro asylum. These additional buildings will provide accommodation for 270 additional patients in the negro institution.

THE INSTITUTION AS IT NOW STANDS.

The lunatic asylum comprises a number of buildings, as follows: First.—The main building. The front presents a handsome, showy brick structure three stories high, of Grecian architecture. With the exception of the capitol building in Atlanta, the center asylum building is the handsomest edifice in the state of Georgia. Besides the superintendent's apartments, rooms for visitors and offices for officials, this building accommodates about 500 patients with necessary nurses, etc. Second.—Two brick buildings for convalescents three stories high, accommodating 140 patients each, and nurses. These are located on each side of the front of the center building, about 500 feet from the latter, and about 1,000 feet apart. Third.—Two brick detached buildings three stories high in rear of center edifice, accommodating about 100 patients each. Fourth.—Two one-story wooded detached buildings for patients too feeble to ascend or descend the higher floors, accommodating each forty patients. Fifth.—The building for negroes located half mile in rear of the main building for whites. This is also of brick, three stories high, and, like the building for the whites, provided with all modern conveniences. It comfortably provides for 500 insane negroes, besides the supervisor and attendants. A brick wall twelve feet high separates the yards of the buildings for whites and negroes. About one mile distant from the asylum building proper, is located the contagious diseases hospital, which, as its name indicates, is reserved for treatment of any contagious disease which may be brought into the institution. This is the best contagious diseases building in Georgia, and readily accommodates sixty patients and attendants. A contagious diseases hospital is an essential feature of insane asylum management inasmuch as patients are usually brought to the asylum after being confined in jail, and have thus in previous years introduced smallpox into the institution. Under intelligent and faithful management of the superintendent the disease was promptly stamped out. In addition to the above described buildings the new structure for whites, now in process of erection, will accommodate 500 patients. This edifice, like the others, is provided with dining rooms, parlors, sun rooms, and all modern conveniences. When this work shall have been completed ample asylum accommodations will have been provided for the white insane of the state. The completion of the annexes to the asylum for negroes will relieve the present over-crowding and provide accommodations for 180 of the negro insane now outside of the institution. A new feature in the buildings now in process of erection is the substitution of congregate dining rooms for the former ward dining rooms.

WHAT THE ASYLUM COST.

The following is a statement of land owned by asylum, showing the year, number of acres, of whom purchased, and price paid: 1837, 57½ acres, J. Thomas and R. K. Hines, $4,000; 1849, 400, Tomlinson Fort, $3,000; 1853, 637, John S. Thomas, $300; 1856, 40, Willis Vaughn, $750; 1862, 21½, Jno. Hammond, $300; 1866, 150 3-10, M. L. The total expenditures for land and buildings (including $100,000 for buildings now in process of erection) is $1,006,281.98.

In 1877, by act of the legislature, the asylum was made free to all bona fide citizens of Georgia. For the last two years the legislature appropriated the sum of $200,000 per annum for support and maintenance of the lunatic asylum. This seems to be a truly magnificent sum, but when the magnitude of this institution is known, and the purposes for which the money is necessarily expended, it is truly surprising that it can be maintained at so small a cost. The average number of lunatics in the asylum during the year was 1,709. An examination shows that this apparently magnificent sum for support and maintenance of the lunatic asylum, $200,000 per annum, amounts to only $118.33 per capita per annum, or 32 42-100 cents per capita per diem. This amount supplies all the wants of the inmates, which are: Five physicians, medicines, nurses, guards, night watchman, food, clothing, fuel, gas, water works, fire department, washing, burying the dead, paying fares of discharged patients to their homes, repairs to buildings, replacing furniture, crockery, bedding, and clothing damaged by ordinary use and destructiveness of the patients. This latter item of destruction of crockery, bedding and clothing by the insane is a large item of expense each year. When it is remembered that the average paid by the counties of Georgia for the one item of feeding each negro prisoner in the common jails amounts to 40 cents a day, the economy of the lunatic asylum maintenance is strikingly illustrated. The maintenance of the institution at the small cost above given results from the most rigid economy and scrupulous honesty of the officials.

THE CARE OF THE INMATES.

The one great feature of the management of the insane in our asylum is the constant, unwearied attention and kindness to each patient by the officers and attaches of the institution. Within the past twenty years a great revolution has taken place in insane asylum management. Many years ago Superintendent Powell abolished all coercive measures from the institution. While in some states, even in this day, violent patients are restrained by brute force, strapped to walls, chairs, etc., or made helpless by the straight jacket and crib-beds, no such management is permitted to be visited upon the inmates of the Georgia asylum. Straps, straight jackets, crib-beds and like instruments of cruelty are conspicuous by their absence in our state asylum. No such appliance can be found on the premises. The law of kindness is more constantly and unweariedly visited upon the inmates of the Georgia asylum than in any institution of the kind known to me. Three years ago I, at the request of the board of trustees, visited a number of insane asylums in other states, and was surprised to find that these instruments of cruelty constituted a part of the treatment in several of them. The non-coercive plan of treatment of the insane has been gradually developed into its present high state of perfection by a number of skilled and humane asylum superintendents, prominent among whom is Superintendent Powell, of the Georgia asylum. Insane asylums are no longer regarded as mere prisons for confining lunatics dangerous to the public. At the present day these institutions are properly regarded as hospitals into which this unfortunate class can be received for skillful treatment and tenderest care. If patients are sent to the asylum when insanity is acute, many are permanently restored to sanity. The records of the Georgia lunatic asylum, of late, show that 38 per cent. of acute cases are restored. Incurable cases are skillfully and tenderly cared for by the authorities of the institution, kept from irritation by the unthoughtful, and prevented from becoming dangerous to the public. Since the prison management system has disappeared, lunatics now regard physicians and nurses as tender, loving friends, willing and anxious to render them every service necessary to their convenience and comfort, and therefore patients co-operate with, instead of resisting them, as under the former regime. The substitution of kindness for coercive measures is the greatest advance of modern insane asylum management. In our state asylum every patient is placed as nearly as possible under homelike environment, as to conveniences and comforts, and his or her associates selected with scrupulous care for his or her welfare.

Lunatics are helpless as little children, and require the same constant care and nursing. There are 287 employes constantly engaged in the service of the institution. One hundred and fifty-five of them are solely engaged in the duties of nursing the insane. The remainder are occupied in the laundry, gardens, dairy, dining rooms, carpenter shops, boiler rooms, and farm work. The item of wages to these employes amounts annually to $42,000. The management of the lunatic asylum by law vests in a board of trustees, ten in number, who are biennially appointed by the governor. They have authority to prescribe all the rules and regulations for the management of the institution, appoint all officers, point out their duties, and fix their salaries, etc., and exercise supervision over all interests of the asylum. The board of trustees are: President, G. A. Cabaniss, of Atlanta; vice-president, R. B. Nisbet, M. D., Eatonton; secretary, Eugene Foster, M. D., Augusta; T. M. Hunt, Sparta; J. H. Nichols, Narchoochee; W. T. McArthur, McArthur; T. S. Hopkins, M. D., Thomasville; R. F. Wattes, Lumpkin; W. A. Huff, Macon; J. P. Walker, M. D., Webster county. The immediate management of the asylum vests in Superintendent Powell, a highly skilled physician and an elegant gentleman. Superintendent Powell is particularly fitted for the position he holds, and has the love of his unfortunate charges to a degree rarely equaled in lunatic asylum management. He is a man of great tenderness of heart, and is constantly engaged in tender, self-sacrificing ministrations to his patients. He is the one man in Georgia fully qualified for the high office which he holds. He has held this office since 1878. Under his management the institution has from time to time been improved so as to meet all requirements of modern treatment of the insane. The Georgia lunatic asylum is regarded as one of the best in America, and reflects honor upon Georgia.

INSANITY IN THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

This is one of the most interesting and important questions for study by political economists and law-makers. Insanity among the white population of Georgia will be presented first. The United States census of 1860 makes the white population of the state 591,588; number of white insane, 447. Therefore the ratio of insanity was one to every 1,323 of our population. The census of 1870 shows a white population of 638,926; white insane, 634; i. e., one to every 1,007. The census of 1880, white population, 815,906; number of insane, 1,286—one insane person out of every 635 of the population. These facts startle us, and unquestionably demonstrate an alarming increase of insanity among our citizens. While many causes contribute to the increase of insanity, there can be no question that the cause above all others is the changed condition of our people—poverty succeeding affluence—the struggle for existence. Prior to the war our population was one of the most contented and prosperous of any in the United States. Our property was swept away by the fortunes of war, and our people left in a condition of positive bankruptcy. Under the mental and physical strain thus induced, great increase of insanity resulted. From 1870 to 1880 the census reports show that the ratio of insanity in Georgia had more than doubled in the decade. This would seem strange, did we not remember that the poverty of the masses was greater in the decade 1870 to 1880 than it was in that of 1860 to 1870.

Let us compare the ratio of the white insane of Georgia with that of other states. The following tabular statement by Dr. O. W. Wright, of Wisconsin, made several years ago, gives us a valuable insight into the question of insanity in the United States. It shows the number of population in which one insane person is found: New England states, one insane person to every 359; middle states, one to every 424; interior states, one to every 610; northwestern states, one to 750; extreme southern states, one to 935; Pacific slope, one to 385.

RATIO OF INSANITY IN GEORGIA.

A comparison of the ratio of the white insane of Georgia with that of other states will, however, show that the ratio of insanity to population is less in Georgia than in any of the older states in the Union, except Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas. The reason is to be found in the absence of an influx of the pauper foreign population which has overrun the northern and western states. The foreign population coming into Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas are of the better element of emigrants. All American statistics show that insanity is from one to three times more frequent in the foreign than among the native population. These statistical data demonstrate the necessity of legal enactments to prevent influx of pauper foreign immigration into Georgia. The better class of foreign emigrants can be safely admitted, welcomed among us, but the pauper element, together with the turbulent and lawless of foreign nations, should be forbidden to locate among us. Alarming as has been the increase of insanity among our white population since the war, it is insignificant as compared with that among the negroes. Referring again to the United States census reports, we find the following facts: Census of 1860: Negro population of Georgia, 465,698; number of insane negroes, 44; i. e., one to every 10,548 of colored inhabitants. Census of 1870: Negro population, 545,142; insane, 129, or one to every 4,225. Census of 1880: Negro population, 725,133; insane, 411, or one to every 1,764 of our negro population. I have not the census returns on insane for 1890. The colored population in Georgia in 1890 was, according to the United States census, 858,815. There are 541 insane negroes in the asylum at present, and a large number of applications on file for admission into the institution, but owing to the overcrowded condition of the building they cannot be received. Superintendent Powell estimates the number of insane negroes at 1,000, which would give one to every 858 of population of this race. Looking for the cause of this state of affairs, it is easily found in the changed condition of our negro population. The cause is here, too, to be found in the struggle for existence. It certainly cannot be attributed to heredity, for prior to the freedom of the negro, in 1865, he was practically exempt from mental diseases. A few idiots and epileptics were to be found here and there, but the ratio of insanity prior to freedom was only one to 10,584. That this increase is not even in part due to heredity is proven by the fact that but one generation has passed since freedom of the negro, and in the previous generation he was almost totally exempt from insanity. Therefore it seems impossible to account for this alarming increase of insanity among our negro population upon any other hypothesis than that of the struggle for existence, a struggle to which he was absolutely a stranger prior to the time when emancipation took this burden from the mind of the slave-owner and put it on the new-made freeman. While at present the white race, by reason of its higher mental development, has been more susceptible to insanity than the negro, there can be no question but that with the higher mental development of the latter race, in future, he will then be as susceptible to insanity as the white man, and I believe more so.

As alarming as has been the increase of insanity among the negro population of Georgia, it is nevertheless the fact that the ratio of insanity among the negroes of the state, compared with the total negro population, was less in 1880 in Georgia than in any state in the Union. From a valuable tabular statement compiled by Superintendent Powell, I find the following facts as to ratio of insanity among the negroes of each state and territory: In 1880—Alabama, one to every 1,460; Arizona, 77; Arkansas, 1,318; California, 44; Mississippi, 1,505; Missouri, 1,002; Montana, 173; Nebraska, 596; Colorado, 304; Connecticut, 360; Dakota, 133; Delaware, 550; District of Columbia, 480; Florida, 1,490; Georgia, 1,768; Illinois, 610; Indiana, 570; Iowa, 1,059; Kansas, 1,105; Kentucky, 786; Louisiana, 1,590; Maine, 207; Maryland, 811; Massachusetts, 445; Michigan, 397; Minnesota, 312; Nevada, 488; New Jersey, 473; New Mexico, 253; New York, 333; North Carolina, 1,215; Ohio, 493; Oregon, 28; Pennsylvania, 488; Rhode Island, 462; South Carolina, 1,310; Tennessee, 1,107; Texas, 1,285; Utah, 116; Vermont, 211; Virginia, 912; Washington, 81; West Virginia, 699; Wisconsin, 300.

Facts show that the south—the home of the negro—is far more congenial to the mental integrity of the race than any section of the United States, northern philanthropists to the contrary; yet the fact remains that the negro in the south, dwelling among his former masters, is, as a race, more prosperous, contented and happier than when thrown into the activity and bustle surrounding him when he would dare enter into competition with the man from the land of wooden nutmegs. The negro insane of Georgia is, and must continue, an object of protection and care to our commonwealth. The trustees of the asylum, realizing the urgent need of additional provision for the negro insane in our midst, are now actively engaged enlarging the buildings for negroes. When these buildings shall have been completed, asylum accommodations will have been provided for 270 more patients of this race.

PREFACE TO MEMOIRS OF DECEASED PHYSICIANS.

MEDICAL literature is abundant, and much of it of a high order from the pens of physicians of Georgia; yet our state is shamefully deficient in biographies of her great medical men. Memoirs exist of some of them, but they are scattered here and there in short-lived publications which are inaccessible to the general reader and even to the most of the medical profession—thus the object of these memoirs has been defeated.

This is the first effort ever made to rescue from impending oblivion the memories of the great medical men of our commonwealth by gathering together in one book the record of their lives. Postponement of this sacred duty to this date renders the undertaking an extremely difficult one as to many of our predecessors, and as to not a few of them impossible of fulfillment.

Some of Georgia's noblest physicians have, after honorable, highly useful lives, gone out from among the children of men, and at the present time no trace of them can be found, sadly reminding us of the trackless course of a great vessel upon the billows of the mighty ocean. In many instances the great state of Georgia has preserved no record of even the dates of birth and death of men whose lives were spent in skilful, unending, unwearied toil and self sacrifice in humbly walking in the footsteps of "the Healer of Genesaret." The families of some of them are scattered into unknown regions, while in other instances family records are beyond the reach of men who would gladly write in letters of gold the noble record of their lives. In not a few instances I have found it impossible to obtain from next succeeding generations data sufficient to enable me to write suitable memoirs of their illustrious kinsmen. This is indeed a sad comment upon the vanity of human life, and forcibly reminds us of the forgetfulness which awaits the highest and noblest services of man to his fellows.

When I was charged with this sacred trust I entered earnestly upon its fulfillment. I sought the aid of many prominent professional brethren, asking them to suggest to me the names of distinguished deceased physicians of our state whose biographies should be written, and requesting their co-operation in the work. I sought the aid of my brethren in order, first, that I might impartially discharge the duty of selection of subjects of memoirs; second, want of personal acquaintance with many of these prominent men rendered it impossible for me to write suitable sketches of them. I therefore sought assistance of my brethren who were personal friends or intimate acquaintances of the deceased, and who were thereby sufficiently familiar with their life work to enable them to accurately estimate these men and faithfully discharge this delicate task. From those whose co-operation I sought came prompt promises of compliance. Some of these pledges were promptly fulfilled, while some were never redeemed. The list of biographies fails of many names whose services to suffering humanity rendered them worthy of the highest praise and everlasting remembrance. These omissions, however, were through no intentional fault of mine. In some instances it was impossible, through mutations of time and circumstances, to gather together the data necessary to such work. In other instances the list fails because I did not, and under the circumstances could not, know enough of the men to properly estimate their worth. As best I could I have conscientiously discharged the sacred duty to my dead brethren. It has been a labor of love to men whose memories I delight to revere, notwithstanding I never knew some of them. In some instances I have adopted biographies written by men whose familiarity with the deceased specially qualified them for the work. In such cases I have endeavored to give credit to the writers. Each and all of the learned professions speak to succeeding generations through the lives of their great men. I feel assured that the medical profession of Georgia furnished a greater ratio of distinguished men than did any other one of the learned callings. The men whose biographies are here presented were not equally great.

"Order is heaven's first law, and this confess'd,
Some are, and must be, greater than the rest."

Some of them were great because of their marvelous genius; some great because of their resplendent character; some great because of their utter unselfishness—unweariedly devoting their time and talent in gratuitously ministering to the sick and wounded whenever and wherever called; some were great in heroic discharge of duty in unflinchingly battling with "the pestilence that walketh in darkness"; others were great because of the thousands of little, unremembered acts of kindness and love bestowed upon their fellows in their daily work; some of them were great in that they surmounted the obstacles of humble birth and defective education, and by dint of personal merit became the peers of those who entered the profession under the favoring auspices of family prestige, wealth and erudition; some were great because they exemplified each and all of these virtues; all of them were great in that their conduct was inspired and guided by integrity. None of them were perfect. The wisest and the noblest of men have erred. I have not attempted to point out their foibles. Let us draw the veil of charity over their faults, whatever they may have been, and withhold not from their memories the praise which their virtues so richly merited. Let the lesson of their lives speak to the present and future generation by showing that they deliberately selected the better part of life, and steadfastly pursued it; valued duty above reputation, and the approval of conscience more than worldly wealth or human adulation. Almost all of them died poor in worldly goods, yet each of them was rich in the noblest of possessions—character. Many of them sleep in graves over which not so much as a rude headstone has been placed to mark the spot in which their bodies rest, yet, by their noble deeds they, while living, wrote their epitaphs in the annals of their profession, and in the hearts of those for whom they had so unselfishly, so nobly labored.

"To live in hearts we leave behind,
Is not to die."

There are scores of living physicians in our commonwealth who by their lives and their services to their fellows richly merit the plaudits of a grateful people, yet I have not attempted to write their biographies. From the large number of these noble men I cannot attempt to select. Such an effort would necessarily prove invidious. I therefore leave this task for someone who shall prove himself equal to the delicate, trying position.

EUGENE FOSTER.

MEMOIRS OF DECEASED PHYSICIANS.

DR. MILTON ANTONY was born on Aug. 7, 1789. His father removed to Georgia when he was quite a young man and settled in Jasper county. The limited circumstances of his parents prevented his receiving the benefits of scholastic instruction for a longer period than two and a half years. He left the village academy of Washington at the age of sixteen and entered the office of Dr. Joel Abbot. At the age of nineteen he went to Philadelphia and attended a course of medical lectures. His means prevented his staying longer than one winter, and as this, with similar universities, required the completion of a second course before graduation, he was compelled to come back without a diploma. Returning to Savannah almost penniless, he wended his way homeward with his satchel on his back to take his place on the busy stage of life. The auspices under which he commenced his career were anything but flattering; he had not the support of wealthy relatives to sustain him, nor the aid of influential friends to pet him into greatness. He appeared before the people of Monticello with the simple commendation of his preceptor, and commenced the duties of a practitioner in his twentieth year. Yet there were some circumstances which gave promise of future distinction and usefulness. He had formed correct habits: his young imagination had been captivated by the excellence of knowledge; his thirst for information could not be satisfied: his mind was strong, his will virtuous and his industry untiring. Seven years Dr. Antony stayed in Monticello carrying on an extensive practice, and laying the foundation of his future eminence. Desiring a more enlarged sphere, he removed to New Orleans, La. The effects of the climate upon a young and large family induced him to change his field after a short residence, and in the spring of 1819 he came to Augusta and began the practice which, upon the death of his friend, Dr. Anderson Watkins, was so large as to exceed his ability to attend it. Had he confined himself to his professional duties he would have doubtless been exempted from much toil, and from many perplexities, but he would have gone down to his grave without accomplishing the high ends for which God had made him. The elevation of his profession in Georgia was with him an object of fervent desire, and most of the last seventeen years of his life was spent to secure it. In 1822 he was prominent in forming the medical society of Augusta. In 1825 he, with a few others, applied to the legislature requesting the appointment of a state board of medical examiners, whose duty it should be to meet annually at Milledgeville, examine applicants and grant license to practice within the limits of the state. His plan was adopted and he was unanimously chosen president of the examining board. In 1828 he again went to Milledgeville, sustained by a few physicians of Augusta, and by distinguished men of the state, desiring a charter for a medical academy. His object was to improve students of medicine by making them read longer and more thoroughly than then accustomed to do, and to make the academy a preparatory school to northern universities. The legislature granted his petition. The academy went into operation with three professors and a promising class. Its name was shortly afterward changed to institute, and it was permitted to confer the degree of Bachelor of Medicine. The patronage which the institute received induced him, with his friends, to elevate its character and in 1833 he appeared before the state legislature and obtained a charter for the medical college of Georgia, with full power to lecture, examine and confer the degree of Doctor of Medicine. The last effort he made for his profession in the state was to secure for it proper medical literature. To this end he established the "Southern Medical Journal," and for several years was its editor. Dr. Antony nobly won reputation in his career. He was highly esteemed as a physician. Two distinguished universities conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of medicine. He, with signal ability, filled the chair of professor of institutes and proctor of medicine, midwifery and diseases of women and children in the medical college of Georgia from its organization to the time of his death in 1839. In discharging his duties as professor he won the admiration and affection of his pupils, who delighted to honor him and secure his regard. He received not long before his death an invitation to allow his name to be presented as a candidate for professorship in another university, which he declined, believing his honor pledged to the state to adhere to her institutions. As a physician Prof. Antony possessed ability of the highest order, in his profession he combined acute and quick perceptions with profound judgment, and with these qualities of mind (a union rarely found) he associated an excellent memory, which enabled him to profit in the greatest degree by his observations and experience. The eminence he enjoyed was evinced, not only in the extent of his practice at home, but by the avidity with which patients and physicians at a distance constantly sought his advice and counsel in important and difficult cases. He was not content to keep pace with the improvements constantly made in medicine and to adopt the suggestions of others; endowed with a mind of uncommon strength, activity and originality, he thought for himself on all subjects and made improvements of his own. He was a man of multi-form attainments. Eminent as a practitioner of medicine, he was also equally as skilled in gynecology and surgery. He was the first gynecologist to adopt the knee-chest position in uterine luxations. He also perfected the treatment of fractures of the thigh by weight extension. He was a bold and marvelously skilled surgeon as evidenced by a case in which he, in 1821, successfully excised portions of the fifth and sixth ribs and removed portions of the lung tissue. This case was reported in the "Philadelphia Medical Journal," vol. 6, page 108, 1823. Dr. Antony's treatment of this case was so original and bold that Dr. George Foy, fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of Dublin, Ireland, republished it in 1893 in the "Medical Press and Circular" and commended the skill and boldness of the operator. Dr. Antony's contributions to medical literature were numerous and valuable. I regret that I have not been able to obtain a full list of his medical writings. The above is an imperfect sketch of his career as a medical man. It began under clouds, its zenith was unobscured, reflecting luster upon his profession and state. Dr. Antony was a most laborious man. The task of self-education was to be accomplished and he commenced and finished it with noble devotion. The science he had selected, requiring unremitting application and study, can only be mastered by unceasing effort. He loved not ease. He rarely allowed himself more than four hours for sleep. Amid the duties of practitioner, professor and editor, he could find moments for cultivating his taste for music, painting, poetry and literature. He commenced and closed his life a student. As a man, he had his reverses; he shared largely in the sorrows of life, opposition in many forms appearing against him, and was heard to say he had never attempted any important end without incurring the displeasure of some of his fellows. This to him was a matter of exceeding regret. Possessed of refined sensibilities, he suffered much with patience. These things, however, never affected his sense of duty, nor caused him to relax his efforts; they served rather to wed him more closely to his pursuits, and to increase his desire to fill "the measure of his days" honorably, virtuously and usefully. This he deemed his high privilege, his solemn duty. His course is the demonstration of the singular motto on his "Journal:" "A truly virtuous will is almost omnipotent." Such a man must have necessarily been a Christian. He was thoroughly grounded in the doctrines of the bible, and exhibited their effects in his life. His knowledge was sanctified and his benevolence expanded by his piety. There was one department of morality in which he labored with unabated zeal—that of temperance. Possessing an affectionate disposition and winning manners, he secured the regard of his patients and entered upon the difficult task of conversing with them on eternal things with great success. His labors of love were greatly blessed. His body was interred in the college grounds, the slab covering his grave bearing this inscription:

"Mortale quicquid caduit hic depostum
Milton Antony, M. D.
Conditor collegi medici Georgiensis
Exegit monumentum aere perenius,
Vixit annos quinquaginta,
Obiit die xix Septembris,
A. D. MDCCCXXXIX."

In the lecture room on the first floor of the college is inserted in the wall a handsome memorial tablet with the following inscription:

"In Memory of
Milton Antony, M. D.,
Founder of this College.
A martyr to humanity and the duties of his profession,
During the fatal epidemic of 1839.
Cheered by Religious Faith through the Griefs and Trials of this life
He passed from the cure of the sick to the sleep of the just,
Amid the tears and blessings of the poor.
True to his own favorite maxim,
That a virtuous will is almost omnipotent,
He overcame by study the defects of education
And patiently toiling to eminence, bequeathed to Posterity
A noble example of Genius and Industry,
Animated and directed by Patriotism and Benevolence."

RICHARD DENNIS ARNOLD, born in the city of Savannah, Ga., August, 1808; died in the same city, July 10, 1876, of phthisis pulmonalis. His early education was obtained from a private instructor. He graduated with high honor from Princeton college, New Jersey. After graduating from Princeton, he studied medicine in the office of Dr. W. R. Waring, of Savannah. In 1830 he was graduated M. D. by the university of Pennsylvania. After receiving his degree in medicine, he was awarded the position of house physician in Blockly hospital, Philadelphia. His term of service in Blockly hospital terminated in 1832, when he located in Savannah as a general practitioner of medicine. He soon established himself as a physician of acknowledged skill. In 1835 he was appointed one of the physicians to the Savannah hospital, and held this position for thirty years. He was noted for his sympathy with and services to the poor. With him, there was in the practice of medicine something higher and better than mere money-getting, i. e., the rich blessing of being permitted to do good to his fellow-beings. He was truly a good Samaritan. All through life, although he was the physician of the wealthiest citizens of Savannah, he found pleasure in gratuitous services to the poor of the city. Dr. Arnold was one of the ablest and most prominent physicians of Georgia. He was one of the founders, and the first secretary, of the American Medical association, which was organized in 1846, the meeting being held in New York city. He was one of the committee of the American Medical association which drafted its code of ethics—a code of laws second only to the Book of Books; a code of laws which challenges the admiration and willing observance of every honorable physician in the regular school of medicine in America. That these men builded wisely is attested by the fact that, with a few minor amendments, this code remains as it was adopted in 1847, and to-day governs every medical society of the regular school in America. Dr. Arnold has held many prominent positions in the American Medical association. In 1852 he was elected vice-president. He was also one of the founders of the Medical Society of the State of Georgia; was chairman of the committee which drafted the constitution and by-laws of this society. At its organization he was elected first vice-president, and in 1851 was elected president of the society. In 1853, when the medical college of Savannah was organized, Dr. Arnold was elected professor of theory and practice of medicine—a position which he held for years, and the duties of which he discharged with great credit to the college and himself. Fluent of speech, eloquent in words, unusually gifted in professional acumen, he was an ideal teacher of medicine. As a teacher he had few equals—no superiors. He was an active member of the Georgia Medical society of Savannah, for fifteen years its president, and for a long number of years its leading member. Dr. Arnold constantly labored to organize the medical profession of his city, state, and nation into a brotherhood promoting every necessary reform. In all these societies he was ever a leader. Tall in stature, commanding in appearance, courtly in manner, remarkably gifted as a public speaker, he had few equals in debate. Utterly unselfish, he acted always from a sense of duty, and ever in the interest of truth and justice. His manliness, his high sense of honor, his utter unselfishness, his love of justice, and his great ability won for him the respect and confidence of his confreres in whatever body of men he appeared. He was a man of marked humor and possessed of wonderful power in satire, though it was never wielded so as to wound or offend. While fully in love with his profession, he took great interest in all public measures affecting the welfare of his city and state. No man labored more assiduously to promote the sanitary condition of Savannah. When rice fields were permitted to exist within the city of Savannah and the immediate vicinity, and thus decimate the inhabitants by malaria so engendered, Dr. Arnold used his great influence in moulding public sentiment and legal enactments to suppress the evil. Every sanitary measure had his advocacy. It was largely due to his influence that an ample and healthful public water supply was secured in Savannah. He was chosen president of the water commission of that city, and served in that position for thirty-five consecutive years. He was for a number of years a member of the board of health of Savannah; a member of the masonic fraternity for fifty years, holding high official positions in the order, and member of the board of managers of the Savannah city hospital. He was also one of the founders of the Georgia Historical society. His interest in public affairs naturally led him into politics. He was repeatedly elected an alderman, and in 1843, 1851, 1859, and 1863, was elected mayor of Savannah, the latter term extending to the close of the war. He was several times elected to the general assembly of the state, serving in both the house and the senate. In the general assembly he exerted a commanding influence. Although fond of politics and actively engaged therein, he never lost his interest in and love for his profession. His reputation as a medical teacher and practitioner was not limited to his city or state. He was well and favorably known to the medical profession of the United States and Europe, by reason of his classic treatise on yellow fever. He was an expert in this disease, and did great service in teaching the medical profession of the world the differential diagnosis of yellow fever from malarial fevers. His description of the pathological anatomy of the liver in yellow fever, with the colored plates he had prepared under his personal direction, showing the boxwood-colored liver of the disease, is authority upon the subject at the present day. The following is a partial list of the contributions of Dr. Arnold to medical literature: "Dengue, or Break-Bone Fever, as it Appeared in Savannah in 1850;" an essay on "The Relation of Bilious and Yellow Fevers," read by request before the State Medical society in 1850; address, as president of the Georgia State Medical society, on the "Reciprocal Duty of Physicians and the Public to Each Other;" "Identity of Dengue, or Break-Bone Fever and Yellow Fever;" "Address before the Georgia Medical Society;" "Cases of Yellow Fever;" "Yellow Fever;" "Yellow Fever;" "The Epidemics of Savannah, Ga., in 1847 and 1848." In the several epidemics of yellow fever in Savannah during Dr. Arnold's life, he rendered valuable and conspicuous service. Dr. Arnold was truly the beloved physician in the hearts of the citizens of Savannah. His death was an irreparable loss to his city and state. When he died, the mayor of Savannah convened the board of aldermen in special session, and feelingly announced the death of the great and good physician. The board of aldermen adopted resolutions expressive of the high esteem in which Dr. Arnold was held in that city, and subsequently attended his funeral in a body. The funeral was one of the largest ever held in the state—all classes thus testifying their great love for the deceased. In the death of Dr. Arnold the city of Savannah and the state of Georgia lost one of its noblest, best citizens, and the medical profession of that city, the state and the nation mourns the loss of a good Samaritan and savant.

RICHARD BANKS, M. D.* Richard Banks, the subject of this sketch, was born at the paternal homestead in Elbert county in 1784. After such preliminary training as the schools in the vicinity afforded, he was transferred to Athens, the seat of the state university, and pursued his classical studies in the class which graduated the Hon. Joseph Henry Lumpkin, the great chief justice of the supreme court of the state of Georgia. Having selected medicine as a profession, he studied it diligently and successfully under private instruction. He then matriculated in the university of Pennsylvania, and after a pupilage of two years in it he graduated M. D. in 1820. After another year's residence in the hospital he returned to Georgia and established himself in practice in the village of Ruckersville, in his native county. With his fine opportunities, his thorough preparation, his sturdy intellect, his talent for original observation, his cool courage in adopting and executing the conclusions of his judgments, mingled astonishment and regret are excited at his not having chosen a wider theater for the growth and display of his extraordinary powers. His innate modesty, his scorn of all the little arts of the charlatan, sometimes employed to attract notice, his aversion to every appearance of a desire to court notoriety, doubtless influenced his determination. In the obscure village, remote from any large town, as an humble country doctor, he achieved an enviable distinction, worthy of lasting commemoration.

As a practitioner of medicine, his fame spread rapidly and widely. All over the upper part of Georgia and South Carolina his counsel was sought by physicians and by the laity, and the country is still filled with the traditions of his skill and beneficence. Unhappily, nothing but tradition remains of his intuitive perceptions of the exact essence of disease, and of his wondrous power to stay its progress.

*From the "Atlantic Medical and Surgical Journal."

Medical journals in the south were then unknown, and the busy doctor had little time and less inclination to make a permanent record of his experience. As an operative surgeon he early gained in the south the highest rank, and stood for many years confessedly without an equal. Fresh from the lessons of the adroit surgeons who then controlled the hospitals in Philadelphia, reliant on his own common sense and personal tact, he felt competent to perform any needed operation, and taking the whole of surgery for his province, he shrank from not even the most difficult. Dr. Banks preserved no notes of his cases, and never, it is believed, published an account of them. They were in vast numbers, and of every possible variety. No one within a hundred miles of his residence thought of applying to anyone else, if his assistance was possible. The loss of so vast a volume of experience is a public calamity. A single case, related by a non-professional eyewitness, follows in his own language:

"It was a child three or four years old; the upper lip and roof of the mouth were cleft open, so far back that there was no bridge to the nose, and you could see far down the throat. It was really hideous to look at. In those days anesthetics were not used. Dr. Spalding and another held it still during the operation. I would remark that I was as much impressed at the time by the heroism of the child's mother (she held it in her lap all the time) as I was by the Doctor's coolness and steadiness of hand. I was much affected, and of course cannot undertake to speak positively of the modus operandi. I recollect, however, that the inner edges of the opening were scarified; the bones of the upper jaw were divided with an instrument something like a pair of scissors; the parts were forced together with strong ligatures. The point of the nose projected considerably; this was scarified and turned down to make a bridge for the nose, and fastened in place either by adhesive strips or thread; can't remember how long the operation lasted, very short, I think. I saw the child some weeks after when it was brought for the Doctor to see it. The mouth was almost natural; looked as if it had been marked by a fall, but had cured up. The bridge of the nose had not adhered well at the bottom; this was remedied by scarifying, and forced to adhere by being held with stitches. I remember well that it was quite a good-looking child when I last saw it, and no one would have supposed it was the hideous thing brought to be operated on. Dr. Spalding wrote a report of the case for a medical journal, and on submitting it to Dr. Banks, he would not consent to its publication. You know how modest he was. He laughed, and said he could not bear to see himself in print, especially in the florid style Dr. Spalding had employed."

Of the great number of such cases as usually occur in the practice of surgeons of wide-spread fame, but little notice was taken. Dr. Banks had a horror of notoriety, and seldom spoke, even privately to his friends, of the extent or success of his business. It is known, however, that every surgical disease brought to his notice elicited his prompt attention, and when the implements in use, or accessible, were not adequate to the emergency, he possessed inventive skill enough to devise and have made others suited to his purpose. One of his earlier triumphs was the successful removal of the parotid gland at a period when the best anatomists and surgeons of this and other countries were hotly discussing the question of its possibility. The details of this operation are all lost to the profession, except the fact that he dislocated the inferior maxillary articulation in order to facilitate it. The operations which gave him greatest celebrity, from their frequency and success, were those for cataract and for stone in the bladder. For many years he was the only surgeon in a large extent of country who attempted either, and patients sought him from great distances. How many cases of cataract he operated upon is not certainly known, nor is the exact percentage of recoveries—the number of both reported seems large and cannot now be verified—but it is certain that he was generally successful. Sometime before his death he stated to a friend that he had performed lithotomy sixty-four times with but two unsuccessful cases. Whether this long list was subsequently added to is not known.

Dr. Bank's manner of making both of these capital operations was different from the methods now generally practiced. He never removed a cataract by extraction, but always by couching or absorption. He thought these methods gave better results, and were safer, inasmuch as, in cases of failure of the first attempt, it could be repeated as often as might be necessary, whereas the failure of an operation by extraction necessarily resulted in permanent loss of vision. These reasons had greater weight before the discovery of anaesthetics than now. The use of them has given greater facility to the operation by extraction, and it is now generally performed by the most distinguished oculists. Lithotomy he always performed with the gorget, an instrument almost unknown to the present generation of surgeons. The lithotome, double or single, or the bistoury, in adroit hands, have supplanted it, and are now universally employed; but by no new instrument or other method have better results been secured than by the gorget in the hands of Dr. Banks, or by Prof. Dudley, of Kentucky, who followed the same method. In this, as in many other instances, that instrument is best which the operator can most skillfully handle. Statistics do not declare decisively in favor of either. In reviewing Dr. Bank's professional career, with the unfavorable surroundings as a country doctor, we are filled with admiration at his magnificent success, and share the regret of a personal friend, that his characteristic modesty prevented his removal to some large city, where his skill and learning would have made for him a world-wide reputation; but, like his near neighbor, Dr. Crawford Long (another Georgia doctor), he did not seem to comprehend the importance of what he did for mankind. In 1832, Dr. Banks removed to the village of Gainsville, in Hall county, where many of his professional triumphs were achieved, and where he resided until his death in 1850. Gainsville was within a few miles of the territory then occupied by the Cherokee Indians. The smallpox prevailed among them at one time. Dr. Banks was employed by the Federal government to visit and carry to them the knowledge and benefits of vaccination; he performed this duty faithfully, and gave them also the benefits of his surgical skill. He greatly enjoyed the wonder of these simple people at the restoration to sight of many of them who had been blind for years. "The great medicine man" they thought possessed of superhuman power and superhuman beneficence. Dr. Banks acquired and enjoyed an ample fortune. His prudence, judgment and good sense were as remarkable in the conduct of his pecuniary as of his professional business, and enabled him to leave to his widow and to his children a good estate. In honor of his memory, the general assembly of the state of Georgia gave to a sub-division of her territory the name of "the County of Banks."

WILLIAM GASTON BULLOCH, M. D. William Gaston Bulloch, M. D., was born in Savannah, Ga., on Aug. 4, 1815, and was sixty-nine years, ten months and nineteen days of age when he died. He came of a long line of distinguished ancestry and was the great-grandson of Dr. John Irvine and Dr. Noble Wimberly Jones. Dr. Bulloch was the great-grandson of Hon. Archibald Bulloch, president and commander-in-chief of Georgia in 1776, and a direct lineal descendant of the colonial judges, James DeVeaux, James Bulloch and Noble Jones, and a direct descendant of the ancient families of Irvine of Cults, Douglas of Tilwhilly and Baillie of Dunraven. Dr. Bulloch attended Dickerson college, Pennsylvania, and graduated from Yale college in 1835, and in medicine from the university of Pennsylvania in 1838, after which he visited Europe and attended a private course of medical lectures in Paris, France. Returning to America in 1840 he commenced the practice of his profession in Savannah, where, for nearly forty years, he resided until his death on June 23, 1885. He was at one time the chief if not only surgeon of note in Savannah and one of the most eminent in the south, and was an oculist of considerable repute as well as a noted physician and humanitarian, as evidenced by beautiful testimonials presented to him in the shape of silver pitchers given to him by the citizens of Beaufort, S. C., in the yellow fever epidemic of 1854, whither he had gone to aid suffering humanity, and also a testimonial from the female orphan asylum. It is needless to recount the various capital operations performed by this distinguished surgeon; suffice it to say that he was one of the first southern surgeons to perform the operation of ovariectomy. He repeatedly performed the operation for cataract, and many other difficult operations. He was one of the founders of the Savannah Medical college and professor of surgery therein, one of the consulting surgeons of the Savannah hospital, Georgia infirmary, Abraham's home, admitted on Dec. 21, 1869, as a corresponding member of the Boston Gynecological society, president of the Medical association of Georgia, and alderman of the city. He was a writer of considerable merit. When the late war between the states came on he patriotically gave his services to his country, and held the rank of full surgeon with the title of major, serving in Richmond, Va., where he helped organize the first hospital. He was a member of the Charleston, S. C., medical examining board, and in charge of a hospital nearly all through the war in Savannah, Ga. All through life he was a highly useful citizen, an honest man, kind to his family, generous and hospitable. He was an example of the chivalrous southern gentleman. In army life he was the idol of the soldiers because of his tender, skilful, loving ministrations to the humblest follower of the Confederacy. Many a poor, ragged Confederate soldier found in him a friend and benefactor. Peace to his ashes, honor to his memory.

HENRY FRAZER CAMPBELL, M. D. The subject of this sketch was born in Savannah, Ga., Feb. 10, 1824; died in Augusta, Ga. His father, James Colgan Campbell, was born in County Antrim, Ireland. His mother was Mary R. (Eve) Campbell, the only daughter of Joseph Eve, and a sister of Dr. Joseph A. Eve, of Augusta. After having received an academic education he began the study of medicine at the age of fifteen, and in March, 1842, when eighteen years of age, was graduated M. D. from the Medical college of Georgia—now the medical department of the university of Georgia. Immediately after graduating in medicine he established himself in the practice of his profession in Augusta, Ga., where he continued to reside and practice, with an exception of the period of time from 1862 to 1865, when he was engaged in the military service of the Confederate states at Richmond, Va.; and 1867-68, when he resided in New Orleans, La., and filled the chair of professor of surgery in the New Orleans School of Medicine. Francis Bacon said: "I hold every man a debtor to his profession, from the which as men of course do seek to receive countenance and profit, so ought they of duty to endeavor themselves by way of amends to be a help and ornament thereunto." Let us inquire how Dr. Campbell discharged this duty to his profession. From 1842 to 1854 he filled the position of assistant demonstrator of anatomy in the Medical college of Georgia; from 1854 to 1857 was professor of comparative and microscopical anatomy; 1857-67 was professor of anatomy; in 1867-68 was professor of surgery in New Orleans School of Medicine, and clinical lecturer in Charity hospital, New Orleans, La. In the fall of 1868 the Medical college of Georgia created the chair of operative surgery and invited Dr. Campbell to return from New Orleans to Augusta and accept the professorship thus created. Dr. Campbell complied with this request and filled the chair of operative surgery and gynecology until 1881, when Dr. L. A. Dugas resigned the chair of principles and practice of surgery, and Dr. Campbell was elected professor of principles and practice of surgery and gynecology. During the late war he was medical director of the Georgia military hospitals at Richmond, Va., and a member of the army medical examining board of the Confederate states; he was a member of the American Medical association, was vice-president in 1858 and at the meeting in Washington, D. C., in 1884 was unanimously elected president; was a member of the Medical association of Georgia, and elected its president in 1871; a member of the American Public Health association, and vice-president in 1880; a member and one of the founders of the American Gynecological society; a member and vice-president of the American surgical association; president Augusta Library and Medical society in 1878; a corresponding member of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, elected 1858; corresponding member of the Imperial Academy of Medicine of St. Petersburg, Russia, elected 1860; elected in 1878 foreign corresponding member of the Royal Medical society of Sweden; member of the state board of health of Georgia; elected member of Abingdon Academy of Medicine, Virginia, in 1879; elected in 1882 an honorary member of the American Academy of Medicine. In the history of the profession few men have had so many honors conferred upon them. He is the only Georgian who was ever elected president of the American Medical association. The presidency of this association is the highest honor which can be conferred on an American physician.

The following list presents the more important professional contributions which have emanated from the pen of Dr. Campbell: "Observations on Cutaneous Diseases;" "Infantile Paroxysmal Convulsions, Their Identity with Intermittent Fever, and Their Treatment with Quinine;" "Dentition in Producing Disease (Reflex-secretory or Vaso-motor Action);" "Epidemic Dengue Fever;" "Law Governing the Distribution of Striped and Unstriped Muscular Fiber;" "Injuries to the Cranium in Their Relation to Consciousness;" "Bilateral Lithotomy;" "Unusual Form of Fever and Dysentery;" "Report on Surgery;" "The Nature of Typhoid Fever;" "The Sympathetic Nerve in Reflex Phenomena a Question of Priority of Announcement with M. Claud Bernard;" "Strangulated Ventral Hernia During Pregnancy;" "Clinical Lecture on Traumatic Tetanus;" "Meckel's Ganglion;" "Classification of Febrile Diseases by the Nervous System;" "The Nervous System in Febrile Diseases, Excito-secretory or Reflex 'Vaso-motor' Action, the Basis of Their Phenomena;" "The Secretory and Excito-secretory System;" "Caffeine as an Antidote to Opium;" "A New 'Ready Method,' Artificial Respiration in the Sitting Posture;" "Croup, a Paroxysmal Neurosis, Its Treatment with Quinine;" "The Effect of Caffeine Upon the Muscular System;" "The Georgia Military Hospitals of Richmond;" "Traumatic Hemorrhages and the Arteries;" etc; a chapter in the Confederate Manual of Military Surgery, 1 vol. 12mo, p. 297, Richmond, 1863 (in this chapter the principle of ligating the main arterial trunk of a limb, for the cure of inflammation, and for gangrene, is announced); "The Hunterian Ligation of Arteries in Destructive Inflammation;" "Inflammation;" "Position;" "Position, Pneumatic Pressure, and Mechanical Appliance in Uterine Displacement;" "Registration and Sanitation;" "Blood-letting in Puerperal Eclampsia;" "Railroad Transportation of Disease Germs;" (yellow and dengue fever in the south in 1839, 1850, 1854, and 1876) report of state board of health of Georgia, 1876; "Pneumatic Self-replacement in Dislocations, of the Gravid and Non-gravid Uterus;" "Calculi in the Bladder After the Cure of Vesico-vaginal Fistula;" "The Neuro-dynamic Etiology and Pathology of Urinary Calculus;" "Arterial Ligation in the Treatment of Traumatic Inflammation and Gangrene;" "Strictures of the Oesophagus, Their Nature and Treatment;" "Rectal Alimentation in the Nausea and Inanition of Pregnancy." Any sketch omitting to mention the discovery of the excito-secretory system of nerves by Dr. Campbell would do him great injustice. Three years after his discovery the great English physiologist, Marshall Hall, announced through the "London Lancet" that he had discovered this system. Upon reading Dr. Hall's paper Dr. Campbell promptly presented him with copies of his publication several years preceding that of Dr. Hall. Dr. Hall immediately by letter to Dr. Campbell and through the medical press withdrew his claim and awarded the credit to Dr. Campbell. He said: "It would be unjust to deny that Dr. Campbell has the merit of having first called attention to the excito-secretory system, in the year 1850, and that he imposed this very designation in 1853. So far, Dr. Campbell's claims are undeniable, and we would say palman qui meruit ferat." An examination of the vast number of contributions which he has made to medical science attests the versatility of his genius, and points to the enthusiasm of the scientist. As a general practitioner of medicine Dr. Campbell was a careful and accurate diagnostician, and treated his cases with a discriminating judgment which was well nigh unerring. At the bedside he was tender, sympathetic and attentive. He sat with his patients by the hour, and unweariedly ministered to their ills of mind and body. Like St. Luke he was the "beloved physician." He was friend as well as physician—as all true physicians are. Dr. Campbell was a great surgeon. Great surgeons are rare productions. This country is full of mechanical surgeons—men ready and eager to cut and slash into almost every organ of the human body, yet lamentably ignorant of that conservatism which knows and relies upon the recuperative powers of nature aided by enlightened therapeutics. Dr. Campbell was a great surgeon not only in the dextrous use of instruments, but in conservatism, and thereby frequently saved limbs and organs of the body which would have been sacrificed by the surgical jobber. Among the great surgeons of America he was regarded as the peer of the greatest of them. In the year book of the American Surgical association some of its ablest papers are from the pen of Dr. Campbell. He was eminent as a gynecologist. In the American Gynecological society he held high official position, and contributed to its volumes several of its ablest and most instructive papers. He was an eminent sanitarian, a member of the American Public Health association, held the office of vice-president, and contributed able papers to the volumes of its transactions. Great as he unquestionably was in all departments of medicine, he was greatest as a medical teacher. He was cast in the mold in which great instructors are born. I have sat under almost every one of the most renowned medical teachers in America, and give it as my opinion that in this field Dr. Campbell had few equals, and no superiors in this country. His marvelously inquisitive and acquisitive mind, coupled with his great ability as an original thinker, constituted him a profound medical philosopher. His mind was a vast encyclopedia of medicine in all its branches. He was perfectly familiar with all medical questions as to their historical, anatomical, physiological, pathological, clinical and therapeutical aspects. He was in no sense a mere theorist—he was intensely practical. In the lecture room he was fluent of speech, and the natural ease and simplicity of manner, the clearness and directness, the earnestness, the animation with which he lectured evidenced the fact that he sought to impress the minds of the students with the importance of the great truths he presented to them. So accurate and fascinating were his descriptive faculties that even upon subjects which students regarded as dry and irksome—anatomy for example—he awakened interest and a desire for knowledge. He was easy of access by the students. The door of his private room was never closed to those who sought his assistance. After his lecture hour was over he lingered with the students who crowded around him plying him with questions. With cordiality and kindness, a face radiant with smiles and happiness—he answered their questions, and thus convinced them that he felt a personal interest in every one of them. In consequence of his considerate attention to them they loved him—called him “Uncle Henry,” and ever delighted to hear the bell ring which summoned them to his lecture room. In the quiz room he had the rare faculty of so formulating questions as to suggest the answers to the class. As a medical teacher he was not only an educator of medical students, but was an instructor of medical teachers. Whenever and wherever Dr. Campbell appeared before his professional brethren, whether in city, state, national or international societies—as he often did—he commanded the highest respect and closest attention of everybody present. In medical councils he was regarded as an oracle. He charmed his brethren by his marvelous genius in all questions in medical science. I have often sat with him in national medical societies and have seen him hold hundreds of the ablest physicians in America spell-bound by his fascinating, eloquent, brilliant discussions. No citizen of this grand old state ever added greater luster to the name and fame of Georgia than did Henry F. Campbell. The admiration and love of the medical profession of this country for Dr. Campbell exceeded anything I ever witnessed. Whenever I have gone to meetings of state or national medical associations, meeting physicians from all parts of the commonwealth, and from all sections of this vast nation, almost invariably the first question asked was: “Is Henry Campbell here?” If he was in attendance they sought him and paid their respects. If absent they charged me to convey some message of loving remembrance of him. By the princely men of the profession he was regarded as a prince. Yet he was simple and artless, utterly devoid of affectation or egotism, and was cordial and respectful in his bearing toward the humblest member of the profession. Often observing his bearing toward his brethren of all classes I have been lost in admiration of his unbounded courtesy. Throughout his long and laborious life Dr. Campbell was emphatically the young doctors’ friend. He cheerfully responded to their frequent and unreasonable demands upon his time and skill, and did it so willingly and cordially that his younger brethren felt at liberty to call for his aid when they needed it.

It requires a great and good man to unselfishly serve his younger brethren as he did. It requires a great soul to willingly help his competitors to fame as did Dr. Campbell. The small man treats his brethren with neglect or secret opposition when they enter into competition with him. Not so with Dr. Campbell. He seemed to delight in the success of his juniors, and though they occasionally succeeded to practice which had been his, he was as kind and cordial to them as ever. When called in consultation with his brethren he treated them with that courtesy which always marks the gentleman. To his honor be it said he carefully refrained from word or act which would reflect upon their reputation, and higher and better still he never “damned them with faint praise” as the small man is wont to do. As a consequence of his considerate and just treatment of his brethren they all loved him devotedly, and trusted him implicitly. I knew Dr. Campbell as thoroughly well as anyone save those of his immediate household. A more genial, companionable, noble-hearted man never lived. But few men ever possessed as many virtues and so few foibles. There was nothing small about him. He was considerate and generous in thought, speech and act toward everybody. He had less resentment and more charity toward the small men who attempted to wrong him than any man I ever knew. I never saw him angered at any time or with anybody. He was noted for his bright, joyous disposition. He was one of the most learned men in general literature whom I ever met. He was perfectly familiar with ancient and modern classics, and fascinated learned men by his profound and eloquent discussions thereon. In social life he was one of the most charming of men. As a Christian, Dr. Campbell was a strong man if we measure him by David's standard of manhood. When David was upon his dying bed he called his son Solomon and said: "I go the way of all the earth; be thou strong therefore and show thyself a man." David then tells Solomon how to show himself a man—"Keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies." Dr. Campbell was a royal, Godly man. His position as a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian church fully attests his exalted Christian character. As there is a profound philosophy in medicine, so also is there a profound philosophy in religion, and his great mind had penetrated deeply into it. He fully understood that "men as men can reach no higher than the Son of God, the perfect head and pattern of mankind." When abstruse theological questions were presented to him for solution and he found reason unable to explain them, he set reason behind him, and with the simplicity of a little child he answered them with the great, manly answer: "My faith looks up to Thee, Thou Lamb of Calvary." A man like Dr. Campbell—the embodiment of excellence in every station—exemplifying human nature in its highest and best estate—commanded as he richly merited the unstinted homage of all who knew him. I do not speak merely of the homage paid him because of his wonderful intellectuality. Intellect of high order was but one of his possessions. He had that which adorned intellect and made it more resplendent—exalted character. While intellectual development of high order always elicits human admiration, exalted character always commands universal respect and love. Intellect, worldly riches, power, do not make the man—it is the possession of a loving, manly, royal heart—honest, truthful, dutiful, full of the meekness of goodness—that makes the man. Such a man was Dr. Campbell. He lived not for himself alone. He steadfastly and consistently discharged his duty toward God and his fellow-man and industriously cultivated all the faculties which God had given him the better to enable him to discharge the full measure of his duty. Of him it may be said:

"His life was gentle: and the elements
So mixed in him that nature might stand up,
And say to all the world: this was a man."

No man had a loftier conception of the grandeur of his profession than did Dr. Campbell. No man was ever more truly "The Good Samaritan." No man ever practiced the high and sacred duties of his exalted vocation with greater appreciation of its responsibilities. Language is inadequate to make known the richness of blessings which daily crown with joy unspeakable an active, well-spent life, in giving health to man. The true physician finds real joy in his work only as it affords him the rich consciousness that he is laboring in the ante-chamber of a more glorious existence, by humbly walking in the footsteps of the "Great Physician." He realizes that the life on earth, with its conflicts, its joys, its sorrows, its bitter disappointments, no less than its noblest and grandest achievements, is but a training school wherein he may be fitted and qualified for the higher and more resplendent life in the city of gold. That he has no abiding city here, but merely occupies it as a camping ground wherein he is tented for a few years to be trained in his earthly work the better to qualify him for the higher and nobler duties which await him in that kingdom whose maker and builder is God—whose happiness and glory human language is inadequate to portray. He ever remembers that as a physician his daily life should be such that as his work was like that of the “Great Physician,” his purpose in following the healing art should be, as far as possible to human nature, as noble, as pure, as unselfish as his. Thus the highest development of Christian character came to Dr. Campbell through the avenue of his daily vocation. With a man whose daily life had been such as Dr. Campbell’s—spent in loving, tender, unselfish, unwearied ministrations at the bedside of the sick and wounded—who forgot all and labored only to do the work of his Master through love to God and love to man—a man who made it the law of his life to wrong no one, and as far as possible to do good to every one with whom he came in contact, certainly it is not claiming too much to say that this man constantly dwelt in the ante-chamber of heaven, that when his soul winged its flight into eternity it was but a step from earth to heaven. To Dr. Campbell—good Samaritan that he was—death had no terrors, for he knew that the transition from earth to heaven was but divesture of that which was mortal. As he fell on sleep the eye of faith in God had transformed the King of Terrors into an angel of light and mercy, whose hallowed mission it was to transport his soul to regions of everlasting, unspeakable joy. To the good man

“There is no death. The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore;
And bright in Heaven’s jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

“There is no death! An angel form
Walks o’er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them dead.

“He leaves our hearts all desolate,
He plucks our fairest, sweetest flowers,
Transplanted into bliss, they now
Adorn immortal bowers.

“Born unto that undying life,
They leave us but to come again;
With joy we welcome them—the same,
Except in sin and pain.

“And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear, immortal spirits tread;
For all the boundless universe
Is life—there is no dead.”

GEORGE FRANKLIN COOPER, M. D. The subject of this notice was born in Wilkes county, Ga., July 31, 1825. His father was a large planter and a Baptist preacher. When three years old Dr. Cooper moved with his father’s family to Harris county, in this state. He received his education at the academy in Harris county. Beginning the study of medicine, he took his first course of lectures in Transylvania university, Kentucky, and his second course at Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, Pa., from which college he graduated in March, 1845. He began the practice of medicine at Perry, Houston Co., Ga., in 1846. In 1847 he returned to Philadelphia to perfect his medical education. He remained in Philadelphia during 1847 and a portion of 1848. In 1850 he entered Charity hospital at New Orleans. After remaining a year in this vast hospital, he, with a mind stored with the rare experience thus obtained, returned to Perry, Ga., and began the active practice of medicine. He practiced his profession at Perry until 1854, when he removed to Americus, Ga. Dr. S. B. Hawkins, who kindly furnished most of the data from which this tribute is written, says: "Here he practiced his profession successfully, and occupied a pre-eminently high stand in that noble calling, until 1856, when he relinquished the practice of medicine and commenced preaching, serving the Baptist churches of Americus, Albany, and Dalton acceptably and ably as pastor. In 1874 he resigned the pastorate and practiced medicine two years. He then preached a couple of years. Since then he has been regularly in the practice of medicine. It is needless to say to you, and to the medical profession at large, that Dr. Cooper was a strong man in his profession, a power in the church, and wielded an influence in society that few men possessed." Among the medical contributions of Dr. Cooper, we mention the following: "Diseases of Perry, Houston County, and Vicinity; Its Climate, Geology, etc.," "Diet in Disease," "Vaginismus with Enlarged Hymen," "Retroflexion of the Uterus," "Vesico-Vaginal Fistula," "Veratrum Viride," "Sanitary Conditions of Prisons." This last paper was read before the board of health of the state of Georgia, and published in the first annual report of that board. This paper richly demonstrates that its author loved all mankind. For the friendless criminal—while detesting the crime committed—he remembered that he was yet a brother, and that the law of kindness was the door to the heart of the criminal. Dr. Cooper realized the fact that "man's inhumanity to man" was nowhere so forcibly demonstrated as in the treatment of criminals confined within prison walls. He, therefore, began an investigation of the sanitary condition of the various jails in Georgia. He pointed out needed reforms in a number of these prisons. Upon the general management of prisons he said: "Those who have prisons in charge should be required to use them, and thus save the inmates from discomfort and disease. It would not be transcending the work of this board to suggest to the authorities of the state to adopt a simple and safe plan, to which henceforth the several counties should be required to conform, the hygienic arrangements of which will secure the health of prisoners, having in view at least the several points of healthful location, adequate capacity of rooms, abundant supply of air and water, speedy and effectual disposition of excreta. Kindness, coupled with wholesome moral influences, should by no means be neglected. With proper discipline, moral and religious instruction should be provided for every prison; for with our moral improvement comes the improvement of our health—and this will, for stronger reasons, apply to those who are imprisoned." Dr. Cooper was one of the most distinguished members of the Medical association of Georgia. There was scarcely a year but what he was chairman of some committee of this body. He had, perhaps, been more often selected as a delegate from this association to the American Medical association than any other within its membership. He had faithfully served the offices of corresponding secretary and vice-president of this association. During the late war he held the distinguished position of surgeon of Lawton's brigade, and afterward was made surgeon in charge of the hospitals at Macon, Ga. When the board of health of the state of Georgia was organized, Dr. Cooper was selected from the number of distinguished physicians in the third congressional district for membership in that board. In this, as in all positions in which he was placed, he discharged the full measure of duty to his fellow-man. Our deceased brother was active in forwarding the work of public education. He had for years served with marked ability as president of the board of education of Americus. He was a member of the last constitutional convention of Georgia, and at the time of his death a member of the American Public Health association. Dr. Hawkins says: "Dr. Cooper was a fine specimen of physical manhood; enjoyed fine health up to the date of his last illness, which ushered in suddenly and pushed through to a fatal termination rapidly—just one week. The disease was rheumatism of the heart. He died very suddenly, 'in the twinkling of an eye,' on the morning of Dec. 3, 1882. In his death this city has lost what can never be filled—his place in his profession, in the church, and society cannot be filled again by any one man."

JOHN S. COLEMAN, M. D., born in Richmond county, Ga., Oct. 10, 1837; died in Augusta June 19, 1892. After an academic education obtained in Augusta, Ga., and Cantonsville, Md., he attended a course of lectures in the medical department of the university of Virginia, and in March, 1857, received his degree of doctor of medicine from Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, Pa. As a reward for his meritorious examination for his degree in Jefferson Medical college he was given the position of resident physician in Blockly hospital, Philadelphia. He was also clinical assistant to the chair of surgery in Jefferson Medical college. He subsequently served as resident physician in the Baltimore almshouse. After eighteen months of clinical experience subsequent to graduation in medicine he returned to Georgia, located in Lee county, and began the practice of medicine. At the outbreak of the Italian war in 1859, Dr. Coleman went to France with the distinguished Dr. Paul F. Eve, his uncle, with the purpose of entering the medical department of the French army. When he arrived in Paris the war had ended. He then remained in the French capital six months pursuing medical studies in the hospitals. Returning to his native land he located in Augusta and practiced medicine in all of its branches. During the late civil war he served as surgeon in the Confederate army, serving his country faithfully and honorably. He was at the time of his death a member of the Medical Association of Georgia, the American Medical association, the American Gynecological society and of the American Surgical association. He was not a frequent contributor to medical literature, but his writings stamped him as a strong man in his profession. His contributions to medical literature were papers on the following subjects: "The Multiple Wedge Principle in the Treatment of Urethral Stricture," "A Novel and Unique Lesion of the Integument of the Abdominal Wall," "Transverse Septum of the Vagina Obstructing Delivery," "Tincture of Iodine for Arresting Post-partum Hemorrhage," "Cases of Lithotomy," "Caesarian Section Necessitated by Hypertrophic Elongation of the Cervix with Delivery of a Live Child," "Bichloride of Mercury in the Treatment of Diphtheria." To Dr. Coleman belongs the credit of originating the multiple-wedge treatment of urethral stricture. Had he done nothing but this one piece of original work his life would have blessed mankind to a degree rarely equaled by the labors of one man. He was indefatigable in his professional work. Was always busy. If not engaged in attendance upon patients, he was to be found with his books, thus conversing with the savants of the profession. He was a student all his life. He was a highly accomplished physician, highly accomplished in all departments of medicine. The innate modesty of the man kept his accomplishments largely hidden from his brethren and friends. Enjoying a most intimate personal friendship with him for twenty years, I knew him to be highly skilled in his profession, yet I never once heard him boast of anything he had ever done. He discharged his professional duties through love to man and love to God. Neither fame nor money engaged his attention. In his ministry to the sick he was governed by a high sense of duty. To see man benefited by his labors was his greatest desire and highest reward. In professional and social life

"He walked attended
By a strong, abiding champion-conscience."

No man had a higher sense of honor than did Dr. Coleman. His life exemplified the highest type of human nature. In every station in life he was a man of marked excellence. Full of energy, integrity, lofty principles and uncompromising honesty, strong in heart and rich in spirit, he commanded the confidence and love of all who knew him. He was truthful in word and action. He richly illustrated the saying of Lord Chesterfield: "It is truth that makes the success of the gentleman." He was considered eccentric. He was amenable to the charge. He deviated markedly from the usual methods and common standards of men—was peculiar. Peculiar in his courage to be scrupulously honest in speech and action; peculiar in always and under all circumstances, being what he really was, and never pretending to be what he was not; peculiar in his courageous honesty and resistance of temptation. He more scrupulously lived up to the exalted code of ethics of his profession than any man I ever knew. No consideration of any kind could induce him to be disloyal to this high code of laws. He rigidly adhered to the provisions of this code and required his brethren to do likewise. He steadfastly refused to consult or associate with any physician who violated the code of ethics, no matter how prominent he was in the profession. Eccentric he unquestionably was, but his eccentricities always carried him in lines leading to most exalted manhood. Men who did not live up to Dr. Coleman's high standard could not, of course, understand him, and therefore regarded him as an extremist. In this age, when self-aggrandizement seems to be the aim and end of so many physicians, it is peculiarly refreshing to find a man like Dr. Coleman, who ignored selfishness and exerted all his faculties to the promotion of the welfare of mankind. He was a benevolent man, always doing some act of kindness to his patients and friends. In his ministrations to the sick he was thoroughly self-sacrificing, responding to their calls day or night when himself seriously ill. Repeatedly I remonstrated with him and told him he owed it to himself and his family to care more for his own condition and less for that of others. He invariably replied: "I cannot consider self when my patients need and call for my services." Animated by this exalted conception of duty, sacrifice of self for the welfare of others, he lived nobly, died honored and beloved by the community in which he lived. He died after a painful, lingering illness. He bore his affliction with that fortitude which characterized his whole life, and with the courage of the Christian soldier he meekly bowed to the summons of the angel of death.

DR. W. C. DANIEL, of Savannah, Ga. Dr. Daniel was one of the most distinguished physicians in Georgia in his time. It is a matter of surprise and regret that it is at the present impossible to obtain data for a proper biography of so distinguished a medical man as he was. I have written to several prominent physicians of Savannah for the necessary information, but none of them could furnish it, nor could they refer me to any one from whom I could obtain it. I find in my library a book of 152 pages, entitled "Observations Upon the Autumnal Fevers of Savannah, Ga., by W. C. Daniel, M. D., 1826." This book was an important addition to the limited and inexact literature of malarial fevers at the date at which it was written. The treatise embraced the whole class of malarial fevers. Dr. Daniel's conception of the pathology and therapeutics of this class of fevers differed radically from the then practice of medicine. He combated the idea of malaria being an inflammatory disease, and condemned the practice of salivation, blood-letting, tartar emetic, etc. He contended that all the malarial fevers were diseases of debility, prostration, and that they were to be combated by a tonic, supportive treatment. He applied sinapisms to the surface of the body, gave caps-cum, quinine bark, serpentaria, and arsenic internally, in full and oft-repeated doses. Where the fever was excessive he resorted to cold effusions, and in milder cases to sponging the body with warm water. The revulsive action of sinapisms and the beneficial, stimulant effect of capsicum, internally administered, were as fully appreciated by him as at the present day. And while the administration of arsenic seems to have for years fallen into "innocuous desuetude," Dr. Daniel insisted upon its beneficial action in malarial fevers, and gave it in large doses. He insisted upon the efficacy of quinine bark in all types and grades of malarial fever. At that time his professional brethren in America insisted that bark was efficacious only in the intermittent type. He frequently gave it in doses of four ounces in twenty-four hours in severe cases, and two ounces where the disease was milder. He says: "I use it in every stage of the fever, whether of remission or exacerbation, with equal convenience. Once commenced, it is continued throughout the disease, in as large quantities as the stomach will receive; and it is mainly to this mode that I attribute the very general success which has attended the use of it in my hands. I have used the sulphate of quinine, and with complete success. I have thought that the recoveries where that was used were not as speedy as by the use of the bark, and that the reaction of the system was not so vigorous. Whether it be the result of habit, I will not pretend to decide, but I do prefer the bark, and still habitually use it. I have been gratified to learn that some of our physicians who, in 1821, '22, '23, pronounced bark a poison, when used in our fevers, in 1824 declared that they could not dispense with sulph. quinine in their treatment. More recently (1825), some of our physicians complain that they are not so successful with the sulphate of quinine as the last year. The explanation of this will be found in the fact that the aid they received in their perplexities from this medicine induced them to overestimate its virtues. I have recently, in a few cases, administered the bitter extract, prepared from the residuum remaining after making sulphate of quinine, as introduced by Dr. Jackson, of Philadelphia, and with complete success. In all respects, so far as a limited observation will allow me to judge, it has appeared equal in efficacy to the sulphate of quinine." Speaking of the method of giving quinine bark, he says: "The great virtues of the bark are chiefly to be derived when that article is administered in large quantities in a small space of time; and then, it is highly serviceable in the early and almost certain removal of fevers." While the pathology of malarial fevers and the modus operandi of anti-malarial agents were not as exactly known to Dr. Daniel as to his brethren of a later, and especially the present, day, yet, to his credit it must be said that he possessed knowledge of the power of anti-malarial remedies unknown to the profession at that time. That the practice of Dr. Daniel was radically different from that of the profession of his day is attested by the following extract from the introduction to his book: "That I feel solicitude for the fate that awaits these observations, it would be folly to deny. In this anxiety, however, there is but little that is selfish. Limited in my professional views to a small town, where personal address is of more importance than higher qualifications, I feel that I shall be but little affected by the judgment which the medical public may pass upon my labors. I also know that, while I may be summarily condemned, what I may gain will be silently and slowly acquired. The revolution which I propose in the long-established opinions of a whole profession, if ever achieved, must be the work of time. In medicine, as in religion, there is no standard by which matters of opinion can be measured in the sight of men; and in the one, as in the other, much depends upon the faith of the parties. Hence, the bitterness of the controversies concerning either. I expect few converts among those who have long pursued the profession." Dr. Daniel then forcibly shows the necessity for southern medical colleges and southern medical literature, in the following words: "It is to those who are to be the future physicians of the southern states, where the fevers of which I treat are habitual and destructive, that I would most earnestly appeal. To this hour the judgments of the southern physicians are chained to the desks of the northern schools. The latter complain of the undue influence which European doctrines exercise over the minds of the American physicians. That is not more preposterous than the professional sovereignty of the north is over the south. No man feels a higher respect for the talents, learning, and industry of the medical gentlemen of the northern and middle states; no one is more gratified than myself, at the honorable competition which the northern medical schools hold with the munificently endowed institutions of the same kind in Europe. They certainly understand the diseases of their own climate much better than we of the south do. But in turn, something is due to our experience and observation in our appropriate diseases. The medical profession of the south is without character, and consequently respectability and reputation. These are to be obtained only by combination, the liberal patronage of our state legislatures, and by the erection of medical schools among us. The example set by the legislatures of Virginia and South Carolina are as commendable for their policy as laudable for their liberality." Not only was Dr. Daniel a highly accomplished general practitioner of medicine, but he was possessed of a genius for surgery, as is attested by the following original plan of treating fractures of the thigh. Dr. L. B. Grandy, of Atlanta, in a recent article in the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal," entitled "The History of Medicine and Surgery in Georgia," says:

"The treatment of fracture of the thigh by the weight and pulley was first used in this country by Dr. Daniel, of Savannah, Ga. His first case occurred in 1819. To obtain continuous extension he folded a silk handkerchief securely around the patient's ankle and tied the ends across the sole of the foot. A cord and weight were then attached, and passed over a roller at the foot of the bed. A second case was similarly treated in 1824. The roller in this case was replaced by a pulley. Dr. Daniel describes his cases in the "American Journal of Medical Science" for August, 1829.* His paper at once attracted the attention of Dr. Milton Antony, of Augusta, who "determined on adopting the method in the first case that should occur." In the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," October, 1836, Dr. Antony reports five cases, "all of which had been treated on the plan herein detailed and with like success." One of these cases was a man aged forty-six. Fracture in upper third thigh. "A short roller bandage was passed around the ankle and bottom of the foot where a string was attached, which, passing over the foot of the bed, suspended a piece of brick weighing about two and a half pounds. Short splints were applied also about the point of fracture. Patient was discharged cured in about six weeks. Dr. Antony dispensed with the pulley of Dr. Daniel, merely allowing the cord to suspend from the end of the mattress or table. Dr. Antony's opinion of this method was that "it establishes, in the most satisfactory manner, the propriety of a plan of management at once calculated to insure the best success with the simplest apparatus and the least distress." It will thus be seen that many years before the so-called "Buck's extension apparatus" was introduced into the New York hospital in 1852 every mechanical principle of that arrangement had been used and described by the above-named surgeons. The general teaching, therefore, that this method of treating fractures of the thigh was originally suggested by Dr. Gurdon Buck is wholly incorrect.

L. A. DUGAS, M. D., LL. D. In writing this biography of my venerable and beloved friend, Dr. L. A. Dugas, it is no part of my purpose or desire to attempt anything like fulsome laudation of the dead. Nor is this tribute presented with the hope of adding to the fame of him whose life was devoted to active, fruitful industry in usefulness to his fellow-man, governed by a single-mindedness to truth and unswerving fidelity to the discharge of every duty pertaining to his exalted position as a citizen, a much beloved and highly accomplished physician, a genuine philanthropist and a learned scientist. Dr. Dugas' fame is written in the annals of scientific medicine, and though dead he yet lives and exerts an influence upon men who are members of that profession which he did so much to advance and adorn. The purpose of this biography, as all biographies should be, is for instruction of the living, to inquire into his career to eminence and fame, and to explore the foundation on which he builded so wisely and grandly. In him was a rare type of exalted manhood, and the study of his life should inspire the young men of our profession to emulate his character that they may participate in the royal honors which crown the work of the man who devotes himself to the advancement of his race.

Louis Alexander Dugas was born Jan. 3, 1806, in Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., and was the son of Louis Rene Adrien Dugas de Vallon. The DeVallons were of French West Indian descent, immigrating from France some two generations ago to St. Domingo, where they became wealthy planters. His father, although born in St. Domingo, resided constantly in Paris, where his ample fortune enabled him to gratify his literary tastes; he was a gentleman of large and varied information, and had graduated in the law, besides acquiring great proficiency in the sciences. His mother, Mary Pauline Bellumeau de la Vincendiere, was a native of St. Domingo, where her parents had been wealthy planters for generations, but always educated their children in Paris, and it was there she met M. de Vallon and married him in August, 1790. A gentleman of leisure and cultivated tastes—one of the old regime—had few inducements to remain in France in those troublous times, and accordingly M. de Vallon and his wife left for St. Domingo to settle on their plantation, where generations of their ancestors had preceded them. They had not long been there, however, before the revolution in the parent country extended itself to the colony, and resulted in the emancipation of the blacks, driving them, with an infant daughter and but slender pecuniary means, to seek refuge in the United States. They landed in Charleston in 1791, and in deference to the republican simplicity of the land of their adoption, dropped the "de Vallon" from their name and were henceforth simply Dugas. After about a year's residence in Georgetown, S. C., they removed to Newport, R. I., where they remained till 1801, when they removed to Fredericktown, Md. Three years in Maryland caused them to remove to Savannah, seeking a warmer climate, and in 1804 they settled in Washington, Wilkes Co., where Dr. L. A. Dugas was born, with a twin brother, Louis Charles, who was afterward a planter, and died in 1866. His father died in 1807, and in December, 1810, his mother, a most estimable and accomplished lady, removed to Augusta, established a female seminary, and was so successful as to educate her family and accumulate a competency. His mother educated her son until he was fifteen, with the exception of two or three quarters at the academy of Richmond county. She had the proud satisfaction of seeing the prosperity of her children, and died in 1854, being then eighty-three years of age. Dr. Dugas, in 1820, entered the office of Dr. Charles Lambert De Beauregard, a French emigre, to study medicine. Dr. Beauregard dying in 1822, he entered the office of Dr. John Dent and studied for two years. He then attended lectures in Baltimore, Md., and Philadelphia, and was graduated at the university of Maryland in March, 1827. The medical department of that university was then considered the best school in the country. He attended all the hospitals of these cities, and feeling the great responsibility of the practitioner, he resolved to perfect himself in the European schools. After some plantation practice and study in Georgia, he sailed, in 1828, for Europe, where he remained three years, during which he made himself thoroughly acquainted with England, France, Switzerland, Germany and Italy, making Paris his headquarters. There he devoted himself with persistent energies to his medical studies, devoting sixteen hours of each day to different branches of science, and so methodically arranging his time, alternating the severer with the more attractive branches of study, as to insure constant interest and avoid weariness.

During his sojourn abroad he began those habits of systematic, varied and diligent study which characterized him during his whole life. Thus we find him devoting the mornings to visiting hospitals and following the professors in their rounds through the wards, visiting patients, and making surgical operations, and attending the dead-house, closely watching post-mortem examinations. In the evenings he attended the full courses of lectures at the Sarbonne, of such talented professors as Gay Lussac and Thenard on chemistry, Pouillet on physics, Arago on astronomy, Cuvier, Blainville and Geoffrey St. Hilaire on natural history, Beaumont on geology, Magendie on physiology, Boyet, Roux and Velpeau on surgery, Dupuytren and Lesfranc on chemical surgery, Guersent on the diseases of children, Cousin on philosophy, Villemain on eloquence and criticism, and Guizot on the history of civilization. He also attended the lectures of such illustrious and prominent men as Baron Larrey, Dubois, Alibert, Biett, Lugol, Broussais, Audral, Louis, Chomel and Orfila. Having graduated from an American college whose diploma was recognized in Europe he, upon exhibiting his diploma, had free access to all the medical colleges and hospitals. It was during his sojourn in Paris that he observed the revolution from Broussais' deteriorating treatment to the conservative plan of Audral and Louis, and he became an ardent supporter of the latter system. He also studied with interest Civiale's method of lithotrity, and successfully performed this operation four times after his return to America. The writer witnessed one of these operations in the hands of Dr. Dugas, and was charmed by the dexterity, success and coolness of the operator. With a mind stored with the useful and marvelous education which he had acquired in Europe, he set sail for America and returned to Augusta in June, 1831, and began the practice of medicine. In 1832 he, with Drs. Milton Anthony, Lewis D. Ford, John Dent, Paul F. Eve and Joseph A. Eve founded and organized the Medical College of Georgia (now the medical department of the university of Georgia). Dr. Dugas was elected professor of anatomy and physiology; a few years subsequently he relinquished the chair of anatomy to Dr. George M. Newton, and became professor of physiology and pathological anatomy. This professorship he held until 1855, when he was elected to that of principles and practice of surgery, which chair he held until his resignation from the faculty in 1880.

In 1834 Dr. Dugas again visited Europe, having been sent by the Medical College of Georgia with $6,000 to purchase a library and museum for that institution. Having an acquaintance with Parisian collectors he was enabled to purchase a fine museum, with many rare specimens, and a valuable library, embracing many rare books. During this visit to Paris he was elected a member of the Geological Society of France. He returned to Augusta in the fall of 1834, and began the general practice of medicine, devoting more special attention to surgery. In 1851 he again visited Europe and traveled extensively over the continent, visiting the world's fair at the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, London. In 1851 he became the editor of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," published in Augusta. During his editorial management, which lasted for seven years, this journal was noted for its high order of medical journalism, and continued numerous and voluminous contributions from the pen of its illustrious editor. Dr. Dugas was a medical philosopher. His genius was of that high and rare order which qualified him for thorough investigation and elucidation of abstruse questions in all the multiform departments of medicine. A mere glance at the list of his contributions to medical literature will show the versatility of his genius. Most of these papers are to be found in the volumes of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal." The remainder appear in the "New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal," the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal," the transactions of the American Medical association, the transactions of the Medical association of Georgia, and transactions of the International Medical congress. It is impossible to enter into an examination of the numerous and voluminous medical writings of Dr. Dugas, nor can a brief synopsis of each of them be presented. This grand man, constantly engaged in an arduous practice of medicine and surgery, published to the profession 127 medical papers, exclusive of a large number of translations of valuable current medical literature. Many of his papers contain original views on the subjects discussed, and some of them record original discoveries made by him. It would be an injustice to the dead to fail on the present occasion to call attention to the following subjects: Dr. Dugas was unquestionably the first physician in our state, and I believe in the union, to call the attention of the profession and municipal authorities to the portability of the poison of yellow fever in railroad cars, and to advocate the breaking of bulk of freight and change of cars from an infected city before reaching one free of the disease. He pointed out the absolute impossibility of thoroughly ventilating box cars by leaving the doors open, and warned municipal authorities of the great danger of the then prevalent practice of depending on this method of railroad sanitary supervision. In demonstration of the justice of this claim I cite his position before the Medical Society of Augusta in 1839, and an article from his pen to be found in the Augusta "Constitutionalist" of Feb. 12, 1855. It is proper to add in this connection that when the entire medical faculty of Augusta claimed the local origin of yellow fever in our city in the epidemic of 1839, Dr. Dugas was the only physician who dissented from this view. He claimed then, and to the day of his death, that the disease was imported into Augusta by freight and railroad cars from Charleston, S. C. When the science of surgery knew no certain method for diagnosing dislocations of the shoulder joint, it was the mind of Dr. Dugas, ever fruitful in investigation and diagnosis, which gave to the profession a method grand in its simplicity and never-failing in certainty, by which the merest tyro in surgery could say with unerring accuracy if or not the shoulder joint was dislocated. Dr. Dugas says of his method: "If the fingers of the injured limb can be placed by the patient or by the surgeon upon the sound shoulder, while the elbow touches the thorax, there can be no dislocation; and if this cannot be done there must be a dislocation. In other words, it is physically impossible to bring the elbow in contact with the sternum or front of the thorax if there be a dislocation; and the inability to do this is proof positive of the existence of dislocation, inasmuch as no other injury of the shoulder joint can induce this inability." This applies to all forms of dislocations of the shoulder joint. The last medical paper from the pen of the deceased may be justly styled the crowning work of his life, and was destined to revolutionize the practice of surgeons in treating penetrating wounds of the abdomen. While the deceased was the most eminently conservative surgeon I ever knew, he was, when the occasion demanded it, as bold as any surgeon that ever lived. Hence we find him in 1876 at the international medical congress at Philadelphia, before the section on surgery, where the most brilliant surgeons of the whole world were congregated, saying that peritonitis was not the great cause of mortality from penetrating wounds of the abdomen. He said "the frightful mortality of penetrating wounds of the abdomen, and the rapidity with which the fatal result is brought about, point directly and immediately to septicaemia or blood poisoning, as the only condition at all adequate to such effects; and that the blood poisoning is the almost necessary consequence of the plan of treatment recommended by standard authorities and carried out in daily practice; . . . in all instances of penetrating wounds of the abdomen, in which there may be any suspicion of the existence of effusion of blood or feces into the peritoneal cavity, the surgeon should proceed as follows: (1) Induce anesthesia; (2) lay open the abdomen along the linea alba freely enough to make a thorough inspection of the parts contained; (3) ligate all bleeding vessels as far as possible; (4) examine carefully the whole length of the alimentary canal, in order to detect any wounds, and to stitch them. If the intestinal wound be ragged, it should be trimmed down to a straight edge; (5) in gunshot wounds reduce the channels of entrance as well as of exit through the abdominal walls to the form of incised wounds, so that these may be closed and left to adhere by first intention. In some cases it may be found necessary for this purpose to remove the uneven tracks by a double elliptic incision; (6) cleanse the wound and peritoneum of all extraneous materials, and close the abdominal walls with suitable sutures and adhesive plasters; (7) finally control the peristaltic action with opium, and administer such nourishment as will leave least fecal residuum, as milk, eggs, etc." In conclusion he adds: "If the practice now suggested be considered harsh and hazardous, I would ask what can be worse than the authorized plan, which makes death the rule and recovery the rarest exception? Is it not time that we should regard as groundless the fears heretofore entertained with regard to the danger of opening the abdominal cavity? No change of practice in the class of wounds under consideration can make the chances of recovery less than they are now; and I feel confident that by adopting the plan proposed we would so alter the results as to make recovery the rule and death the exception." Dr. Dugas possessed a mind richly endowed for distinction in any department of medicine, but it was as a surgeon—viewed in the loftiest sense of that term—that his accomplishments shone forth with resplendent eminence. He possessed all the attributes of the great surgeon. He was unusually conversant with the principles of medicine, and therefore fully appreciated the reciprocal connection of its various branches and the dependence of one upon the other. He fully appreciated the conservative and recuperative powers of nature, contended that the genius of surgery consisted in repairing an injury or curing a disease without the use of the knife save as a dernier ressort. He had unmeasured contempt for the surgical jobber—dextrous in using the knife, but ignorant of the higher and better parts of the science. He never attempted the so-called brilliant surgical operations which consisted in having an assistant present with watch in hand to proclaim the number of seconds in which he amputated a limb, extracted a calculus or excised a tumor. To the contrary, he was a cautious operator, selecting his subjects with great judgment, and having properly prepared the system of the patient, he with slow and careful strokes of the knife proceeded with the operation with the conscientious conviction that the good of the patient—not the reputation of the operator—should be the sole consideration. He was thoroughly learned in relative anatomy and the fundamental principles of surgery, and made minute and methodical arrangements for every detail of the operation and any emergency which might arise during its progress. His assistants were carefully selected, each one assigned his part, and expected to perform it. After making the necessary preparations, he took the knife and guided it with an unflinching hand, and

step by step carefully proceeded to his work, the results showing the marvelous skill of the surgeon. In surgical diagnosis and prognosis his judgment was almost infallible; manipulations of surgical injuries were made with marked tenderness, and the patient made to feel that he sympathized deeply with his sufferings and soon saw that he was in the hands of a considerate friend and skillful surgeon. He regarded with distrust hazardous operations and untried novelties, and never resorted to either except after weighty deliberation. In his practice he used the simplest dressings—with unusual attention to cleanliness—and avoided showy apparatus and the unseemly display of instruments. In the practice of medicine he was noted for unmeasured scorn and contempt of the impostor and the polypharmacist. His hospital lectures abound in satire and medical quackery. In this department of medicine he was gifted with a strong and analytical mind in judging of the pathology and natural history of the diseases, and every prescription he made was with a definite purpose, guided by a charming simplicity. As a teacher of medicine, his lectures were remarkably clear, precise and practical; there was an absence of specious theorizing, careless generalizations and lax assertions which made them a blessing to the students. He was singularly devoted to truth. If the truth of any subject discussed lay beyond his comprehension, or if doubts existed in his mind, he was sufficiently great to frankly confess his ignorance of or doubts upon the subject-matter under consideration. Possessed as he was of a mind of profound erudition and marvelous analytic power, guided by great assiduity of investigation, he carefully winnowed the precious wheat of demonstrated facts from the chaff of speculation and doubt. His style of lecturing was marked by unaffected ease of delivery, simplicity of manner, marked perspicuity, and great solicitude to impress his hearers with a knowledge of the themes presented for their instruction. As a consequence he was loved by every student of the college, and by many worshiped as the Gamaliel of medicine, at whose feet it were an honor to sit and learn.

Dr. Dugas was remarkably kind to, and considerate of the students and younger practitioners of medicine. He was dean of the faculty of the medical college of Georgia for twenty years, and therefore it is needless for me to portray to the two thousand physicians of the south who graduated under him, the courtesy and kindness with which he met them at the threshold of the profession, and the encouragement with which he sent them out into the world to their high and sacred ministry to suffering and diseased mankind. His love for and kind assistance to meritorious young physicians exceeded that of any man I ever knew. If he saw anything in conduct that was improper, he kindly and considerately admonished the young man of the necessity for a change. Advice or reproof was given with the fatherly tenderness which won the admiration and love of the man reproofed, and awakened an ambition to be like unto the fatherly friend. If he called a young physician to his assistance in a surgical operation, he invariably required the patient to pay a proper fee to the assistant as well as the operator. Dr. Dugas, while an eminent and dearly beloved physician, possessed a mind of rare and varied endowments outside of his profession. Philosophy, science, art, history, etc., had been studied so assiduously and systematically that he was as learned in all of these as in his chosen profession. Dr. Dugas had many positions of distinction and trust conferred upon him at various periods of his life, among which were the following: He was elected president of the Augusta Medical society; president of the Medical Association of Georgia; vice-president of the International Medical congress, 1876; president of the board of trustees of Richmond academy; president of the Augusta Gas Light company; president of the Augusta Insurance and Banking company; chairman of committee of city council to erect a monument to signers of Declaration of Independence, etc. He was elected for a number of years a member of the city council, and held membership in several scientific and literary associations. In recognition of his literary and scientific attainments, the university of Georgia, in 1869, conferred on Dr. Dugas the degree of LL. D. As a citizen, his life was most exemplary. He exhibited great interest in questions affecting the welfare of his city, state and nation, and contributed to the columns of the Augusta newspapers a number of able and thoughtful contributions upon municipal, state and national topics. In all things he was a man of marked independence and fearlessness—not that so called independence or fearlessness which manifest themselves in acts of turbulence or bravado and indifference to public censure, right or wrong, but his independence was of that character which ornaments chivalrous manhood and dares to brave public opinion and censure when the actor is panoplied with truth and right. He never made merchandise of principles in order that popular approval might signalize his efforts. His acts were determined only after mature deliberation, and from his convictions he was as immovable as the rocks of Gibraltar, unless shown to be in error. An illustration of his manliness and fearlessness is to be found in his opposition to the secession movement of 1861. He entertained no doubt whatever as to the right of the southern states to secede from the Union, but was uncompromisingly opposed to it, as he deemed such a step unwise and destructive of the best interest of the south, and was also rather an abandonment of our rights than a manly assertion and vindication of them. His writings evidence profound knowledge of the questions at issue, and his analysis and refutation of arguments in favor of the movement, viewed by the results thereof, show him to have written as though guided by prophetic inspiration. At the time of his writings in opposition to secession, party passion and prejudice were highly inflamed, and only the patriot, with a mind deeply imbued with a sense of right and justice, would have dared to publicly avow them. Opposed as he was to the movement, he, however, like a patriot, cast his fortunes with his state after she had decided to secede from the Union, and did all in his power to advance the interests of the south. His time, talent and money were freely given to his country. He rendered most valuable services to the Confederate government in the medical department. He promptly volunteered his services to the government, and was commissioned surgeon of Walker's command of Georgia troops. In a short time he was commissioned as consulting surgeon to the Confederate hospital in Augusta, where his rare acquirements, experience and conservatism as a surgeon bore rich fruits in the saving of limb and life. After devoting a long period of life to the relief of human suffering and the promotion of the best interests of his race, Dr. Dugas did what all wise men propose to themselves, and what but few execute, voluntarily retired from the bustle of life to the quietude of his own home, where he might in the bosom of his family enjoy the society of loved ones, and take to himself time for reflection upon the affairs of life and prepare for its close. His clients heard with regret of his determination to give up his practice, and often the appeals of friendship forced him to respond to calls against which he found it difficult to maintain his resolution. He was one of the founders of the medical college of Georgia, and continued in its service as the last work of his life. He continued to lecture at the college until 1880, when he resigned his professorship and withdrew from public service. In the full possession of intellectual power, he devoted the remainder of his days to the further cultivation of his mind, and was blessed with contentment and cheerfulness to the day of his death. On Oct. 19, 1884, after a brief illness, death closed his life-work. To the end of his days he retained his wonted intellectual vigor, and at the close had attained to the highest pinnacle of earthly ambition—highly respected, beloved and honored by all who knew him; respected for his marvelous industry and talents; beloved as a most eminent physician, whose skill and tender care had relieved and comforted his fellow-creatures; honored for the possession of those traits of character which constitute the true gentleman in all the walks of life. These form the crown of honor which adorned his brow, and a grateful people lovingly cherish his memory as worthy of everlasting remembrance.

DR. PAUL FITZSIMMONS EVE. Dr. Paul Fitzsimmons Eve, A. B., A M., LL. D., university of Georgia; M. D., university of Pennsylvania; bearer of the golden cross of honor of Poland; president of the American Medical association, 1857-8; president Tennessee State Medical society, 1871-2; centennial representative of surgery to the medical congress of nations at Philadelphia, 1876; professor of surgery in the Medical college of Georgia from 1832 to 1849; professor of surgery university of Louisville in 1850, and in the medical department of Nashville, and later Vanderbilt university from 1853 to 1876, and professor of surgery in the Nashville Medical college, now the medical department of the university of Tennessee in 1877. Besides the duties of a most exacting profession and constant and laborious service as lecturer with professional journalism for many years, he was the author of very numerous monographs upon surgery. He was an associate editor of the "Nashville Medical and Surgical Journal," associate editor of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal" at Augusta, and author of a volume of Remarkable Cases in Surgery, and the contributor of more than six hundred articles to medical periodicals, being original papers, reports of cases and biographical sketches of eminent medical men of the southwest. Paul F. Eve was born on the family homestead near the Savannah river, near the city of Augusta, Ga., June 27, 1806. He was the youngest of ten children of Capt. Oswell and Aphra Ann Eve. His parentage on the father's side was English and on the mother's Irish. Drs. Rush, James and Shippen, of Philadelphia, were schoolmates of his father, who was a captain of the Pennsylvania forces before the American revolution, as recorded in the archives of that state. Prof. Eve completed his literary studies of four years in the university of Georgia, and was graduated third on the list of his class. He immediately went to Philadelphia and commenced the study of medicine under the celebrated Charles D. Meigs. He attended two courses at the university of Pennsylvania, and received his degree of doctor of medicine in the spring of 1828. Immediately after the death of his father, progress in his profession being his sole incentive, he sailed for Europe and landed in Liverpool late in the year 1829. After a brief sojourn in London, where he had letters to Sir Astley Cooper, Abernethy and others, and became acquainted at that time and subsequent visits with such men as Coulson, Billings, Sir James Paget, Sir James Thompson, Sir William Thompson and others, he went to Paris and followed courses of instruction given by Dupuytren, Laney, Roux, Lispane, Cruviellhier, Trousseau, Rostan, Recamier, Andrae, Ricord, Louis, Civiale and others. In May, 1831, when nearly all Europe was ablaze in political turmoil and excitement, and after having witnessed the dethronment of Charles X. in Paris, and having participated professionally in the revolution of three days (July 27, 28 and 29, 1830), with heart ever beating to the warm and noble impulses of gratitude, remembering well how the gallant Pulaski had fallen at the siege of Savannah during our revolutionary struggle of 1776, with an earnest desire to repay that debt to the best of his ability, he started for Poland to offer his services in resisting the oppression of Russia. After a short detention at Berlin, with the assistance of letters from La Fayette and the Polish committee at Paris, but especially through the intervention of Dr. Graffe (himself a Pole), and his own indomitable energy and untiring will, he at length reached Warsaw, and was assigned to hospital service in that city. For unremitting devotion to duty and ample evidences of his ability he was soon promoted to surgeon of the Fifteenth regiment of infantry and surgeon of ambulances attached to Gen. Turno's division. The golden cross of honor was conferred on him by recommendation of Count Placa, chief of the medical bureau. During the storming and capture of Warsaw on Sept. 7 and 8, 1831, he was fortunately out of the city on duty. After an imprisonment at Warsaw of thirty days he finally reached Paris late that year, and immediately sailed from Havre for New York, where he arrived after a tedious voyage, having been absent from his native land more than two years, filling his capacious and retentive mind with much actual experience and many valuable ideas emanating from the renowned men with whom he came in contact. In June, 1832, he was elected professor of surgery in the medical college of Georgia, then just organized in Augusta, in which institution he was engaged in teaching during the seventeen consecutive courses of lectures that followed, adding greatly to its reputation and prestige. In 1850 he was called to succeed Prof. Samuel D. Grass in the university of Louisville, Ky. As to how he filled the chair vacated by this world-renowned and eminent compeer is amply evidenced by the fact of his receiving the unanimous vote of trustees, faculty and students soliciting him to remain when, at the expiration of a year, his wife's health failing, and thinking that the locality of Louisville did not agree with her, he determined to come to the capital city of Tennessee. Prof. Eve died in Nashville, Tenn., the home of his adoption, Nov. 3, 1877. His remains are buried in the cemetery in Augusta, Ga. Dr. Eve's fame is written in the annals of scientific medicine. In this great country, resplendent with the achievements of its medical men, Dr. Eve was the peer of the greatest of them. A man of marvelous energy, tender, sympathetic heart, brave, always loyal to duty, unselfish, generous and highly intellectual, he was an exemplar of the highest type of the chivalrous and hospitable southern gentleman. Dr. Eve occupies a warm place in the heart of the writer, he having skillfully and most tenderly attended the father and mother of the writer when they were sick with yellow fever in the epidemic of 1839. In the midst of pestilence he was unmoved by fear, and heroically ministered to the inhabitants of the plague-stricken city. A noble-hearted, courteous gentleman, a considerate, loyal friend, the highest type of physician and an exemplary Christian, full of the meekness of goodness. In life he was dearly beloved, highly esteemed and honored. In death his memory is cherished as one of the noblest of the followers of the healing art.

JOSEPH A. EVE, M. D., LL. D. Joseph Adams Eve, son of Joseph Eve and Hannah Singleterry, was born near Charleston, S. C., Aug. 1, 1805. Died in Augusta, Ga., Jan. 6, 1886. Removed at the age of six years with his family to the neighborhood of Augusta, where, in the elementary schools of his time he received his education, and by his zeal and industry acquired a knowledge of Latin and Greek. He studied medicine in the office of Dr. Milton Antony. In 1827 he visited Europe and attended his first course of medical lectures in Liverpool. In 1828 he graduated at the Medical college of South Carolina. In conjunction with his preceptor, Dr. Milton Antony, he established in Augusta the Academy of Medicine. This was a hospital for patients as well as an academy for the instruction of medical students. In 1832, when the medical college of Georgia was organized in Augusta, he became associated with his cousin, Dr. Paul F. Eve, Dr. Louis A. Dugas, Dr. L. D. Ford and Dr. Milton Antony, as one of the founders of that institution. He was assigned to the chair of materia medica. In 1839 he was elected professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children, and continued a medical teacher in the college throughout an uninterrupted period of fifty-three years. He was, at the time of his death, probably the oldest active teacher of obstetrics in the world. As a medical teacher he was an eminent success. His lectures were always carefully prepared before entering the class room, and evidenced a profound insight into the themes presented to his classes. All his life a close student, he kept up with advances in medicine. New remedies and new instruments were known to him as soon as they were brought to the attention of the profession through medical periodicals. His lectures were revised from year to year as necessary to bring them into accord with current medical thought. He was untiring in his efforts to properly instruct his students. In the quiz room he considerably labored to teach the dullest man in his class. He discharged the duties of his professorship with scrupulous fidelity—he ever remembered that he was there to train and fit men for the work of the doctor of medicine. He loved the students, remained with them after his lecture hour and considerably answered their numerous questions. He invited them to visit him at his home, and in his office kindly assisted them in their studies. Throughout his long, useful and honorable career as a teacher, he boldly and persistently advocated the adoption of every reform looking to higher medical education. At one time he was editor of the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," published at Augusta. He was a member of the American Medical association, and of the Augusta Medical society, an honorary member of the Boston Gynecological society, and also of the Abingdon (Va.) Academy of Medicine. He was one of the founders of the medical association of Georgia, and was unanimously elected its president in 1879. The American Gynecological society elected him to its first honorary fellowship. In 1882, in recognition of his distinguished career, he was made LL. D. by Emory college of Georgia. He never held civil office but once in his life, when he became a member of the city council of Augusta. For sixty years he was a member of St. John's (Methodist) church, Augusta, and was a trustee and steward of his church to the day of his death. While not strictly confining his services to cases of obstetrics and diseases of women and children, the bulk of his work was in such cases. For a generation he was the obstetrician of Augusta. Just prior to his death he informed me that he had attended more than 5,000 cases of obstetrics. As an obstetrician he had no superior, and few equals. Whenever his brethren needed counsel or assistance in this branch of medicine it was upon Dr. Eve that they almost invariably called. He responded cheerfully to the call of his professional brethren, and never attempted to discredit their ability. He was genuinely in love with his work, and continued in active practice until stricken with disease several months previous to his death. When he reached three score years and ten his friends urged him to retire from active practice of medicine and spend his remaining years in the quietude and comforts of his elegant home. In vain they insisted that his arduous work was wearing him out—with a smile he always replied: "I prefer to wear out rather than rust out." Actuated by this spirit he continued in practice, responding to calls night and day, always faithful to duty. Only love of his professional duties and a desire to continue useful to mankind kept him at work, for he was a wealthy man. He was the best known, and most universally beloved man in the community. With him politeness knew no bounds. He smiled and bowed to everybody he met, whether he knew them or not. He seemed impressed with the idea that if he did not know them he ought to. His venerable friend, Dr. L. D. Ford, charged him with bowing to every lamp-post he passed for fear there was some one behind it that he had not seen. This politeness, however, was not the art of the sycophant, it was the outward manifestation of a great, loving heart, aglow with the realization of the grand doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man. Truly with him every man was his brother, every woman his sister, he therefore felt it to be a duty and pleasure to salute them with a brotherly salutation whenever and wherever he met them. The power of goodness was richly illustrated in his daily life. With him to do good to his fellow-beings was a positive pleasure. To all classes and conditions of mankind he was at once friend and benefactor. It is difficult to estimate the value to the community of a man like Dr. Eve. The example of such a man necessarily reflected itself upon scores of other men, and was an inspiration to them to lead a higher, better and more useful life. Dr. Eve was as charitable as he was polite. I am satisfied he never once turned a deaf ear to an appeal for financial assistance. Every beggar in Augusta knew the old doctor and loved him because of his goodness to them. If his friends admonished him that in certain instances his charity was bestowed upon unworthy persons, he continued to help them, replying: "I feel it a duty to help them, if they are unworthy it is their fault, not mine. Kindness does them no harm." Many a poor creature, burdened with poverty, found a friend and brother in the good doctor. He lovingly sympathized with them in their sufferings, gladly and gratuitously bestowed upon them his professional skill, fed them when hungry, and gave them raiment when needed. The goodness of the man was such that he had not one enemy. What an example was the life of Dr. Eve. In a city of 40,000 souls, he, as was truly said of him by a professional brother, "moved in a personal atmosphere of love and courtesy peculiarly his own." It was truly said of him: "He daily walked with God." Finally the old doctor fell sick, and no longer able to serve his patients, it became known that his end was near at hand. Then the fruits of his life work were seen. Hundreds of citizens went daily to inquire after him, sent him messages of love, and prayed for his restoration to health. During his illness a scene occurred like that in the room of "Dorcas—a woman full of good works and the almsdeeds which she did. All the poor widows of Joppa stood weeping over her remains, and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas had made for them." So the poor of the city gathered in the home of Dr. Eve and told of his goodness to them. When death claimed him as its own, they wept bitter tears because of the loss of a benefactor. No higher tribute to a man's worth can ever be had than the love of the poor. Love for Dr. Eve was by no means confined to the poor, all classes, conditions and races loved him, and delighted to claim him as friend and brother. In life Dr. Eve illustrated the highest type of man and physician, and in death left to his family, friends and profession, the legacy of a life singularly devoted to the service of God and mankind. An editorial in the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" says of Dr. Eve: "The demise of this eminent physician and philanthropist demands a more extended notice than our space at this time permits. The medical association of Georgia will doubtless soon pay fitting tribute to the memory to one of the most distinguished and best beloved of its former presiding officers. In advance of a more extended biographical sketch, which it is hoped will speedily appear, it is proper to remind the profession that for more than fifty years Dr. Eve has filled a most prominent place in their ranks. In 1828, when he began his career in Augusta, Ga., there was in the United States but one medical college south of Philadelphia. Thoroughly trained physicians and surgeons were comparatively scarce, and the obstacles and expense of obtaining a medical education so great that young men of suitable qualifications were deterred from engaging in that pursuit. Recognizing the public need of such an institution, the physicians of Augusta, with competent legal authority and liberal legislative pecuniary aid, founded the medical college of Georgia. Dr. Eve was chosen as one of the faculty upon its organization, and his name held a place upon the list for more than half a century. Of his early colleagues, several of whom are renowned in professional annals, all passed over the river before him, and left him a solitary, but most distinguished and venerated object of contemplation. To his skill and fidelity as a teacher of the departments of the pan-science of medicine assigned him, thousands of his pupils, scattered all over the south and west, bear willing testimony. Two generations of the populations of Augusta attest with universal acclaim his patience, integrity, tact and success as a general practitioner. All men and women of all pursuits and conditions of society, award to him the crown as a hero of benevolence. If any modern man could, Dr. Eve might contest with St. Luke the proud title of nobility, 'The Beloved Physician.'"

LEWIS DeSAUSSURE FORD, M. D., LL. D., Augusta, Ga., was born in Morristown, N. J., Dec. 30, 1801, and died in Augusta, Ga., Aug. 21, 1883. His father was the Hon. Gabriel H. Ford, of the supreme court of New Jersey. Dr. Ford received an academical education, and began the study of medicine at Morristown with Dr. Jones. His medical education was acquired at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York. From this college he was graduated M. D. in 1822. A few months after taking his degree he settled in Bamberg, S. C., to practice his profession. In 1827 he located in Augusta, Ga., where the remainder of his life was spent.

No citizen of Augusta ever more signally enjoyed the respect, confidence and love of the community than did Dr. Ford. As a citizen, he was noted for his patriotism and active public spirit. Every measure calculated to promote the welfare of his state or city found him a zealous supporter. In politics he was actively interested, being, prior to the war, an ardent whig. For a number of years he was elected a member of the city council. In 1846 he was elected mayor of Augusta. His administration of this trust was marked by wisdom, economy and integrity, such as to lead to his re-election when his term of office expired. Retiring from this office, he devoted his time wholly to his professional duties. After the war, however, when a military satrap established his headquarters at Atlanta, and threatened to imprison any man who dared to counsel the citizens of Georgia contrary to the views of the United States government, this venerable patriot, intense in his love of liberty, and fearless of consequences to self, delivered two addresses to his fellow-citizens, urging them not to adopt the reconstruction measures proposed by the military authorities. These addresses were entitled Popular Government—the United States and Confederate States Governments Compared. No champion of the lost cause ever more learnedly or fearlessly exposed the iniquitous measures placed upon a conquered and helpless people. The Defense of the Confederate States Government was one of the most masterful productions of the times.

Dr. Ford was a Christian man. Feeling a personal need of daily communion with his God, he sought to satisfy his judgment as to the evidences of the Christian system. The examination of the evidences—both internal and external—of Christianity fully confirmed his faith and from it he never wavered. In times of trouble or distress of self, kindred or friends, he carried his burden in prayer to the Redeemer of mankind and laid it on his cross. In his daily walk and conversation he illustrated and adorned the profession which he had made. Not content with enjoying to himself the fruits unto righteousness, he sought actively to diffuse the teachings of his Lord and Master, hence we see him leading the minds of his students to contemplate the goodness of God unto man, and the truth of revelation. He urged his students to study the natural sciences and said: "But they exert a more direct and decided influence in forming the moral character; they tend to direct the thoughts through nature, to the God of nature. His works, the objects of study, are continually revealing to the mind of the student, the wisdom, the power, the benevolence of the Creator; the perception of these attributes encourages in him a natural devotion and reverence which prompt to a further knowledge of His character. Casting around for the sources of a knowledge of the moral attributes of the Deity, his well disciplined mind cannot fail to assent readily to the fullness of the testimony by which the sacred scriptures are recommended as God's revelation of his own character and the character of man; his duty, his destiny. He cannot fail to perceive the surpassing beauty of its sacred code of morality based upon the principle, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' With his characteristic habits of deduction he follows this principle into its minutest ramification—sees how it is calculated to refine the heart of man from selfishness—to encourage an expansive benevolence—and to heal the disorders and restore the harmony of the social system; and thus, contemplating its intrinsic excellence, he will be disposed to render a more cheerful obedience to its requisitions, than he would receive it as a mere dictate of sovereignty.

"But the charge has been brought against these studies that they tend to encourage the spirit of infidelity. Without entering upon a formal refutation of this charge, I would only ask, is it reasonable that the man whose ruling passion has been the acquisition of knowledge—who has ever found its pursuit and especially its attainment, the source of his most refined and exalted pleasure, his faculties and powers enlarging and his desires increasing with their every new gratification—the consciousness of his own littleness and weakness increasing, as at every ascending step up the mount of science, the prospect opens wider and wider before him, until at its highest attainable point, he sickens at the thought of the boundless regions which he cannot penetrate? Is it reasonable that the man whose experience has been but a continually renewed testimony of the expansiveness of the human mind should adopt the cold, cheerless, desperate suggestions of infidelity? Shall he not rather welcome with an ecstasy of delight that revelation which brings life and immortality to light, which assures him that in the new state to which he is hastening his faculties for the acquisition of knowledge shall be enlarged, all obstacles shall be removed, and the work of the same Deity, the small insight into whose beauties here has afforded him such ineffable delight, shall constitute the theme of his studies through the wasteless ages of eternity?"

Dr. Ford was actively engaged in the work of disseminating the Bible among men. He was for a number of years, even to the hour of his death, president of the Augusta Bible society. He was for a number of years senior warden of the vestry of St. Paul's Episcopal church, in which faith he died.

It has been seen that the deceased was a son of the distinguished jurist, it was therefore but natural to find him applying such rigid rules in the weighing of testimony. In lecturing to his class he said: "So he who advances into the great temple of nature, who comes up there with his bold interrogations, who seeks to be initiated into her sublime mysteries, to behold the revelation of her beauties, to hear the melody of her harmonies, to obtain that knowledge of her secret springs which will give him power and place and authority among his fellow men, must chasten himself with a discipline severe as these benefits are excellent. He must come laying aside his idle opinion and prejudices, his false notions of the nature of things which he may have contracted in the course of an imperfect education. He must come manifesting that virtue so essential to the philosophic character—the virtue of humility, with the open-mindedness, the docility of a little child, must he come to be taught. . . . Again, with an impartiality that is willing to do as severe justice to his own opinions as to those of others, the student of these sciences cautiously weighs all the evidences for and against any proposed fact or opinion, determined to abide by the law and the testimony, even should these demand the recantation of his own opinions formally and publicly acknowledged. This magnanimous trait of character, which will thus postpone its own temporary fame to the grand interests of science, you will find illustrated in the history of some of the greatest men that have ever lived—it marks the man who has been refined from selfishness by a constant intercourse with the sublimities of nature.”

The most prominent trait of character possessed by the deceased was benevolence. The poor, who had none of this world's goods with which to recompense his valuable services, found in him a friend and benefactor. No hour, day or night, no season of heat or cold, rain or snow, deterred him from answering the call of the sick poor. It was only necessary that he be informed that there was disease and anguish to be relieved; with cheerfulness and alacrity he wended his way to the bedside, and with unbounded courtesy and kindness he listened to recitals of ills of mind and body, comforting the distressed, binding up their wounds, healing their diseases. This gratuitous service to the poor was continued when in the midst of a large and lucrative practice, which often caused him unostentatiously to respond to the call of the poor and needy, rather than the demands of the affluent.

Not content with illustrating this virtue of benevolence in his daily life, we find him teaching his students to appreciate the luxury of doing good. To them he said: “The corrupting love of money, and a contracted selfishness, have no natural companionship with the noble enthusiasm which burns in his heart. If this were their only fruit, this should recommend them to your most favorable notice; for the virtue of benevolence lies at the foundation, while it forms the crowning glory of the medical character. Without this heaven-born principle there can be no enlightened appreciation, no devoted performance of the duties of that profession, whose ministrations have been represented by one not of our profession, as a beautiful, but humble imitation of those of the Divine Providence. Its dispensation is indeed one of mercy. . . . Devote yourselves, then, to these studies and to all other means tending to mature this spirit of philanthropy, if you would be prepared to redeem all those high expectations which will be entertained of you, as members of this noble profession; for to it has society ever looked for instances of devoted self-sacrificing humanity. And they have not looked in vain; for, notwithstanding the cavils to the contrary, the constant occupation of the mind in devising means for the relief of human suffering, and the repeated exercise of an active beneficence, do tend most manifestly to strengthen the spirit of benevolence within the bosom of the physician, and the annals of philanthropy, in every age, display those names which are alike the boast and glory of our profession.”

The deceased was one of the most polished of men. Simple and dignified in manners, easy of access, and social in demeanor, he was the center of a throng of admiring friends whenever he entered the social sphere. And yet he was a man of wonderful humor. It was of the type portrayed by Carlyle in speaking of Richter: “It has such witching turns; there was something in it so capricious, so quaint, so heartfelt. The essence of humorous sensibility, warm, tender fellow-feeling with all forms of existence. . . . True humor springs not more from the head than the heart; it is not contempt, its essence is love; it issues not in laughter, but in still smiles, which lie far deeper. It is a sort of inverse sublimity; exalting, as it were, into our affections what is below us, while sublimity draws down into our affections what is above. The former is scarcely less precious or heart affecting than the latter; perhaps it is still rarer, and, as a test of genius, still more decisive. It is, in fact, the bloom and perfume, the purest effluence of a deep, fine, and loving nature; a nature in harmony with itself, reconciled to the world and its stintedness and contradiction, nay, finding in this very contradiction new elements of beauty as well as of goodness."

Dr. Ford was a man of extensive general literary attainments. As a part of his intellectual character he possessed an insatiable thirst for knowledge. This trait showed itself even as a young man, and grew with his growth, and continued unabated to the hour of his death. He never rested with his attainments, but was constantly seeking yet more knowledge. When at home he was usually to be found deeply engaged in reading books. It was a matter of surprise to his friends that amid such an extensive practice of medicine he could find time for such general reading as was apparent in his conversations. He made it a rule to always keep some study before him as a recreation from the arduous duties of his profession, and affording rational enjoyment to his mind in times of leisure. He was a man of keen powers of perception, and of a thoroughly analytical turn of mind. Possessing a wonderful memory, he stored his capacious brain with the excellent general readings which he had made, and could astonishingly entertain his friends upon political economy, general literature, classical lore, science, history or poetry as readily as upon medical philosophy. It may be truly said of him that he possessed all the qualities of a great and commanding intellect, qualified for grand achievements in whatever direction his grasping, penetrating mind might choose to exert its marvelous faculties.

As a mark of high appreciation of his intellectual attainments, the university of Georgia conferred upon Prof. Ford the honorary degree of LL. D. In thus honoring this grand old man, the distinguished university in the act signally honored itself. But it was as a teacher of medicine that he achieved greatest renown. As a lecturer he was charming. The students were anxious for his lecture-hour to be announced. He was singularly eloquent, and remarkably gifted in presenting his views to his classes. He had mastered the subjects presented for the consideration of his students, and therefore he addressed them with that calmness, dignity and self-possession which spring only from the consciousness of having thoroughly investigated his subjects and mastered their intricate problems. Sometimes, in the midst of profound dissertations upon medicine, he would enliven his classes by sallies of wit, or an illustrative anecdote, which was peculiar to himself. He possessed the classical scholarship of the highest and brightest of our profession, and had all the charming grace and refined diction of a Watson, a Trousseau or a Fothergill. He had fathomed the deepest depths of the God-like science of medicine, and aerie-like had soared into the ethereal heights of the collateral sciences. He was a teacher of medicine for fifty years. With the exception of a few years as professor of chemistry, the whole time of his professorship was devoted to the principles and practice of medicine. As a teacher for half a century, what an influence he must have exerted upon the medical opinions of the two or more thousand doctors who had sat as students at his feet that they might learn of him.

Dr. Ford was an expert in epidemic diseases, and rendered valuable services to physicians of his own city, and of the surrounding country, in aiding in making an early and accurate diagnosis in these diseases. In the epidemics of yellow fever in Augusta in 1839 and 1854 he rendered conspicuous services to the sick and afflicted. After these epidemics had ended he investigated the origin and causes thereof, and firmly but respectfully insisted that in each of these epidemics the disease originated in neglect upon the part of the city authorities to expeditiously remove decomposing filth beyond the city limits. During the war Dr.

Ford was constantly engaged in the military service of the Confederate states government, being surgeon of the first Georgia hospital at Richmond, Va. This position he held to the end of the war. When he left his home to render this noble service to his country he was sixty years of age. His skill, his kindness, his tender care of the sick and wounded, won the love and gratitude of the soldiers, and all of them parted from him with regret and sorrow. Dr. Ford has done more to delineate the natural history and to elucidate the pathology and therapeutics of malarial fever than any physician in America. He contributed articles upon these subjects to the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal" from 1837 to 1845 inclusive. These papers evidence a deep and critical research into the opinions and teachings of the classical authors to that date, and the author boldly contradicts the opinions then current with the profession, and earnestly calls upon the medical men to give heed and study to this important disease, and the treatment thereof. These papers are among the classics of the profession on that subject, and have been freely and frequently quoted from the time they were printed to the present day. All of the papers presented to the profession by Dr. Ford evidence a profound and critical study of the subjects discussed by him. The last paper written by him was presented to the state medical association in 1880. His subject was Organic Affinity. This paper was considered by competent judges to be a masterful one. At the time it was written its author was seventy-nine years old.

The deceased was distinguished as a sanitarian, and took an active interest in the improvement of the sanitary condition of Augusta. For a number of years he ably filled the position of president of the board of health of Augusta. His administration of this trust—as, indeed, all others—was marked by dignity, courtesy, ability, and unswerving fidelity to duty. When he resigned his position the board unanimously requested him to withdraw the resignation tendered. Failing to induce him to continue the discharge of his official station, the board of health and the city council unanimously adopted resolutions expressing their great regret at the loss of so valued an officer, and attesting their appreciation of his stewardship. Forty-five years ago the medical association of Georgia was organized in the city of Macon. About eighty of the most distinguished medical men of this state were present and enrolled as members. From this brilliant assemblage of physicians Dr. Lewis D. Ford was the one selected to be honored as the first president of the association. The inherent modesty, dignity and impartiality of the man rendered him a most valuable officer, and well and worthily he illustrated the wisdom of the choice of his professional brethren. Philosopher as he was, it is needless to state that death had no terrors for him. For years prior to his decease he would calmly and beautifully speak of death as a thing not to be shunned or feared, but to be regarded by the Christian man as the crown of life. Ever ready for the summons, he continued the practice of his profession until smitten by disease several months prior to his death. Unterrified he approached "the dark, dark river," having obeyed the injunction to

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustain'd and sooth'd
By an unflinching trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

The death of such a man as Dr. Lewis D. Ford, as was to be expected, cast a gloom over the city in which he was so much loved. There were universal expressions of grief at the announcement of his death. The citizens of Augusta felt that the city had sustained an irreparable loss. His fellow-citizens all united to do honor to his memory. His honor, Mayor May, called the city council in special session, and feelingly and sorrowfully announced the death of the beloved physician. The city council unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in the death of Dr. Lewis D. Ford this community has lost one of its most useful and respected citizens, the medical profession one of its brightest ornaments, society one of its most valued members. In every position to which duty called him he was always found true, zealous and faithful. In his family circle, in his social life, in his professional and political career he was the center of affection, of friendship, of popularity; and in all these positions his death leaves an aching void, and a vacuum hard to fill.

Resolved, That this council, as a mark of respect to the deceased, attend his funeral in a body.

The "Evening News," of Augusta, said: "Dr. Lewis D. Ford was not only a great and most eminent physician, honored by the profession all over the country, and loved by all who ever felt the touch of his inspiring hand, but he was a great and good man. . . . His memory will ever be enshrined in the grateful hearts of his people. No service was too arduous for his brain and hand, and no trust was so high that the people of Augusta would not willingly and gladly bestow upon such a man." The "Chronicle and Constitutionalist" contained the following editorial: "The relics of Dr. Lewis D. Ford have been consigned to the bosom of the earth. His memory will survive in a thousand good deeds that were the emanation of a lofty spirit and not done for effect. Indeed few persons, save those who were recipients of his care, bounty and charity, not to speak of his professional skill, have any idea of the multitude of his benefactions. One of the most distinguished of Dr. Ford's contemporaries and a brother physician informs us that the leading characteristic of his life was unselfish devotion to his fellow men—the alleviation of their physical suffering, the binding up of their spiritual wounds, the promotion of their virtues, with less regard for compensation and reward than any man with whom he was acquainted. He believes Dr. Ford did more good for less money than any man in the community. He never thought of the 'filthy lucre.' It made no difference whether a man was rich or poor. If he paid him for his services all well and good; if not, the same. Consequently he dies leaving a small estate in this world, but will inherit a large one in the next. It made no difference whether a person paid him or not, though able to do so, he never failed to serve him when in distress. It is probable that he never thought the second time of any debt due him. Here then was a good Samaritan, who had lifted himself above the petty things of mortality, in many respects, and, like Abou Ben Adhem, grew especially dear to God because, neglectful of himself, he had loved his fellow men and served them faithfully, with all his power, for the love of their Maker. No eloquence of tongue or pen can surpass this simple revelation of fact. It tells the whole story of a noble spirit and needs no embellishment of poet or rhetorician. There are few men of whom this can be truly said, and therefore it may be concluded that Dr. Ford's best epitaph is the plain statement of his well spent life."

The faculty of the medical college of Georgia, of which he was one of the founders and most honored and accomplished professors, adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved 1st, That in the death of Prof. Ford, one of its founders and for over fifty years one of its most distinguished and valuable professors, this, the medical department of the university of Georgia, has lost the revered and beloved nestor of our faculty; that in his long and useful life were beautifully illustrated all that we could desire to emulate as the true and honorable physician, the good citizen, the pure man and the Christian gentleman—that he will long be remembered as one of the founders of medical science in our state, and that his influence will long be felt as an early cultivator of correct methods of medical reasoning, and as one who has contributed largely by his labors to the founding of a sound medical philosophy, not only in his own state, but through the entire south.

“Resolved 2d, That, in accepting submissively his death, both as a decree of nature and of a wise and merciful providence, we yet mourn our separation from him and deplore his departure from our midst, as the loss of a wise counselor, noble exemplar and ever genial, loved and loving companion and friend.”

Thus, full of years, rich in the honors of a life spent in the service of God and his fellow men this great man “fell on sleep,” leaving to his family the precious legacy of a good name—which is far above riches; and to the medical profession an example which shall redound to the honor and glory of man.

DR. TOMLINSON FORT.* Dr. Tomlinson Fort was of English ancestry. His father, Hon. Arthur Fort, came to Georgia when a young man, before the revolutionary war, and was an active participant in the stirring scenes of that eventful period. As a member of the committee of safety; as a soldier in the field against British, Tories and Indians; as a member of the legislature he gave to the patriots' cause and to his country the benefit of his clear intellect, his true heart and his strong arm. Dr. Fort was born in 1787, precisely coeval with the constitution of the United States. After the then usual period of a prentisage or private pupilage, he repaired to Philadelphia and prepared himself for graduation in the university of Pennsylvania, under the tuition of Rush, Physic and their confreres, who then illustrated that renowned institution. Returning to Georgia he settled in Milledgeville, the capital of the state, where he spent his entire professional life. His success came early and knew no diminution. His dignified manners and his absolute integrity inspired confidence and respect, and a peculiar magnetism drew to him the strong, personal attachment of all with whom he came into contact. His reputation was not long confined to the town or county of his residence, but extended widely over the state, and few, if any, of the physicians of the state have ever gained so large a clientage or such honorable distinction. Dr. Fort brought to bear in his practice a well-balanced mind, a large stock of common sense, keenness of observation and a power of analysis, which enabled him to judge truly of popular superstition, reckless assertions of authors, and to reject, when he deemed them erroneous, the dogmas, even of his favorite teacher, Dr. Rush. To the revolution in the practice of physic which occurred during his life, which delivered us from the ravages of mercury and salivation, from the dangerous, indiscriminate use of the lancet, and from the horrible torture of days of fever without the solace of a single drop of cold water, Dr. Fort contributed his full share. He was not a voluminous contributor to the periodical professional literature of the period, but late in life he published a volume of some 700 pages, which he modestly called a Dissertation on the Practice of Medicine. This book he dedicated to the physicians of the state of Georgia, as a grateful acknowledgment of the kindness, respect and confidence which he had experienced at the hands of every one of them with whom he had the honor of becoming acquainted. This work, he says, “is, in its nature, ephemeral.” Its author does not claim for it a place among the standard works of the day, but some of the more important diseases are treated at considerable length and with great ability. It exhibits throughout the care, candor, acumen, originality and courage of conviction of its author. No physician can read it without instruction, or finish its perusal without the highest respect for his moral as well as professional characteristics. Dr. Fort's popularity and influence in the city of his residence were overwhelming. The first case of smallpox that ever occurred there was under his care. He gave to it the conscientious attention he deemed requisite, but the alarm in the community was so great that neither nurse nor shelter could be procured, and the doctor furnished one and became the other. The alarmed citizens, in a town meeting, resolved to compel him, by violence, if necessary, to desist from his attentions. He quietly placed a loaded gun at his door and notified them that he would permit no one to interrupt the discharge of his professional duties. When the danger was past, the fickle mob again met and passed a resolution of thanks, complimenting him on his courage and fidelity. Laborious in his profession, as he was for many years, he was not unmindful of any of the duties of citizenship. In the war of 1812, he raised and commanded a company, and received in battle a wound in the knee, which gave him great suffering during the remainder of his life. He represented Baldwin county eight years in the halls of legislation, and the state two years in the congress of the United States. A sketch of his political character and standing, kindly furnished by his distinguished and venerable friend, the Hon. Junius Hillyer, is subjoined. At the close of his term in congress, Dr. Fort retired from active political life; the wants of a growing family and the expenses of a profuse and generous hospitality demanded the resources of his large professional income, and he sacrificed a most brilliant public career upon the altar of domestic and social obligation. He died in Milledgeville, May 17, 1859. During all that period he was at the summit of professional reputation, of social standing and political influence. The following is a sketch of Dr. Fort by Junius Hillyer: "My knowledge of Dr. Tomlinson Fort commenced in 1828. I saw him in Milledgeville during the session of the legislature in the fall of that year. In person he was tall, straight, symmetrical, and a form indicating endurance, health and a sound constitution. He had a sedate but cheerful, friendly expression that inspired his associates with respect and kind feelings towards him. And I do not believe that his feelings were ever wounded by his most bitter political opponents or by any of his personal associates. When I first knew him he was in the prime of manhood, perhaps between thirty-five and forty years of age. He was an active, working member of the old Clarke party, and was personally known by every prominent man in the state, for the men of both parties sought and valued his acquaintance. Dr. Fort was not numbered among the great orators of his day. I have often heard him speak in public. He rarely spoke over half an hour, and always kept close to the questions under consideration, and without any flourishes of rhetoric or effort at the beautiful, he gave his views in a plain, straightforward, earnest manner, which commanded the attention of his hearers, while everything he said was understood clearly, and it was no labor to listen to him and follow his line of thought. Such a speaker must necessarily command attention and wield an influence. Dr. Fort, as a party man, was a strong, important leader. He held the most extreme partisan views; he held and always openly avowed, the good old Jackson democratic doctrine, that "to the victors belong the spoils." His party motto was: "Turn them out; put the government in the hands of the democrats." As a partisan he was pre-eminently a bourbon democrat. He never learned any new principles and he never changed his old ones. He was a man of the people; he lived with the people; he guided their political ideas and moulded their judgments. In his party he preferred a position in the ranks of a private. He rarely sought office. I am sure he could have attained any office in the gift of the people if he had desired it. Here we have a man who began life in the midst of the angry strife of the federal and republican parties and participated actively in all the stirring scenes of the last war with England. The strife over the United States bank; the inauguration of the tariff policy; the bitter personal strife between the Clarke and Crawford parties and the Clarke and Troup parties; our controversies about the Indians and Indian lands; our angry strife about nullification and the Union; Gen. Jackson's war on the United States bank; the sub-treasury; the war with Mexico and the acquisition of Texas; the slavery question and the compromise of 1850, stirring and moving the people through these long years down to the time of his death, a period of half a century—all these scenes he witnessed. He mingled with the actors. He participated in the discussion of all these momentous questions with much crimination and recrimination, with many a duel, and many a fight, and wide-spread hatred and life-long animosity, yet from it all he came forth in his old age out of this fiery ordeal without the smell of fire on his garments, universally beloved by all men of all parties. The reason is plain—he was wise, he was good, he was just, and he was polite. Twelve years we were together on the board of trustees of the state university, and every year, for nearly thirty years, I saw him in Milledgeville, and often in other places, so I can say I knew him well. And I know his character, what his acquaintances say of him—of his private life. All can be said in one short line: He stood through his long life above reproach. Through all the length and breadth of the state, Dr. Fort was, in the judgment of all who knew him, in the first rank of his profession. More than one generation must pass away before, in Baldwin county, his skill, his patience and his kindness to the sick and to the poor will be forgotten."

THOMAS FITZGERALD GREEN, M. D.* Dr. Thomas F. Green was born in Beaufort, S. C., on Dec. 25, 1804; he died in Midway, Ga., on Feb. 13, 1879, of apoplexy, while superintendent of the Georgia lunatic asylum. His parents were of the best class of Irish people. His father, a warm-hearted, highly educated, enthusiastic young Irish patriot, having joined in the ill-fated rebellion of 1798, was forced to flee the country; his wife, who was a Fitzgerald, a lady of noble blood, came with him to America. He had no fortune save his talents, no friends save those whom he won by his virtues. He began to teach, and as a teacher came to Beaufort, S. C. Here his eldest son, Thomas Fitzgerald, was born. He removed to Savannah, Ga., where he taught a high school, and was elected a professor in Athens in the Georgia university. He afterward removed to Milledgeville, the capital of Georgia, and here the son was educated. Dr. Green attended lectures in Charleston, S. C., and was past his majority when he studied medicine and began to practice. He located in Milledgeville, and was doing well as a physician when the current of his life was changed and turned in a direction which was to be full of blessings to his race. A northern philanthropist, who was interested in the welfare of the insane, visited Milledgeville to suggest and advocate the establishment of an asylum for them. He called a meeting of a few gentlemen of broad views and generous hearts and laid his plans before them. The warm heart of Dr. Thomas F. Green became much interested in the great question presented, and he gave it close attention. He was connected with the first effort made to secure the grant from the legislature. In 1846 he succeeded Dr. Cooper as superintendent of the asylum. He continued in the office for thirty-three years. It was very small when he took hold of it. It became a grand institution—one of the largest in the southern states—when he was called by death from it. Dr. Green in person was short, stout, of broad, grand, humane countenance in his youth, and in his old age, handsome. He was full of life, cheerful, merry, courteous, considerate. He was a sincere Christian; in his home life, a model; one of the most benevolent and unselfish of men. He was devoted to the institution; he literally lived for the asylum. He thought of it, talked of it all the time. His success in the management of it was marvelous, and the blessed results of his work cannot be told in time. He was a delightful companion, a true and sympathizing friend, a man whom all loved, and one worthy of all the honor heaped upon him. The moral grandeur of his character was best illustrated by the interest he manifested in the unfortunate. In the walls of the main hall at the entrance of the asylum is inserted a handsome marble tablet attesting his virtues: "In memory of Thomas Fitzgerald Green, M. D., born Dec. 25, 1804, died Feb. 13, 1879. Thirty-three years of his life devoted with a supreme affection, unwearied zeal, and arduous labor, as resident physician and superintendent of this institution, Georgia's greatest charity, bear witness to his Christian character as a physician and philanthropist. Science mourns his loss, humanity reveres his name, religion embalms his memory. Erected by order of the board of trustees, 1879."

JAMES A. GRAY, M. D. This biographical sketch is from the pen of Dr. J. S. Todd, one of Georgia's noblest physicians and most gifted writers: I knew "Jim Gray" as intimately as though he were my brother, and loved him as a brother. I was his friend and confidant. Dr. Todd's sketch of him is true in every respect. He has written the life of Dr. Gray so frankly, so beautifully, so much better than I can do, that I have adopted it. I only add: The life of James A. Gray reflected honor upon his family, his state and his noble profession, and must ever remain an inspiration to the young men of Georgia.

"There is no death. The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
Where, bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forever more."

James A. Gray was born Dec. 29, 1849, in Monroe county, Ga. He passed over the river Sept. 27, 1887. He was, therefore, only thirty-eight years of age. His literary education was received in the country school near his home. At the age of twenty-seven he began studying medicine, graduating in 1879 with first honors from the Atlanta medical college. He connected himself with the Methodist church in 1866, and up to the day of his death was a consistent member and regular communicant. Immediately after receiving his degree he began the practice of medicine in Atlanta, and at once made himself felt and known as a man of strength. During the winter of 1879-80 he conducted a quiz at the Atlanta Medical college, and so ably did he acquit himself, and so personally popular was he with the students that upon acceptance of the demonstrator's place and lectureship on minor surgery in the Southern Medical college, in 1880, this young doctor of eighteen months carried with him over half the second-course students of the old school. The faculty of his alma mater made haste to secure the invaluable services of her gifted son, and before another session, in 1881, he was her proctor, and occupied the chair of lecturer on venereal diseases and minor surgery. At the time of his death he was still honoring this chair, and had been further raised to the exalted position of dean of the faculty—dean of his faculty in seven years after receiving his degree. He was filling his second term as secretary of the State Medical association, how capably let the five large volumes of its transactions gotten out by him be the answer. He was a member of the board of censors in the American Medical association, surgeon of the Atlanta rifles, an active, live member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, and managing editor of the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal," a periodical which he rescued from bankruptcy and ruin, and this, too, after many older heads had given up the fight. Dr. Gray left it an ornament to medical literature; a financial success, with a circulation larger than that of any similar journal in the south, and with an advertising patronage equal to any in America. Dr. Gray in person was corpulent, but in spite of this, and contrary to the usual rule that indolence and adipose are synonymous, he was possessed of an energy and perseverance only equaled by his honesty of purpose and kindness of heart. I knew him and loved him from the time he entered our ranks. We were as intimate as brothers. He was in no sense a negative man; he had opinions, and boldly and freely gave expression to them. The last of all men to pick a quarrel (for he was congeniality itself), being in one, he followed the advice of Polonius to Laertes: "Bear't that the opposed may beware of thee." One of the best of anatomists, he naturally leaned toward surgery. I often complimented him upon his thorough acquaintance with the human form divine. He would say, "Yes, I ought to know something of it, for from the first day I began the study of medicine until now not one has passed that I have not given the subject study. I read Gray's Anatomy four or five times every year." He read Gray's Anatomy four or five times a year! What an example for the living! No wonder that he builded so firmly, for the doctor whose medical education is grounded on anatomy stands on a rock foundation, and will stand when the winds come and the floods descend. But how did he find the time to do this, with so many other cares? And we know that he had, besides, a large, lucrative practice to look after. The answer is—he was sober. For twelve years preceding his untimely end he had tasted nothing alcoholic. He was systematic. If order be heaven's first law, that law was glorified in him. He walked as he talked—straight to the mark. His faculty for organization and system was a prominent feature in his character.

"He, while others slept, Toiled upward in the night."

He was a man marked in many ways. Determination was written on his face. Let him but know, after carefully considering and weighing, that he was right, then he considered obstacles only to brush them away. In touching upon the delicate subject to which I am about to allude, I do so after having asked myself the question, "Would he approve of it?" Before he began the study of medicine, he, for some time, drank to excess. The total abstinence he practiced for twelve years is a monument to his fidelity and will, and his victory is mentioned to elicit emulation from those who consider themselves the slaves of habit. He was no bigot; he did not object to others taking a social glass, but said, for himself, "I have determined never to allow another drop to pass my lips unless prescribed by a physician. I have never wavered from my purpose even so far as to consider whether I wanted to drink or not." Had he lived three score years and ten I am sure he would have gone to his grave with the vow unbroken. His early education was so defective and limited that even his speech betrayed him. How well do I remember his indignation when he heard that it had been said, by a member of this body, that he was incapable of bringing out the transactions. "If I never learn to speak correctly, I will write good English, and he shall confess it," said he with an emphasis peculiarly his own. Freedom from grammatical errors and clearness of statement were marked peculiarities of his productions, and he was a voluminous writer. As a teacher he was in every way a success. The secret of his excellence as a lecturer was, first, his thorough familiarity with his subject; second, he was pithy, pointed, practical, truthful, earnest, thoroughly in love with his theme, enthusiastic, believing what he thought. While he was not eloquent, his thirst for knowledge and honest endeavor to know the truth was contagious and drew the students to him with bonds of love and admiration. When James A. Gray put off his armor the Atlanta Medical college lost its right arm, its students their best friend and instructor, for until his death he was still their quiz master. I have known him to sit up with a dull student until three o'clock in the morning, preparing and drilling him for the "green-room." When Dr. Gray was no more, the army of medical men in America lost a young captain, whose career, though only just began, was even more glorious than that of nine out of ten of the gray-haired leaders. When this association is hoary with years, the antiquarian, looking over its archives, will find that no secretary in the long list has done his duty better than the genial, studious, systematic, painstaking Gray. When his body was slowly and sadly laid to rest in West View cemetery the city of Atlanta mourned for one of her most useful citizens. It was attested by his pastor, who spoke so feelingly over his lifeless form, "that, busy man as he was, he rendered unto God the things which were God's; that his pew in God's house was nearly always filled." Believing and trusting in God, he calmly

"Folded the drapery of his couch about him
And lay down to pleasant dreams."

When from among his friends the icy monster took him, they lost one who was always ready to serve them; who was as purely unselfish as generosity could make him; whose ear was never deaf to the appeals of the poor; whose hands never tired doing charity. We give him up sorrowfully; but thank God for his shining example to the youth of our land, so beautifully illustrating what can be accomplished, in even a short life, by industry, suavity, sobriety, laudable ambition, perseverance, morality, and determination.

DR. WILLIAM HANSELL HALL, M. D. William Hansell Hall was born in Milledgeville, Ga., on Nov. 1, 1828. Educated at Midway, Ga., in the Beman school and then at Oglethorpe university, where he graduated. After graduating he conceived it his duty to preach the gospel, and he spent one year at the Presbyterian seminary in Columbia, S. C. Giving up this idea he studied medicine, taking his first course in Charleston, S. C. Afterward two courses in Jefferson Medical college in Philadelphia, where he received his diploma. He then spent one year as resident physician of St. Joseph's hospital, Philadelphia. In 1854 he began the practice of medicine in Thomasville, Ga., from there he went to Milledgeville in 1861. Bright in intellect beyond most of his fellows, gentle-hearted as a woman, with an ever-ready sympathy, courteous with the delicate courtesy of a thorough gentleman, with a wit keen and subtle, but always tempered with such gentle sweetness that it left no sting, fitted in mind, in person, in culture to stand in the front rank among men, he chose to spend his life in his simple village home, winning the love and gratitude of those among whom he lived, to whom he ministered, bringing help and comfort in their hours of darkness and distress; or if that was beyond his power, soothing as best he might with his marvelous gift of sympathy. His friend, a hard-working minister of the gospel, once said of him: "I never go to any sick or utterly wretched one, but I find he has been there before me." He never spared himself. His life was one of charity and beauty. And now, in the many hearts of those who knew him, his name is a blessed memory. Dr. Hall was at the time of his death and for many years previously, a member and vice-president of the board of trustees of our state lunatic asylum. His associates adopted and published the following tribute to his memory: "In memoriam. W. H. Hall, M. D., of Milledgeville, Ga., died Oct. 7, 1893. Dr. Hall was a courtly man; a gentleman of the old school. He was a man of great literary culture, and profoundly versed in the lore of the great science of medicine. He was as simple-hearted as a little child, as tender and gentle as a woman in his ministrations upon the sick and wounded; deeply impressed with the nobility of his calling, he was ever full of self-sacrifice in the discharge of his high and sacred duties. Full of the meekness of humility, clear and strong in his faith in our risen Lord, he was an ideal Christian, and for a long number of years held the position of ruling elder in the Presbyterian church of Milledgeville. As a citizen his life was most exemplary. A man of exalted character, liberal views, Roman firmness and courage in the maintenance of his convictions of right or duty, he was ever prominent in all measures looking to the promotion of the welfare of his community. Great as was his worth as a citizen, beneficent as was his daily life in discharging the duties of his Christ-like vocation of healing the sick, it was as a trustee of the lunatic asylum that the most munificent services of his life were rendered to his fellow-man. He dearly loved this institution, labored in season and out of season to promote the welfare and happiness of its unfortunate inmates, and to put the asylum of Georgia upon as high a plane as any institution in America. Even when the trembling, halting steps of age came upon him and forced him to retire from the much-loved duties as a physician, he resolutely refused to lay down his work for this institution—he continued to meet with us month after month—attended the meeting immediately before his death—literally died in the harness. Full of years, poor in worldly goods, though immensely rich in the honors of a well-spent life, he fell upon sleep respected, beloved, honored of all who knew him. In testimony of the high esteem in which Vice-President Hall was held by this board, it is ordered that a page in our minute book be dedicated to his memory, and this tribute be published in our next annual report."

DUDLEY W. HAMMOND, M. D.* The subject of this notice, of English and Scotch ancestry, was born in South Carolina, May 12, 1809. He studied medicine with Dr. Henry Freeman of Carnesville, Franklin Co., Ga., and Dr. Banks of Elbert county. His first course of lectures was taken at Charleston, S. C., during the session of 1827-28; and in 1830 he graduated M. D. at the Georgia Medical college of Augusta. He commenced the practice at Ruckersville, but after a few years removed to Culloden, in Monroe county, where for twenty-one years he enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. He soon won the confidence of the people, and not only did a large practice in his immediate community, but was sent for in consultation in all the surrounding counties. Possessed, as Dr. Hammond was, of a commendable ambition and laudable aspirations, he naturally felt that the circumscribed inland town of Culloden did not afford to him an ample field for usefulness and professional growth; the breadth of his order of talents should not be hid away in obscure inland country work; and hence Dr. Hammond grew restless, and began to look around for larger fields. After visiting several places, the young city of Macon presented to his mind the inviting field; hence he determined to make it his future home, and accordingly, in 1853, he removed to Macon and adopted it as his permanent home. He became associated in business with the late Dr. Boon, and was in copartnership with him for a good many years. It was but a short while before Dr. Hammond had arisen to the front rank in his new field, and no man ever lived in Macon who more completely held the universal confidence and esteem of its citizens than he did. Both with his professional confreres and with the laity, Dr. Hammond was a great favorite and friend. As a general practitioner he had few equals, but his inclinations led him also to surgery, and in this field he ranked far above the average of his day. He was a man of broad views and firm convictions, and once satisfied of the utility of any operation, he did not hesitate for a moment to perform it. And while he was a conservative man, and reasoned well upon every case presented, yet he was, with it all, a bold and fearless operator; and his success was rather phenomenal for his day. Although he operated before the day of listerism, when surgeons battled against the universal vile influence of germs and its concomitant septic poisons, yet his record in many of the capital operations compares favorably with any modern surgery. He did, under the old regime, twenty-three lithotomy operations, and never an untoward symptom. As a man and citizen Dr. Hammond was held in high esteem. He possessed a well-balanced mind, and his courtly manners, his firm, sterling qualities, and high-toned professional bearing, gave him no ordinary prominence in the hearts of his professional brethren, hence he was elected, in 1876, as a representative from the Georgia Medical association to the International Medical congress, at Philadelphia, and worthily represented our state at that meeting. When the experiment of a state board of health was made some years ago for Georgia, he was elected by Gov. Smith as worthy the honor of representing the Fifth congressional district on that board. But his modest nature caused him to shrink from so responsible and conspicuous a position, and it was his pleasure to name the late Dr. Nottingham as one worthy and well qualified to assume so important a trust. For sixty long years Dr. Hammond adorned his profession by a well-ordered, quiet, unostentatious life, and in this has set for us an example well worthy our imitation. And in other respects, the life of the doctor should be to us an inspiring example. He was open and unselfish, and was glad to impart to his professional brethren whatever his careful observation and long experience had taught him to be useful, hence in the prime and medium of his life, he was a constant contributor to the current medical literature. No man was ever more devoted to his profession, and it might almost be literally said of him that he "died in harness." Almost up to the date of his death he was daily visiting the sick and dispensing cheering words. On the morning of July 4, 1887, he quietly fell asleep, and was gathered to his fathers. Peace to his ashes.

JURIAH HARRIS, M. D. The subject of this sketch was born in Columbia county, Ga., Oct. 28, 1825. His early education was received under the celebrated Dr. Waddell. He then attended Mercer university, finally graduating in 1845 at William and Mary college. He studied medicine in the office of the famous Dr. L. A. Dugas of Augusta, his brother-in-law, and graduated M. D. from the medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, in 1848, with honors. Although possessed of an unusually brilliant mind, and trained under one of the most renowned medical teachers in the world, Dr. Harris, with full appreciation of the sacredness of his calling, and the want of full preparation for its duties, refused to enter upon practice until he had spent three years in further preparation by hospital experience. To this end he visited Europe and remained there for three years in attendance upon lectures in the most celebrated medical colleges and hospitals in the world. Returning from Europe in 1851 he entered upon the practice of medicine in Augusta. His alma mater recognizing his gifts as a brilliant young doctor gave him the position of adjunct professor of surgery. In pursuance of his duties in the college he lectured on minor and operative surgery. To hold such a position in a college so renowned as the medical college of Georgia was indeed a high compliment, but the young doctor creditably sustained himself in the position to which he had been called. In 1857 the Savannah Medical college called him to the chair of physiology. This position he accepted and moved to Savannah. The next year, 1858, Dr. Harris became the editor of the "Savannah Journal of Medicine." For a long number of years he discharged the onerous duties of medical practitioner, teacher and editor, and filled these positions with marked ability. He was eminently gifted as a writer and lecturer. After the war Dr. Harris was elected professor of theory and practice of medicine in the Savannah Medical college and held this professorship at the time of his death. He had held numerous positions of prominence in the medical association of Georgia, and was president of the Georgia Medical society of Savannah. He was for years one of the visiting physicians to the Savannah hospital. He contributed numerous articles to medical journals upon important topics in medicine. His ability was such that among the most renowned medical men of the state he was regarded as the peer of any of them. He was a great man. Great in brain, great in heart, great in the nobility of spotless manhood, and great in the humility of the medical philosopher. A man of marked dignity and courtliness, a member of one of the most aristocratic families of the state, he was utterly devoid of ostentation. At all times, in all places, he was a gentleman—a gentleman of the old school. As a physician he was profoundly skilled. His confreres and patients accorded him the position of great prominence in the healing art. In his ministry to the sick he was at once physician and friend—healing their diseases, comforting them in their hours of distress. Tender-hearted, generous to a fault, never failing to respond to the call of the sick even when worn out with work, never prostituting his high calling by making it a mere money-making machine, always promptly and cheerfully responding to the calls of the poor, he was a typical follower of the Great Physician. His patients loved him, and had unbounded confidence in his great skill. They felt that his mere presence was full of healing. No man had a higher conception of the dignity of his profession. He sacrificed his life to his sense of duty. In 1876, broken in health through overwork, in the onerous duties of his too large practice, he went to the mountains of Virginia to rest, and seek restoration to health. While there he heard that yellow fever was epidemic in Savannah. He was distressed at the thought of his friends and patients being stricken with the dire pestilence and he so far from them. He at once arose from a sick-bed and hastened to his afflicted people. His friends urged him not to go in the midst of pestilence in his then feeble condition, and said: "If you go you will die." Dr. Harris replied: "My people need my services, and if need be I am ready to lay down my life for them. I appreciate the danger, but I must go to them." He went to the pestilence-stricken city, met hundreds of them fleeing from their homes as though another hour spent under their own vine and figtree meant certain death, yet this man bravely went into Savannah and took up his Christ-like calling. In the doomed city—where the cheeks of brave men turned pale with fear—Dr. Juriah Harris quietly, unostentatiously, heroically went day and night, heroically ministering to the sick, and with his tender touch smoothed the dying pillow. Soon the Angel of Death called him to the bosom of the Great Physician. He sacrificed his life to his conviction of duty. The history of the world records no higher example of heroism than Dr. Harris' return to the plague-stricken city of Savannah. He calmly weighed the danger, knew that his life would probably be sacrificed, yet he unhesitatingly walked into the valley of the shadow of death—laid down his own life to save the lives of his patients. "The deed is registered in the rolls of heaven, where it will live a theme for angels when they celebrate the high-souled virtues which forgetful earth has witnessed."

JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN HARDEN, M. D., of Liberty county, Ga., born in 1810, died Feb. 16, 1848, aged thirty-eight years. Though young in years, no physician in the state ever stood higher in his profession or contributed more learnedly to the literature of medicine. When in feeble health, and even when far advanced in the disease which caused his death he continued with praiseworthy industry and zeal to publish his experience and researches in medicine for the benefit of his brethren. One of his medical papers was favorably reviewed in the "Medico-Chirurgical Review," of London, England. I regret that I am unable to furnish a complete list of medical contributions from the pen of Dr. Harden. The following is a partial list of his published contributions. "Review of Memoirs of M. de Haldst upon the Mechanism of Vision," "Procidentia Uteri," "Soil and Climate of Liberty County, Ga.," "The Relative Areas of the Trunks and Branches of Arteries," "Cases Connected with Pregnancy and Childbirth," "Notes on the Medicine of Moses," "Mercury and its Compounds," Translation of Dumas' researches on the blood, "Researches on Isopathia, or Parallelism of Diseases." The editor of the "Southern Medical Journal" in which Dr. Harden's paper, "The Medicine of Moses," was published, has this note at the head of the article. Note. --We are compelled to omit the Hebrew and Greek employed in the article. We learn that the talented and indefatigable author studied the Hebrew language for the express purpose of comprehending this very subject, "The Medicine of the Bible."—Editors.

On page 255, "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," 1848, published in Augusta, is the following just tribute to the memory of Dr. Harden, from the pen of the editor of that journal: "With deep regret it becomes our painful duty to record the death of Dr. Harden, of Liberty county, Ga. It was never our good fortune to meet him in life; but for years past we have been associated with his name in the medical periodicals of the day. He was a graduate of the Pennsylvania university; had contributed largely to our medical journals. In a preceding number of this journal, vol. 2, p. 500, we took occasion to express our opinion of Dr. Harden's contributions to the medical literature of our country. His articles in the "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," and in the "American Journal of Medical Sciences," had secured to him a well-earned reputation as a writer. His researches on "Isopathia, or the Parallelism of Diseases," were alone sufficient to stamp him an indefatigable student, and a man of decided talent. No one in this state has done more for medicine. Under many disadvantages he toiled on undismayed by disease or death itself, and with the Christian's hope he sank into an early grave. We mourn the loss of one of the most active and interesting collaborators in the death of Dr. John MacPherson Berrien Harden; society one of its most useful and benevolent members; science a true friend and ardent cultivator; and our profession a most devoted and kind-hearted brother.

GAMALIEL WYATT HOLMES, M. D., was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in the year 1823; died at his home in Rome, Ga., Nov. 3, 1890, aged sixty-seven years. His father was Ichabod Holmes, his mother Maria (Brooks) Holmes. He graduated in medicine in 1849 and located in Blakely, Early Co., Ga., in the practice of his profession. He continued in practice in Blakely until 1868, when he moved to Rome. In 1853 he served as a member of the senate of Georgia. During the civil war—1861-1865—Dr. Holmes was surgeon-in-chief of the Florida department of the Confederate army. He was regarded as a model medical officer, and rendered valuable service to his country. Among the members of his profession he was highly esteemed as evidenced by the fact that in 1872 he was elected president of the medical association of Georgia, the highest honor which the physicians of the state can confer upon one of their number. In 1873 he was elected professor of principles and practice of medicine in the Atlanta Medical college, and in 1875 and 1876 was a member of the state board of health of Georgia. Dr. Holmes was a strong man in his profession, and enjoyed a large and lucrative practice in all departments of medicine. He was possessed of a tender heart, refined nature—was loving, charitable and unselfish. He won fame in his chosen vocation, and was no less distinguished as a citizen. In all the relations of life he was ever the typical southern gentleman. His love for his relations was unselfish and generous; he generously rendered financial aid to his brothers and sisters in preparing them for lives of usefulness, and similarly assisted their sons. A man of liberal education, coupled with a genial, sunny temperament, he was a delightful companion in both social and professional life.

DR. P. M. KOLLOCK, Savannah, Ga.—Dr. Phineas Miller Kollock was born in Savannah, Ga., June 7, 1804. His father, Dr. Lemuel Kollock, was long a venerated resident physician of Savannah. His mother was Maria Campbell, daughter of Macartan and Sarah Campbell, of Augusta, Ga. His ancestors were originally Huguenots from the south of France, where the name was De Colloque. On the maternal side, the grandmother of Dr. Kollock was Sarah Fenwicke, sister of the late Brig.-Gen. J. R. Fenwicke. Dr. P. M. Kollock resided in Savannah, where he attended the Chatham academy as a pupil of Hon. Wm. Law until old enough to prepare for college at Exeter, N. H. In 1823 he graduated at Harvard college, Cambridge, Mass.; then proceeded to Philadelphia and entered the medical department of the university of Pennsylvania in the study of medicine under Dr. Parrish from whom, on graduating in 1826, he received a high testimonial in these words: "P. M. Kollock, M. D., was one of my private pupils, who after receiving a liberal education commenced and completed his studies under my direction, and graduated in the university of Pennsylvania. His talents and diligence as a pupil have rendered his medical attainments highly respectable, while his correct morals and amiable deportment have secured my esteem. I do cheerfully recommend him as a young man whom I believe to be well qualified to enter upon the important duties of the medical profession, with credit to himself, and with advantage to any community that may offer him their patronage." The subject of his thesis at the university of Pennsylvania was Mania a Potu. Immediately upon receiving his diploma he commenced the practice of his profession in his native city, where he was one of the most prominent physicians to the day of his death. He was one of the founders of the Savannah Medical college, filling the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in that institution. The following testimonial is from Dr. J. B. Read of Savannah: "Dr. Kollock's practice was remarkably select. He early in his professional life established a reputation as a brave, cool and daring surgeon, and though he was at one time compelled by ill-health to abandon his practice, and turn his attention to planting on St. Catherine's island, on the Georgia coast, still as soon as his re-established health permitted him to again enter on the active pursuit of his profession, his previous reputation at once restored him to his former standing in the community. During his life he performed many capital operations. Dr. Kollock was in an especial manner celebrated for his judgment, manual dexterity and skill in the performance of the various operations called for in a large obstetrical practice. Few serious cases in the city and neighborhood were concluded without his aid and assistance. He was one of the first to follow in the footsteps of the illustrious Sims, in his operations for vesico-vaginal fistula. Many of his cases were published in the journals of the day, and he wrote a monograph on the subject with cases. His success was remarkable and owing to his perseverance and manual dexterity, few were more fitted by nature and study for the performance of those most vexatious cases. In the year 1852 he applied the galvano-cautery to an obstinate and incurable fistula (vesico-vaginal) with complete success. This is probably the first time this cautery was used for this purpose in the United States, and probably in the world, he therefore claims priority for him in this operative procedure. The battery was fixed and arranged for him by R. J. Nunn, M. D., and the operation was performed at the Savannah Medical college on a negro woman who had previously been operated upon in vain by Sims' method. Dr. Kollock was well up in the medical literature of the day, and was eminently conservative in his practice. He did not permit himself to be hurried off by rash and new ideas, and although he was among the first to apply and use the new medicines and the improvements in surgery, he always proceeded cautiously and carefully. With a strong body and a cool temperament he was one of the few persons who seemed to be born to be a physician and surgeon." Besides the article above referred to mentioned in the medical journals of the day, two others may be noticed. 1st. Cases of Traumatic Tetanus, cured by Strychnine, October number of "Southern Medical and Surgical Journal," Vol. 3, No. 10, year 1847. 2d. On the Cutaneous Eruption Induced by the Internal Use of Tartar Emetic, by P. M. Kollock, M. D., of Savannah, Ga. 3d. "Medical and Surgical Journal," August, 1852, Vol. 8, page 465 (No. 8), Topography and Epidemic Diseases of Georgia. This paper was read before the American Medical association in 1847. Dr. Kollock was twice married and at his death left a wife and six children. His eldest son, Edward, in 1865, wishing to adopt the profession of his father, studied medicine at the university of Maryland in Baltimore. By his own choice he became a resident in the infirmary that he might better obtain clinical instruction. While there typhus fever of malignant type appeared among the patients, and by the most untiring devotion to the sick, he contracted the disease and fell a victim to it in 1866. His father never seemed the same after the lamented death of this, his eldest son, for he fondly hoped to see him take his place as Dr. Kollock in the third generation. Dr. Kollock was a member of the Georgia Historical society, and in turn president of the Georgia Medical society and president of the medical association of Georgia. He served as an alderman of the city of Savannah, doing all in his power to insure proper progress; was solicited to be a candidate for the mayoralty, but declined as not deeming it compatible with the practice of his profession. He was a devoted son of Georgia during the late war between the Confederate and United States. He continued his professional duties to the end of his life, never swerving at the call of sickness to rich or poor. His death occurred at the age of sixty-eight and one-half years, on Dec. 25, 1872. He was buried from Christ church (Episcopal), of which he was senior warden. This memoir cannot be more fittingly closed than with the words of a brother practitioner—Dr. J. B. Read of Savannah: "Exegi Monumentum Aere Perennius. An event, to many of us not unexpected, has come to pass; it is none the less mournful. Dr. P. M. Kollock, the oldest, and one of the most honored of our body, has gone to his rest. Sorrowful as we felt to see him bravely struggling against the gradual destruction of his bodily powers, our grief at his loss is not lessened. Whilst we mourn with his family and the community at his death, we can but feel that he died, as he lived, in the endeavor to carry on the exacting duties of the profession he loved so well. His life, full of honors, and his departure from life followed by the regard and esteem of his fellow-men, is an example for us, by which to guide our steps. Of cold exterior, and quiet unpretending address, his kindness of heart was hidden from the masses of the people. Those, only, who were honored by his friendship, were aware of the great generosity of his soul. He was distinguished for his strict sense of justice, and for the courtesy of his demeanor in his intercourse with his fellow-practitioners. His observance of the ethics was carried to a chivalrous extent. He injured no one, and had a kind word for all who sought the assistance of his great experience. We will miss him from our midst. His good acts and charitable deeds have made his monument. He needs none other. Our recollections of our departed friend and brother will always be of one who was willing to assist and who never injured a fellow-practitioner."—Extract from minutes of Georgia Medical society, February, 1873.

JOSEPH PAYNE LOGAN, M. D. Born Nov. 9, 1821, in Botetourt county, Va. His literary education was received at Washington college, now known as Washington and Lee university. He received his degree of M. D. from the medical department of the university of Pennsylvania in 1841. From 1841 to 1854 he resided on his farm in Culpeper county, Va., following the practice of medicine and also engaged in farming. In 1854 he located in Atlanta, in this state, and engaged in the general practice of medicine. He was then a man strikingly handsome in appearance, most engaging in his manners, stainless as to character, and an experienced and accomplished physician. His merits met with immediate recognition and he entered upon a career of marked and honorable success. He soon came to enjoy, and retained through his long life, a large, select and lucrative practice. His exalted character, his professional skill and his loyalty and devotion to his patients made them his sincere and enthusiastic friends. As an enlightened, public-spirited and useful citizen, he enjoyed the esteem of the community in which he lived. He was a member of the Presbyterian church, and for many years an elder therein, and always gave the cause of religion a hearty support. When the war between the states came on, Dr. Logan accepted an appointment as a Confederate surgeon, and in that capacity, and as a medical director, he served till the restoration of peace. In 1866 he located in Baltimore, Md., and was elected professor of principles and practice of medicine in Washington university in that city. This honorable position he held until 1869, when he returned to Atlanta and resumed the practice of his profession. Upon his return to Atlanta he was elected professor of physiology in the Atlanta Medical college, and continued his duties in this college to the time of his death. As a medical teacher Dr. Logan was an eminent success, enjoying the highest respect of his associates in both of the colleges in which he held professorships, and in the esteem of his students he was an ideal teacher. As a teacher, as in all other relations in life, he was faithful, honorable, conscientious and able. He was for many years a member of the medical association of Georgia. In 1858, four years after locating in Georgia, Dr. Logan was elected president of the Association of Distinguished Physicians. He was a member of the American Medical association, and at one time vice-president of this national association. He was a member of the state board of health, and chairman of the prudential committee, and also of the committees on finance and sewerage, and the author of a paper on Prevention and Control of Smallpox, published in the first annual report of the board. He was for several years editor of the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal." He has contributed a number of papers to current medical literature. The "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" said of Dr. Logan: "Dr. Logan was a great physician, a noble man, and genuine Christian. Like the pastor, the doctor deals with the spirit, but unlike him, heals the body, mingling two sacred missions. Dr. Logan blended physical healing and Christian comforting in a marvelous degree. His sympathy was as gentle as his science was skilled. He had a remarkable patience and subtlety in reading ills and an extraordinary grasp of cure. He was a born doctor by mind and temperament. He had a natural medical genius. His strong native intuitions in healing were fortified by the largest culture in medical science. He had a face and form that typified his noble nature. He was a strikingly handsome and imposing man of majestic proportions and carriage, and a head and countenance benignant and comely. He was a rare character, strong, yet pure, manly and gentle, proud, though tender, able and pious. He enjoyed an enormous practice in Atlanta, and it is doubtful if any of its citizens, ever shared more widely in the sorrows of its good people, was ever linked more closely to its sacred memories, or will be more regretted than Dr. Logan. He was a pious member and efficient elder in the Central Presbyterian church. He was a wise and successful business man and the soul of integrity. He was full of charity and public spirit."

CRAWFORD W. LONG, M. D., the discoverer of anaesthesia, was born in Danielsville, Madison Co., Ga., Nov. 1, 1815. His literary education was received at Franklin college (now the university of Georgia), from whence he graduated in 1835. His medical education was acquired at the medical department of the university of Pennsylvania in 1839. After receiving his degree of doctor of medicine he located in Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., where he continued to practice medicine for many years; subsequently he moved to Athens, Ga., where he practiced his profession until June 16, 1878. He literally died in harness—dying at the bedside of a patient to whom he was ministering as physician. While it is unquestionably a fact that to Dr. Long belongs the credit of being the discoverer of anaesthesia—the greatest boon of medicine to suffering man—many and prolonged efforts were made to wrest from him the credit so justly his. Fortunately for the truth of history, the great Dr. Marion Sims, of New York, threw himself into the breach, and with his wonted energy and ability placed the laurel upon the brow of Dr. Long, where it properly belonged. In the "Virginia Medical Monthly," May, 1877, Dr. Sims wrote as follows on this subject: "There are four claimants for the honor of the discovery of anaesthesia, viz.: Crawford W. Long, of Athens, Ga.; Horace Wells, of Hartford, Conn.; W. T. G. Morton and Charles T. Jackson, of Boston. I propose to give a plain statement of facts bearing on the question, leaving the reader to draw his own conclusions. The claims of Long have never been fairly stated in connection with those who came after him. I am ashamed to say I was wholly ignorant of them until a very recent day, and I believe that the great mass of the profession are in the same category with me. I became acquainted with the facts of Long's labors by mere accident. In 1842, while practicing his profession in Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., he had four students in his office, viz.: P. A. Wilhite, John S. Groves, D. I. Long and H. R. P. Long. The last two were relatives of Dr. Long, and they are both dead. Wilhite and Groves are still living (1877). Dr. Long was twenty-seven years old. His pupils were all from nineteen to twenty-one; they were on the best of terms with each other, the doctor entering into all the sports of his pupils with a hearty good will, while he never neglected his studies as their teacher. On one occasion they were talking about the inhalation of nitrous oxide gas, when one of his pupils asked him to make some for them. He said he did not have suitable apparatus for it, but that the inhalation of sulphuric ether would produce precisely the same exhilarating effect. One of the young men present said he had inhaled ether while at school, and was willing to do it again. They were all anxious to witness the effects. Dr. Long got some ether immediately and gave it to the young man who had previously inhaled it. He then inhaled it himself, and afterward gave it to all present. After this the young doctor and his pupils indulged occasionally in ether frolics. On several occasions Dr. Long became furiously excited and could not be controlled. On recovering from the ether intoxication he frequently noticed that his arms and hands were badly bruised, and yet he was not conscious of having felt any pain at the time he was under the influence of the ether. He also noticed the same thing in his pupils. They were often badly hurt by falls and blows, and were not conscious of pain at the time. These facts repeatedly observed, suggested to his mind the idea of using ether to prevent the pain of surgical operations. He frequently spoke of this to his students and at last he determined to give it a trial. Dr. Long having made up his mind to try the experiment with ether on the first favorable opportunity, says ('Southern Medical and Surgical Journal, December, 1849'): 'The first patient to whom I administered ether in a surgical operation was James M. Venable, who then resided within two miles of Jefferson. Mr. Venable consulted me on several occasions with regard to the propriety of removing two small tumors situated on the back part of his neck, but would postpone from time to time having the operations performed from dread of pain. At length I mentioned to him the fact of my receiving bruises while under the influence of the vapor of ether without suffering and, as I knew him to be fond of, and accustomed to inhale ether, I suggested to him the probability that the operations might be performed without pain, and proposed operating on him while under its influence. He consented to have one tumor removed, and the operation was performed the same day. The ether was given to Mr. Venable on a towel, and when fully under its influence I extirpated the tumor. It was encysted and about half an inch in diameter. The patient continued to inhale ether during the time of the operation, and when informed it was over seemed incredulous, till the tumor was shown him. He gave no evidence of suffering during the operation, and assured me, after it was over, that he did not experience the slightest degree of pain from its performance. This operation was performed on March 30, 1842. The second operation I performed upon a patient etherized was on June 6, 1842, and was on the same person (Mr. Venable) for the removal of another small tumor. This operation required more time than the first, from the cyst of the tumor having formed adhesions to the surrounding parts. The patient was insensible to pain during the operation until the last attachment of the cyst was separated, when he exhibited signs of slight suffering, but asserted after the operation was over that the sensation of pain was so slight as scarcely to be perceived. In this operation the inhalation of ether ceased before the first incision was made.'

"In a certificate sworn to by James M. Venable on July 23, 1849, he says: 'In the early part of the year (1842) the young men of Jefferson and the country adjoining were in the habit of inhaling ether for its exhilarating powers, and I inhaled myself frequently for that purpose, and was very fond of its use. While attending the academy I was frequently in the office of Dr. C. W. Long, and having two tumors on the side, or rather back, of my neck, I several times spoke to him about the propriety of cutting them out, but postponed the operation from time to time. On one occasion we had some conversation about the probability that the tumors might be cut while I was under the influence of sulphuric ether without my experiencing pain, and he proposed operating on me while under its influence. I agreed to have one tumor cut out, and had the operation performed that evening (afternoon) after school was dismissed. This was in the early part of the spring of 1842. I commenced inhaling the ether before the operation commenced, and continued it until the operation was over. I did not feel the slightest pain from the operation, and could not believe the tumor was removed until it was shown to me. A month or two after this Dr. C. W. Long cut out the other tumor, situated on the same side of my neck. In this operation I did not feel the least pain until the last cut was made, when I felt a little pain. In this operation I stopped inhaling the ether before the operation was finished. I inhaled the ether in both instances from a towel, which was the common method of taking it.' Dr. Long's four students, Wilhite, Groves and the two Longs, also E. S. Rawls (now Dr. Rawls) and Andrew J. Thurmond, were present and assisted at the operation. Dr. Wilhite tells me that the etherization of Venable was as complete as it is ever made now-a-days, and that Venable always declared he felt no pain during the operation. On July 3, 1842, Dr. Long amputated the toe of a negro boy, Jack, belonging to Mrs. Hemphill. Jack felt no pain, having been completely etherized. On Sept. 9, 1843, Dr. Long exsected, without pain, three small cystic tumors from the head of Mrs. Mary Vincent, who was etherized for the purpose. On Jan. 8, 1845, Dr. Long amputated two fingers for a negro boy belonging to Mr. Ralph Bailey, Sr., the patient being fully etherized and feeling no pain whatever. Morton's friends have been from the outset clamorous and persistent in proclaiming to the world that Morton was the first man who ever produced complete anaesthesia for surgical operations. The facts above stated prove incontestably that they were mistaken; and before we get through it will be shown that they were doubly mistaken, for it will be established beyond controversy that Wells produced anaesthesia by nitrous oxide gas long before Morton did it with ether. Long's anaesthesia with sulphuric ether was on March 30, 1842. Wells' anaesthesia with nitrous oxide gas was on Dec. 11, 1844. Morton's anaesthesia with sulphuric ether was on Sept. 30, 1846. Thus we see that Long antedates Wells two years and eight months and antedates Morton four years and six months.

"Dr. Long's operations under the influence were known by all his neighbors—professional and non-professional. Many of these are still living. Dr. Wilhite lives at Anderson, S. C. Dr. John S. Groves, his fellow-student with Long in 1842, is now living at Dalton, Ga. Dr. A. Delaperiere was the only physician, besides Dr. Long, at Jefferson in 1842. He witnessed these operations, has given his testimony to that effect, and is still living. Dr. E. S. Rawls, another witness, was living in Alabama a short time ago. All these men testify to the fact that Long's operations under ether were witnessed and known by all medical men in his neighborhood and by the whole community. Long's operations were not secret. He made no mystery about the substance given to prevent pain. He took out no patent for his discovery, as did Morton and Jackson. He did not attempt to convert it into money speculation. He published it before all men. It was not hidden from the world. True, his was a very contracted world. He was waiting to test his great discovery in some capital operation. He lived in an obscure little town where there were no railroads and no ponderous machinery to maim his fellow-men and the amputation of a leg or arm was an era in the life of a country doctor. While he was still waiting for larger operations before communicating his discovery to some scientific journal, the labors of Wells and Morton and Jackson and Simpson burst upon the world. When Jackson made his visit to Long at Athens in March, 1854, he said to Long: 'You have the advantage of priority of publication.' Now upon this point Long, Wells, Morton and Jackson stand individually upon the same level. Long exhibited to medical men and to the community his operations under ether (1842). Wells exhibited to medical men and to the community his operation of the extraction of teeth under the influence of nitrous oxide gas (1844). Morton exhibited to medical men and to the community the use of his secret remedy, 'Letheon' (1846), as an anaesthetic. But Morton was fortunate in showing his patent remedy to the great surgeons of Boston. And it was not Morton, but it was Warren and Hayward and Bigelow who performed the operations at the Massachusetts General hospital (October, 1846), on patients to whom Morton gave his 'Letheon' that the world owes the immediate and universal use of anaesthesia in surgery. If Morton could have had his way he would have deodorized the ether and kept it a secret from the world. Neither Wells nor Morton nor Jackson ever published a word on the subject till it burst forth in a blaze from the labors of the hospital surgeons already named. When Warren and Hayward and Bigelow proved the real greatness of the discovery, then it was that Wells, Morton and Jackson began the war of pamphlets, and not till then did either of them publish in any scientific journal a line about anaesthesia. And thus we see that its first publication to the world was really due to the illustrious surgeons of the Massachusetts General hospital.

"In 1853 Morton petitioned congress to grant him a large sum of money for the discovery of anaesthesia. The friends of Wells opposed it, and claimed this honor for Wells, who used nitrous oxide gas as an anaesthetic two years and a half before Morton used ether for this purpose. Then it was that the friends of Long appeared upon the scene, proving that Long was the first to use ether, antedating Morton four years and a half. When Long's claim to the honor of discovering anaesthesia was presented to congress by the Hon. Mr. Dawson, senator from Georgia, it was formidable enough to block the movements of Morton to get the appropriation he demanded for his discovery. They were so strong that Dr. Charles T. Jackson went to Athens, Ga., expressly to see Dr. Long on the subject. In a communication to the Boston "Medical and Surgical Journal," April 11, 1861, Dr. Charles T. Jackson says he visited Dr. Long at Athens, Ga., on March 8, 1854, to examine into Dr. Long's claim to being the first to use sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic in surgery, and he further says: 'From the documents shown me by Dr. Long it appears that he employed sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic agent. First—On March 30, 1842, when he extirpated a small glandular tumor from the neck of James M. Venable, a boy (Mr. Venable was over twenty-one years old when the operation was performed, J. M. S.), in Jefferson, Ga., now dead. Second—On July 3, 1842, in the amputation of a toe of a negro boy belonging to Mrs. Hemphill, of Jackson, Ga. Third—On Sept. 9, 1843, in the extirpation of a tumor from the head of Mary Vincent, of Jackson, Ga. Fourth—On Jan. 8, 1845, in the amputation of a finger of a negro boy belonging to Ralph Bailey, of Jackson, Ga. Copies of the letters and depositions proving these operations with ether were shown me by Dr. Long. He also referred me to physicians in Jefferson who knew of the operations at the time.' The above extract from Dr. Jackson's paper to the Boston 'Medical Journal' recognizes Long's claim to being the first to produce anesthesia for surgical operations, but it does not tell the whole story of Dr. Jackson's visit to Dr. Long. Dr. Long has furnished me with all the evidence, consisting of affidavits, certificates, book entries, etc., that Dr. Jackson examined. He has also written me fully on the subject, and every fact that I have stated can be substantiated by documentary evidence.

"In one of Dr. Long's letters to me (Nov. 5, 1876), he says: 'In 1854 Dr. Charles T. Jackson came to Georgia and spent two days with me in Athens, most of the time in my office, examining books, accounts, dates and certificates, establishing the time, etc., of my operations. He expressed himself satisfied with the correctness of my claim to the first use of ether as an anesthetic in surgical operations. Dr. Jackson informed me that he would go from Athens to Dah-lonega, Ga., and as I knew he must pass through Jefferson, where I resided up to 1850, and where my first operations under ether were performed, I requested him to stop in Jefferson and see some of the physicians there who witnessed or knew of the operations, and also a number of the citizens of the village who either witnessed the operations or were familiar with them from common report. Dr. Jackson spent one or more days in Jefferson, and on his return expressed himself satisfied with the testimony. In Dr. Jackson's communication to the "Boston Medical and Surgical Journal" (April 11, 1861) he neglected to say anything of the information he obtained while in Jefferson, although he admitted to me on his return that the evidence was perfectly satisfactory. The Hon. C. W. Andrews, of Madison, Ga., informs me that he was in Dr. Long's employ and in his office when Dr. Jackson spent a whole day with Long comparing notes and talking over the subject of etherization, and it seems that the real object of Dr. Jackson's visit to Dr. Long was to induce Long to unite with him in laying their conjoint claims before congress as the real discoverers of anesthesia as opposed to those of Morton. Jackson was willing to concede to Long the honor of being the first to use ether in surgical operations, but wished Long to concede to him the honor of priority in making the discovery of the principle of anesthesia when he inhaled ether to relieve pain and difficulty of breathing after inhaling chlorine gas (as Sir Humphrey Davy had done before). Dr. Long says (Feb. 8, 1877): 'In our conversation I understood Dr. Jackson to yield the point of priority to me, and so did the Hon. C. W. Andrews. I did not admit to him that he was the first to make the discovery, leaving to me its practical application; and when he proposed to me to unite our claims—he to claim the discovery and I its first practical use in surgical operations—I positively refused. I was satisfied that I was entitled to the credit of the discovery, as well as of the first practical use of ether in surgical operations. Instead of writing to Senator Dawson to unite our claims as Dr. Jackson requested, I wrote to Mr. Dawson to make no such compromise, but to place my claims solely on their merits; and if you will consult the congressional proceedings of that time you will see that Mr. Dawson presented my claims separate and independent.'"

Feb. 24, 1879, the medical society of Athens unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Athens, Ga., Aug. 15, 1878.

"I, the undersigned, do certify that in May, 1843, I assisted Dr. R. D. Moore in amputating the leg of a colored boy, Augustus, then the property of William Stroud, who resided in this county, and that I distinctly recollect hearing Dr. R. D. Moore say that 'if I had thought of it before leaving home I would have tried Dr. C. W. Long's great discovery, namely, the administration of sulphuric ether, as an anaesthetic in performing the operation.' Having neglected to bring the ether, Dr. Moore finally concluded to influence the patient with morphia, under which influence the operation was performed.

"Joseph B. Carlton, M. D."

"Athens, Ga., Aug. 10, 1878.

"This certifies that, in the month of May, 1843, I was present and assisted Dr. R. D. Moore, of this place, in amputating a leg. He said to his three students (I being one), 'If I had thought of it before leaving home, I would have tried Dr. Long's discovery, producing insensibility by inhalation of ether.'

"James Camak, M. D."

"Attest: Asa M. Jackson, ordinary, Clark county, Ga."

Dr. Sims summarizes the claims of Long, Wells, Morton and Jackson as follows: "6th. That Long was the first man to intentionally produce anaesthesia for surgical operations, and that this was done with sulphuric ether in 1842. 7th. That Long did not by accident hit upon it, but that he reasoned it out in a philosophical and logical manner. 8th. That Wells, without any knowledge of Long's labors, demonstrated in the same philosophic way the great principle of anaesthesia by the use of nitrous oxide gas (1844). 9th. That Morton intended to follow Wells in using the gas as an anaesthetic in dentistry, and for this purpose asked Wells to show him how to make the gas (1846). 10th. That Wells referred Morton to Jackson for this purpose, as Jackson was known to be a scientific man and an able chemist. 11th. That Morton called on Jackson for information on the subject, and that Jackson told Morton to use sulphuric ether instead of nitrous oxide gas, as it was known to possess the same properties, was as safe, and easier to get. 12th. That Morton, acting upon Jackson's off-hand suggestion, used the ether successfully in the extraction of teeth (1846). 13th. That Warren and Hayward and Bigelow performed important surgical operations in the Massachusetts general hospital (October, 1846), on patients etherized by Morton, and that this introduced and popularized the practice throughout the world. In Boston, Mass., a monument has been erected to the discoverer of anaesthesia, but no man is designated thereon by name. The citizens of Hartford, Conn., have erected a bronze statue of Wells (by Bartlett) in their Capitol park, claiming for him the discovery of anaesthesia. This is as it should be. We have no objection to it, and would suggest that the names of Long, Wells, Morton and Jackson be inscribed on the Boston column, one on each side, as co-discoverers of anaesthesia. The state of Georgia will, at no distant day, erect at its capital or its university, a statue of Long, who was unquestionably the first discoverer of anaesthesia. All the claimants of the honor of discovering anaesthesia are Americans. To each is due a certain measure of credit, but no one man can claim this great honor exclusively. The names of Long, Wells, Morton and Jackson will doubtless be associated as co-laborers in the great work, and to these must be added the immortal name of Sir James Y. Simpson, who introduced chloroform and enlarged the domain of anaesthesia."

Feb. 24, 1879, the Medical society of Athens unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas, The recent compilation of facts by Dr. J. Marion Sims, of New York, in regard to the discovery of anaesthesia clearly proves Dr. Crawford W. Long to be the first to use sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic agent in surgical operations; and

"Whereas, Dr. Long was a native Georgian, and especially a native of our own section, we, the medical association of Athens, and of which he was the honored and esteemed president, must necessarily feel much pride in claiming so valuable, so useful, and so scientific a man as our companion in medicine, and likewise feeling that not only a most pleasing sense of duty, but a most justifiable sense of pride and honor, make it eminently proper and commendable that this association should take the initiatory steps in bringing about, on the part of the medical profession, a full and just recognition of the claims of Dr. Long to being the first and true discoverer of anaesthesia; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That from the accumulation of facts and evidence deduced, this society is fully satisfied that Dr. Crawford W. Long, of Athens, Ga., was the first person who ever used sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic agent in surgical operations, and as an act of justice to the distinguished discoverer, now deceased, and to the honor of the profession of our own state, we most respectfully recommend and request that the Georgia Medical association, soon to hold its annual session in the city of Rome, take such steps as shall definitely determine Dr. Long's claim to priority in the use and discovery of anaesthesia; and that the State Medical association be further requested to bring the matter before the American Medical association, which is to hold its next session in the city of Atlanta during the approaching summer, that through this national convention of medical men Dr. Long's claim may be established throughout the civilized world.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the president and secretary of the State Medical association, and also to the different medical journals of our state, with the request that they publish the same."

In 1853 the medical society of the state of Georgia unanimously adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That it is the opinion of this society that Dr. C. W. Long, now of Athens, Ga., was the first person to use sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic agent in surgical operations; and as an act of justice to Dr. Long individually, and to the honor of the profession of our state, we recommend him to present his claim to priority in the use of this most important agent to the consideration of the American Medical association at its next meeting." In an address delivered in 1879 at the university of Georgia, Alexander H. Stephens feelingly spoke of Dr. Long as the discoverer of anaesthesia, and suggested that inasmuch as congress had invited each of the states to place statues of two of its benefactors in the art gallery of Washington, D. C., that Georgia send the statues of James Oglethorpe and Crawford W. Long. Subsequently, upon motion of Hon B. C. Yancy, of Clark county, the legislature of Georgia adopted the following resolutions relative to Dr. Long:

"Whereas, It has been proposed that each state of the United States of America should designate the names of two persons whose memories are to be perpetuated by likenesses in statuary, in the art gallery established, or to be established in Washington city, the Federal capital; and whereas, anaesthesia is the greatest boon ever conferred upon humanity, unless vaccination claims equal title to be so considered; and whereas, Crawford W. Long, M. D., a native of Georgia, and graduate of the university of the state, lately deceased, is the historic discoverer of anaesthesia, and the first man to employ sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic agent in a surgical operation, on March 30, 1842; and whereas, England recognized the labors of Jenner, and also bestowed a high honor of government upon Sir James Y. Simpson, in recognition of the great service he had rendered humanity by the introduction of chloroform, which enlarged the domain of anaesthesia; and whereas, our Federal republic should not allow the names of our discoverers and scientists to rest in obscurity, and the state of Georgia should especially cherish, with pride, the name and memory of her great discoverer:

"Resolved, By the general assembly, that the name of Crawford W. Long, M. D., the historic discoverer of anaesthesia, he presented to the art gallery at Washington city, established or to be established, to represent the state of Georgia.

"Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be transmitted by the governor to his excellency, the president of the United States of America, with a request that he submit them to the senate and house of representatives of congress on its next assemblage; and that another copy thereof be sent by the governor to the proper officer in charge of said art gallery.

"Approved, Aug. 23, 1879.

"Alfred H. Colquitt, Governor."

Mr. Henri L. Stuart, a public-spirited citizen of New York, in appreciation of the genius of Dr. Long, had an oil painting made of him by one of the most celebrated artists in America and presented it to the state of Georgia through United States Senator John B. Gordon. The following is a copy of the letter of Mr. Stuart to Gen. Gordon:

"New York, Aug. 12, 1879.

"Hon. J. B. Gordon:

"Dear Sir—Will you do me the favor, as a member of the Alumni association of the state university of Georgia, to present in my name the accompanying portrait (painted by F. B. Carpenter) of Dr. Crawford W. Long, a late member of this association, and demonstrated discoverer of surgical anaesthesia by the use of sulphuric ether, March 30, 1842, to be placed in the capitol of the state of Georgia, under their control and supervision.

"I desire to do this in honor of the memory and just fame of this eminent physician and useful citizen, to make his record complete as the discoverer of anaesthesia.

"Providence seems to have intervened to prevent the final settlement of this vexed question, until the claims of this modest, unpretending and gifted man, who really made the discovery, were fully demonstrated by Dr. J. M. Sims, a native of South Carolina, also a discoverer and a benefactor of humanity, scarcely second to Dr. Long himself. His labors in Alabama, which led to the founding of the Woman's hospital of the state of New York, have also resulted in giving him a world-wide fame as a surgeon and investigator.

"It is fitting that these two eminent southern men should be represented as they are in Mr. Carpenter's picture.

"Very respectfully and faithfully, your friend,
"Henri L. Stuart."

The legislature being in session, Gen. Gordon transmitted the letter of Mr. Stuart to that body. Hon. B. C. Yancy introduced the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, Mr. H. L. Stuart, a noble-hearted humanitarian of the city of New York, has had painted at his expense a magnificent portrait of the late Dr. Crawford W. Long, a citizen of Georgia, and the discoverer of modern surgical anaesthesia, and offers said portrait in appreciation of the grand discovery and the discoverer, to the alumni of the university of the state of Georgia, with the request that it be received by the house of representatives of the general assembly of the state, and be placed on the walls of the representative chamber.

"Resolved, That the gift of said portrait for the purpose designated be accepted by the house of representatives.

"Resolved, That the hour of 12 o'clock meridian, on Monday next, be ordered as the time for the presentation of said portrait, by the Hon. John B. Gordon.

"Resolved, That a committee of three members of the house by appointment by the speaker to arrange for the ceremonials, and to notify the Hon. John B. Gordon of the adoption of the preamble and resolution, and to invite to a seat on the floor during said ceremonial and his stay in the city, the generous and noble donor, Mr. H. L. Stuart, of the city of New York."

At the appointed hour, Gen. Gordon, in a magnificent speech presented to the general assembly the portrait of Dr. Long. It was feelingly and eloquently received in behalf of the legislature by the Hon. B. C. Yancy of Athens—in which city Dr. Long labored so long and well as a practitioner of medicine. It was a memorable event in Georgia. In addition to the general assembly of the state, there were present his excellency Gov. Colquitt, the supreme court, many distinguished citizens of the commonwealth, Mr. Stuart and the family of Dr. Long. The portrait of the great discoverer of anaesthesia hangs in a conspicuous position in our capitol building at Atlanta. Just here it is proper to recall the following melancholy and touching incident: When the presentation of the portrait of Dr. Long had been made to the state Mr. Stuart went to Athens to visit the grave of Dr. Long. Mr. Stuart was stricken with paralysis a few hours after he reached

Athens, and died Sept. 16, 1879. His remains were, at the request of Dr. Long's family, interred in the cemetery at Athens in their family burying ground. He was a guest in Mrs. Long's home during his stay in Athens, and during his illness was nursed with tenderest care by her household. The city of Athens paid a fitting honor to Mr. Stuart's memory by a public funeral. The venerable A. A. Lipscomb, D. D., LL. D., in his funeral oration over Dr. Long, forcibly, truthfully and tenderly delineated his character as follows: "No one can value his profession who does not value his manhood. Dr. Long regarded his profession as a channel through which his inner and outer life might flow in blessing to the world. And, in that channel, it did flow; a stream tranquil, but strong, deepening and widening as it went onward; a water from the fount of the old Bethesda that bore healing to so many. Dr. Long looked on his profession as a providential vocation. To him, it was not a mere work of humanity; it was this because it was more than this; and he accepted its tasks as a divine ordination, for which he was set apart by the touch of a hand unseen. Occasionally his profound sensibility on this subject would break through his reserve, and then, words touching his supreme concern, would drop from the conscience of his soul. What those words were his confidential friends know. But you all know that no man can do such work as Dr. Long did, 'except God be with him.' Nay, more; no man can do any true, noble, enduring work 'except God be with him.' First and last, whoever the workman, he is nothing, 'except God be with him.' The solemn feeling, fervent no less than reverential, that God has given us a special work to do—that our eternal life hangs suspended on the issues thereof—that God's glory is not possible of promotion by us save by and through that single work well and bravely done, this feeling must possess and occupy our very hearts, must lift us high above the allurements of the world's gain and the charms of the world's renown, must aid consecration to devotion, and inspiration to consecration, or, verily, all our work here antedates the final verdict of Almighty God, consigning it to the burning as 'wood, hay, stubble.' 'I believe,' said Dr. Long, 'my profession is a ministry from God to me;' and, again, speaking of his discovery of anaesthesia by means of sulphuric ether, 'My only wish about it is to be known as a benefactor to my race.' Can you wonder that a man who acted out these sentiments was a man of prayer? The need of prayer is always felt when our work is felt. No one could be much with Dr. Long under the pressure of anxiety in the sick chamber and not see prayer in the meditative stillness of his eyes. The event of his career was the discovery to which I have alluded. Fortunately for the truth of history, Dr. Marion J. Sims, a distinguished physician of New York, undertook last year to settle the claims of rivals to the first use of anaesthetic agents for surgical operations. The task could not have fallen into better hands. With that disinterested energy and manly devotion to the interests of medical science for which Dr. Sims is so justly and so widely celebrated, he collected the facts bearing on the point at issue. The result of the inquiry leaves no doubt as to the first discovery, and Dr. Long is now regarded in this country and Europe as entitled to this honor. But he has gone from us now, and the honor can be only a part of his memory. Standing here in the presence of his remains, I am this day but the voice of the church, of his professional brethren and of this whole community, when I say that in Dr. Long's death, we have lost an excellent man. He assumed nothing, pretended to nothing he was not, was thoroughly truthful in look, tone, manner and action, lived simply, treated everyone considerately, and walked humbly before God. Modest even to the verge of timidity when nothing serious was at stake, he was stern and bold and utterly self-forgetting if responsibility had to be met or danger confronted. A large fund of intensity lay hidden in the depths of his quiet nature, which answered with instant and eager force if duty summoned him to action. Reticent as to his own merits, reticent too of his troubles lest he should disturb the happiness of others, he had none of that morbidness which retires into its capacious self and inflicts the pain of a chilling reserve on all who have the misfortune to come within its reach. Gentle, forbearing, faithful to every wise instinct, he kept the covenant of a heart's true life till his days were numbered. He had strength of will and much power of endurance. The minor heroisms which make so large a share of a physician's experience, and of which the world knows so little, wrote many a paragraph in the annals of his life. Emphatically applicable to him were the words of Wordsworth, that—

“The facts of human existence
Did take a sober coloring from an eye
That had kept watch o'er man's mortality.”

And appropriate to him these other words, also, which tell how some enjoy

“That best portion of a good man's life,
His little nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love.”

“Over three score years were mercifully granted to him, and through him to us, to Georgia and the world. Day by day strengthened his hold on our families and the community. All his recent growth which was so manifest to the nearer circle of friends was upward into clearer light and purer air. It was noticeable, that the ideal of that profession, to which God has delegated the most solemn and pathetic trusts of our earthly being, steadily rose before his eye into loftier grandeur. Noticeable, too, was the fact, that his sympathies deepened for the sufferings of womanhood, and with keener enlistment of studious thought and warm affection he worked and toiled and sorrowed in the tragic hours of her agony. Nor did those nearest to him fail to observe how his old habits of reading the Bible and attending to private devotion waxed stronger and dearer as his professional engagements multiplied. It became him thus to live. It became him thus to die, while discharging the tenderest and holiest duty of his profession, by the bedside of a lady whose life was threatened. And if we have this afternoon to commit his mortal remains to the grave and say of him, friend, brother, physician, benefactor, in the language of grief's litany, ‘Dust to dust!’ we shall give the manly virtues and Christian integrity of Crawford W. Long a dwelling-place where so many of the elect of our life and love are already gathered

“Beneath the umbrage deep,
That shades the silent world of memory.”

CURTIS BELL NOTTINGHAM, M. D. Born in Northampton county, Va., May 21, 1818; died in Macon, Ga., March 14, 1876. His literary education was acquired at Carlyle college, Pennsylvania. He graduated M. D. from Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1840. He began the practice of medicine in Perry, Houston Co., Ga., in 1840, remaining there for nine years, having attained marked prominence as a skillful practitioner. Encouraged by his success, and desiring a larger field, he, in 1849, located in Macon. In his new home he rapidly attained professional eminence, and soon stood in the front rank of the medical profession of Macon and of the state. Being of a weak constitution the tax of his large and arduous professional work began to make serious inroads upon his health, and finally failing strength decided him to abandon the practice of medicine for a time. This he did in 1860, moving to Louisiana and engaging in the pursuit of agriculture. Upon the outbreak of the Confederate war he promptly volunteered his services to his country and was assigned to duty as surgeon of an important military post in Louisiana. He continued his services in the medical department of the Confederate army during the entire period of the war. In military, as in civil life, he ranked among the ablest of his confreres, both as a physician and surgeon. His fidelity to duty, and his fearlessness of danger to self, made him conspicuous as a military surgeon. The confiscation of his property, as the result of the war, left him wholly dependent upon his profession. He therefore decided to return to Macon to again take up professional work. Jan. 1, 1866, he resumed the practice of medicine in Macon. His former patrons rejoiced at his return, and soon he was again in a large and arduous practice. For several years his feeble health markedly interfered with his wonted faithful discharge of professional duties—occasionally being confined to a sick bed for several months at a time. But with an indomitable will and energy he continued his professional duties, oftentimes being himself more in need of a physician than his patients, among whom he labored so tenderly and faithfully. This is true heroism. A life of self-denial, self-sacrifice, great heartedness, which causes one to forget self and bravely battle for others, yet scarcely able physically to do for self. Dr. Nottingham was one of God's noblemen, full of courage, self-sacrifice, gentleness and humility. He evoked the love of his fellows because he loved them, labored for their welfare wholly unmindful of self. He was one of the most elegant of men. Courtly in manners, gentle of speech and action, full of the milk of human kindness, he was an ideal physician. His public addresses as well as his contributions to medical literature evidenced a highly cultivated mind. Many of them are gems of English composition and medical philosophy. Dr. Nottingham was not only a highly accomplished, general practitioner of medicine, but he was a surgeon of conspicuous ability. When ovariotomy was rarely done in the south he was one of the surgeons to successfully and repeatedly do this operation. He possessed the qualities of a great surgeon, thorough knowledge of anatomy, dexterity in the use of instruments, calmness and extraordinary judgment; he had few peers in surgery among his associates and no superiors. In all departments of medicine he was highly skilled. Not content with the mere cure of disease he, with the mind of the philosopher, regarded hygiene—the prevention of disease—as the royal path of medicine. He was an enthusiast upon the subject of sanitation. A properly organized and equipped public health service in Georgia was the one object nearest his heart and he persistently labored to this end. He exerted himself for the establishment of a state board of health in Georgia. When it was established he was made a member of that board and rendered valuable service therein. He was one of its most prominent, active and useful members. He was a member of the State Medical society from its organization in 1849 to the time of his death. He was one of the founders of this society, and in 1869 its president. He was repeatedly elected a delegate to represent the State Medical society in the sessions of the American Medical association, and in this body of distinguished physicians he was assigned positions of prominence reserved for its most renowned members. He was one of the most benevolent of men. When called to a patient he never stopped to consider the question as to whether or not he would be paid for his services. Good Samaritan that he was, he discharged his high calling in serving any and everyone who needed his services, and when money was not his reward he found the richer reward of conscientious discharge of the sacred duties of his Christ-like vocation. Not only were his eminent professional services cheerfully given to the poor, but he generously contributed financially to their relief. As a consequence of his benevolence he died poor in worldly possessions, but left his family and state the legacy of an honorable, useful life singularly devoted to God and his fellow-men.

ROBERT MARK SMITH, M. D., born in Paterson, N. J., Jan. 13, 1826; died Feb. 1, 1879. His father was Terrance Smith, of Paterson, N. J., his mother was Margaret (Inglis) Smith. When the subject of this sketch was twelve years old he moved with his parents to Athens, Ga. After receiving an academic education he found employment in a drug store in that city. While engaged in the drug business he made himself proficient in practical pharmacy, and subsequently entered upon the study of medicine. He graduated from Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1846, having taken both courses in that celebrated institution. After graduating in medicine he, after a creditable examination, won a position as assistant surgeon in the United States navy. In consequence of failing health he resigned from the navy and in 1847 entered upon the practice of medicine in Athens, Ga. Dr. Smith was a highly accomplished general practitioner of medicine, and was the peer of any physician of Georgia. He had a decided preference for surgery, and was one of the most skillful surgeons in the south. Among the most important surgical operations done by him may be mentioned: First, Laparotomy for case of extra uterine pregnancy. Second, A case of ligation of the primitive carotid artery. The nature of the wound, for which the operation was done, was such as to prevent tying the artery at the place known as "the point of selection," and it was found necessary to ligate the vessel one inch above the clavicle. The operation was successful. Dr. Smith patriotically responded to the call of his country and served as surgeon of the Sixteenth Georgia regiment, Confederate States army. He remained in the field throughout the war. After the cessation of hostilities he returned to Athens and continued a highly useful and honorable practitioner until stricken with disease just prior to his death. For four years Dr. Smith was mayor of Athens, discharging the duties of his office with zeal and ability. He was a member of the American Medical association, and of the medical association of Georgia. In both of these bodies he occupied prominent positions. He was also a member of the board of health of Athens. For some years he was professor of medical jurisprudence in the law department of the university of Georgia, and filled this chair with conspicuous ability. He was ever the friend of education, and for years a member of the board of trustees of the Southern Masonic Female college, situated in Covington in this state. As a Mason he was master of his lodge for ten years and held official position in the grand lodge of Georgia. He was a bright member of the Ancient Scottish rite, and at the time of his death enjoyed the distinction of being a thirty-third degree Mason. This high honor was conferred upon him in 1876. In his profession, in private life, in official position he was ever the true gentleman—faithful, honorable, considerate, unselfish and loyal in all the duties of life. As citizen, physician and officer he possessed, as he richly merited, the love and confidence of his fellows.

DR. H. H. STEINER, M. D., Augusta. Henry Hegner Steiner was born in Frederick City, Md., on Jan. 8, 1816. His father, Capt. Henry Steiner, who served in the war of 1812, was a close friend of Gen. Andrew Jackson, and commanded Steiner's battery of artillery at the battle of North Point, near Baltimore. His great-grandfather was John Conrad Steiner, a clergyman of the Lutheran church, who was distinguished for his piety and his learning. He was the son of a Swiss senator, and came to this country from Winteture, in Switzerland. An imposing monument stands to his memory to this day in Franklin square, Philadelphia. Dr. Steiner's mother was Rachel Murray, daughter of Maj. Josephus

Murray, who achieved distinction in the war of the revolution, and whose home was at Riesterstown, Md. Dr. Steiner pursued his classical studies at Kenyon college, Ohio, but did not remain to be graduated. Having decided to study medicine, he entered the university of Pennsylvania, and was graduated in March, 1838. He began the practice of medicine in Philadelphia, but entered the United States army as assistant surgeon in June, 1839, and was ordered to Fort Gibson, a frontier post in Arkansas, where he was attached to the Eighth regiment of infantry. It was with this regiment that he went to Florida in 1841, and served in the Seminole war under Gen. William Worth, remaining there until the close of that war in 1842. In 1843 he was transferred to the United States arsenal at Summerville, near Augusta, Ga., assigned to duty as post surgeon, which position he held for several years. While filling this position he was frequently called upon to render professional services to the wealthy and aristocratic citizens of Summerville. His professional acumen was seen and appreciated, and numerous members of his civilian clientele urged him to resign from the army and locate in Augusta. Before he had decided upon this step, the United States becoming involved in the war with Mexico, Dr. Steiner went to the front with his command, serving as surgeon of the First regiment of artillery, and later as surgeon on the staff of Gen. Zachary Taylor. He was present at the battle of Monterey, Churubusco and Chapultepec, and also at the capture of the City of Mexico. The fame of his services during the memorable years of that war extended through the whole army. Even to-day, whenever a venerable surgeon of the old army is found the name of Dr. Steiner is remembered with affection and admiration. He won reputation at once by his wonderful success in the treatment of disease, and by his unsurpassed skill in the most difficult operations known to surgery. He also won the hearts of all men by his simplicity, his sympathy, his tenderness. Gen. Taylor never forgot his kindness, and when he became president, in 1849, he invited Dr. Steiner to the White House, and they spent a whole day alone together reviving the memories of their Mexican campaigns.

The spirit of Christianity seemed to be ever the spirit in which he did his work. In the long weary hours after the battle was over he would take no rest until the last wound had been dressed and the last suffering had been alleviated. He administered to the wounded of both armies alike. He would not leave even the humblest of his enemies to suffer or to die if his ministrations could give relief. He was always generous to an enemy. He especially insisted that all due honor should be paid to a fallen foe. When the brave Mexican general, Velasquez, was killed in the storming of the City of Mexico, and his dead body was about to be left unburied, Dr. Steiner refused to leave the field until the body of his foe was given proper sepulture. He even declared he would dig the grave with his own hands, until at last the American officer was shamed into compliance and Velasquez was buried with the honors of war. His kindness in the midst of all the cruel experiences that follow in the track of war won for him the life-long love and friendship of many a soldier in that eventful time. The brother of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston died in Dr. Steiner's arms, and the doctor himself helped to make the rude grave in which he was laid to rest. Gen. Johnston always remembered this with affectionate gratitude. Years afterward he said that Dr. Steiner "was linked to him by the tenderest associations of his life." When the United States army captured Vera Cruz yellow fever appeared among the troops. Such was the proportions and malignancy that it seemed to threaten to annihilate the American army. Dr. Steiner was placed in charge of the hospitals and labored day and night in relief of his fever-stricken comrades. Finally he contracted the disease and narrowly escaped death. He re-remained in the medical department of the United States army until 1851, when he resigned his commission, and in August of the same year located in Augusta as a practitioner of medicine. Being known to the citizens of Augusta as an elegant gentleman and a highly skilled physician, he entered at once upon a large and lucrative practice, and up to 1889, when he was prostrated upon a sick bed from which he never rose, he was regarded as the most skillful physician in the state of Georgia, indeed in this section of the Union. Dr. Steiner's experience in the yellow fever epidemic in Vera Cruz was of great service to the city of Augusta when that disease attacked the city in 1854. He being called to a case, promptly pronounced it yellow fever, and so announced it to the authorities. The merchants ridiculed the diagnosis, and denounced him for thus damaging the city. In a short time, however, the disease was pronounced epidemic, when his former detractors warmly commended his professional acumen. During the entire epidemic he most skillfully and unweariedly ministered to the diseased.

Dr. Steiner's clientele embraced the most distinguished citizens of this section, as well as of Augusta. He was the physician of Govs. Hammond, Pickens and Bonham, of South Carolina, and Gov. Jenkins, Robert Toombs, A. H. Stephens and John P. King and Col. Henry Cumming, of Georgia. To all these distinguished men he was not only the beloved physician, but the trusted friend and counselor. Indeed it may be truthfully said that he was at once physician and friend in every household in which he practiced his profession. Mr. Stephens used to say of him that he was a man that would have risen to the first place in any profession which he had chosen. And whenever the "great commoner" was ill, whether in Washington or Atlanta, or at Liberty hall, he always summoned Dr. Steiner, saying that if he had a chance for life it lay in the skill of his trusted physician. With the exception of Mr. Stephens, Dr. Steiner was regarded by Gen. Toombs as his closest personal friend. When Mr. Toombs was made a general in the Confederate army, Dr. Steiner was selected by him as surgeon on his staff. Mr. P. A. Stovall in his life of Robert Toombs tells of the intimacy of the friendship between Dr. Steiner and Gen. Toombs, and the powerful influence which the doctor exerted over the general, both in private and military life. It is a well known fact that it was through the influence of Dr. Steiner that Gen. Toombs made confession of faith in Christ and received baptism. Mrs. Toombs was critically ill at Clarksville in 1883. Their devoted friend, Dr. Steiner, was called to attend her, and remained until her death. Dr. Steiner then spoke to Gen. Toombs of his spiritual condition. Finding the general in proper spiritual condition, he urged him to profess his faith and receive baptism. This the general did, greatly to the rejoicing of the good doctor. Dr. Steiner's minister said of him: "It may be truly said of him that he was a lay evangelist. His ministrations to the sick and the dying became opportunities for spiritual comfort and guidance. His wonderful sympathy won for him the confidence of all his patients, and when he had done everything that human skill could do in ministering to the body, he never failed to say 'a word in season' about the solemn and deeper interests of the soul. His prayers in the sick room can never be forgotten by those who heard them. On one occasion a man was dying and had sent for a Catholic priest to baptize him. The man's life was passing away very fast. He implored that he might not die unbaptized. In the emergency Dr. Steiner did not hesitate to exercise the right, in such extremities, to administer lay baptism." He baptized the dying man. As he was coming home after the man had died he met the priest hurrying to the bedside. The doctor told him what he had done, and the good priest, with tears in his eyes, thanked him for the kind office which he had rendered in his stead to the dying man.

"No man in this community ever had a better knowledge of disease than Dr. Steiner. His power of diagnosis amounted almost to intuition. His cures seemed sometimes to be miracles of healing. Yet with all his skill and rare professional success he never forgot that he was after all only an agent in the service of the Great Physician. The motto of his life was the legend which is written over the door of a lecture room in one of the great schools of medicine in Paris: 'I dressed the wound; God healed him.' As an evidence of the high estimate placed upon Dr. Steiner by his old army comrade, it is proper to mention that when the late war commenced, Stonewall Jackson invited Dr. Steiner, his old army friend, to accept the position of surgeon on his staff. The love of the people of all classes and races for Dr. Steiner exceeded anything I ever witnessed. Kindness was the law of his life in his intercourse with everybody. The human heart leaps kindly back to kindness. Kindness will disarm even the murderous savage, as was proven by the following incident in the life of Dr. Steiner: While he was serving under Gen. Worth, during the Seminole war, he would often go out hunting alone. When the war ended and the Indians were brought in as prisoners to the camp, the great Seminole chief, Alpati, turned to Dr. Steiner and said: 'Many a time when you were roaming alone through our hunting grounds have I leveled my rifle to kill you. But Alpati would never hurt the good medicine man.' The sentiment of the great Indian chief is the sentiment of this whole people among whom he lived so honorably and so long. There is no man among his people who would ever have lifted his hand to harm the 'good medicine man' who has gone to rest. Few men, if any, have ever stood in such intimate personal relations to so many influential people in one community. And by reason of this he occupied for a long time a position which was altogether unique among our people. More than once he has been the trusted arbiter in difficulties which threatened the peace of families. Time and again his kind offices were invoked to heal estrangements among friends. He was ever the peacemaker, whose judgment was sought and whose counsel was followed, and it was commonly recognized that no other man in the community wielded the same personal influence which was conceded to Dr. Steiner. Dr. Steiner had a strange aversion to holding any public office. It was with difficulty he was ever persuaded to accept an office of any kind. Whenever he was so persuaded it was only to discharge what he considered some special and commanding public duty, and then only for a short time. He was a member of the State Medical association of Georgia and might have been its president but for his own refusal to serve. For two years he was a member of the board of health, and during that time he gave to the board the benefit of his rare skill in medicine, his large experience in sanitary measures, his wide information upon all matters relating to the public health, and the characteristic energy with which he did everything that he undertook.

"When several years ago a commission was appointed to formulate a new charter for the city of Augusta, Dr. Steiner's name at once suggested itself as one which would command the confidence of the entire community and he was unanimously chosen. When again in 1886 a vacancy occurred on the board of education, Dr. Steiner was unanimously elected to fill the vacant place, and consented to serve. His advice was constantly sought by the board as to the different departments of the public schools and especially in reference to the best methods to be employed in order to preserve the health of the children. Even after he became too ill to leave his house, he was induced to remain upon the board in order that the members, and especially the president, might have the benefit of his counsel when needed.

"In all religious and charitable matters, he was always willing to bear his measure of responsibility, and, if necessary, to take a leading part. When Gov. Jenkins died he was elected in 1885 senior warden of St. Paul's church. He has often said that this was the only office which he had ever been glad to hold. In that position his untiring energy and his blameless life have represented and illustrated the Episcopal church in Augusta. He was a man of strong convictions and outspoken in his defense of them. No one ever had a doubt as to where Dr. Steiner stood. People knew that he was an Episcopalian, and that he could give a reason, which was not a sentiment, for the faith which was in him; yet he had withal so broad a charity that his convictions never antagonized anyone. He was never separated in sympathy from those with whom he differed. The Sister of Mercy, the Roman Catholic priests, distinguished ministers in the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches—indeed, Christians of every name—found in Dr. Steiner a true and loyal friend. In April, 1874, he was elected a member of the board of trustees of the Augusta Orphan asylum, and he always had the deepest interest in that beneficent institution. It will be remembered also how active a part he took in founding the Industrial Home for Fallen Women. It is hardly too much to say that the home owes its existence more to Dr. Steiner than to any other one man. It will be seen, therefore, that with the possible exception of his services on the charter commission and on the board of education, Dr. Steiner held no public office that was not in the line of his profession, or in the interest of charity and religion. Officeholding was distasteful to him because his heart was bound up in his profession, for which he was so singularly gifted, both by nature and education, and yet it was impossible that a man of such striking personality and such extraordinary strength of character could restrict his influence to the limits of his own profession, even if he wished to do so. It has been said by one who is well qualified to express such an opinion, that Dr. Steiner 'was for many years the most eminent private citizen of Augusta; that there was no one whose counsel was so often sought, and whose advice was so gladly followed in matters relating to the welfare of the community, both in church and state.' His fine sense, his broad sympathies, his good judgment, his freedom from prejudice, made him always the safe counselor and valued friend."

The above outline of Dr. Steiner's life is largely extracted from a biographical sketch written of him at the time of his death by his rector, Rev. C. C. Williams. From an intimate acquaintance of twenty years with him I regarded Dr. Steiner as the best-rounded character I ever knew. It was my privilege to have known him upon terms of most intimate personal friendship. His every act seemed to have resulted from a due appreciation of responsibility to conscience and his maker. In his long and trying illness it was my privilege to visit him frequently. Full of faith in God, and perfect submission to his will, it seemed to me that he had attained as near unto Christian perfection as mortal could reach. Every visit I made him was a benediction to me. Having known him intimately in the practice of medicine I give it as my deliberate opinion that he was the ablest practitioner of medicine in Georgia.

FRANK A. STANFORD, M. D., Columbus, Ga. Dr. Stanford died in 1885, aged sixty years. I have been unable to obtain data as to his early youth and much of his life which are necessary to write a full memoir of him. He graduated M. D. from the university of New York city. (I cannot ascertain the date.) He served a term on the resident staff of the New York hospital. From a relative of his I learn that Profs. Valentine Mott and Van Buren, of New York, regarded Dr. Stanford at the time of his graduation as one of the most promising young physicians of that day. In him their prophecy was fulfilled, for he became one of the greatest of Georgia's great doctors. He was great in all departments of his profession. He was one of our most renowned general practitioners of medicine, and as a surgeon ranked second to none of Georgia's great surgeons; indeed, he was the peer of the greatest surgeons in America, and had he lived in New York would have attained a national distinction. He performed almost all of the capital operations known to surgery in his day. During the civil war he was medical director on Wheeler's cavalry corps, occupying this position until the surrender of the Confederate army, discharging the duties of his high position to the great benefit of the Confederate cause, and to the eminent satisfaction of his distinguished commander. Dr. Stanford was a remarkably handsome man. In military and civil life he was a brave, courteous, highly cultured gentleman, and commanded the respect and confidence of all who were so fortunate as to know him. He was for many years a member of the medical association of Georgia, and contributed to the volumes of the transactions of this association many of its ablest papers. Beside the above mentioned articles, he contributed much and ably to medical literature through medical journals. He was one of the most useful and highly honored members of the state board of health of Georgia, and was regarded as one of the most eminent sanitarians in America. With the exception of the period embraced in his army life, he was a resident of Columbus, Ga., and was considered the most distinguished man in that section of the state.

VALENTINE H. TALIAFERRO, M. D.* This eminent gynecologist, although born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Sept. 24, 1831, came of remote Italian ancestry, and in his personal appearance and distinguishing traits of character he displayed some of the finest qualities of that gifted race. These ancestors on coming to America first settled in the vicinity of Williamsburg, Va., where they were counted with the wealthy and respectable families of that thriving section of the "Old Dominion." Mr. Zack Taliaferro, his great-grandfather, who lived in Amherst county, was the father of that gallant and distinguished soldier of the revolutionary war, Col. Benjamin Taliaferro, who won an enviable reputation in many hard-fought battles, commanding a company under Gen. Washington during the severe campaign of 1777-78, in the Jerseys. At the battle of Princeton he forced the surrender of a company of British troops, and ragged and shoeless, as were the American soldiers in that hard struggle, he stepped forward and proudly accepted the surrendered sword of the elegantly uniformed British commander. Later on Col. Taliaferro joined the southern army, and was captured at the siege of Charleston. Returning to Virginia on parole, he resumed the peaceful occupation he had left to serve his country on the battlefield. About the year 1785 Col. Taliaferro removed to Georgia, where his brilliant reputation and sterling character soon made him one of the foremost men of his day in the state. Among other honors conferred upon him he was elected a member of congress, president of the Georgia senate, a judge of the superior court (although not a lawyer), and trustee of the state university, in all of which positions he won added reputation as a patriot and statesman. Taliaferro county, the home of the lamented Alexander H. Stephens, will perpetuate his memory far into the distant future. Col. Taliaferro's son, Warren, who located on Broad river, in Oglethorpe county, married a sister of Gov. George R. Gilmer, of this state, and their only son, Col. Charles B. Taliaferro (lately deceased at Columbus), was the honored father of the subject of this sketch. After giving his son the best educational advantages that home institutions offered, he sent him to the university of New York, located in that city, from the medical department of which he graduated in 1852. Coming back to Georgia, after practicing his profession in Palmetto, Atlanta and Columbus, he finally returned to Atlanta, where he was living when he died. His advancement in honors and reputation were steady and marked. In his early life he edited and published a medical and literary paper. In 1857 he was elected vice-president of the medical association of Georgia; in 1877 he became president of the Atlanta academy of medicine; in 1876 he was a member of the International Medical congress, held in Philadelphia; in 1859 he was elected professor of materia medica in the Oglethorpe college at Savannah, which he resigned the following year; in 1872 he was chosen professor of diseases of women and children in the Atlanta Medical college, and in 1875 was transferred to the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women, which position he filled with distinguished ability; in 1876 he was dean of the faculty, and a year later was made a trustee. In addition to this, he was the efficient secretary and executive officer of the Georgia state board of health (created in 1875) during its active existence. His last address at the opening exercises of the Atlanta Medical college was a masterpiece of oratory. Being a man of untiring energy and boundless resources, he has been able to respond to the various calls made upon him for such services. Dr. Taliaferro made many valuable contributions to medical literature, among the more noted we mention: "Medication by the Use of Uterine Tents in Diseases of the Body and Cavity of the Uterus;" "Pathological Sympathies of the Uterus;" "The Corset in its Relation to Uterine Diseases;" "New Intra-Uterine Pessaries;" "The Application of Pressure in the Treatment of Diseases of the Uterus, Ovaries and Peri-Uterine Structure;" "New Vaginal and Intra-Uterine Pessaries." In the spring of 1881 Dr. Taliaferro established a private infirmary for the treatment of diseases of women. This infirmary grew steadily until his death. When the late war commenced Dr. Taliaferro was residing in Columbus, and was one of the first to respond to the call for volunteers. As a private in the City Light Guards of Columbus he was brought into the Second Georgia battalion (commanded by Col. Thomas Hardeman, of Macon), and was elected surgeon. Owing to his inheriting a liberal share of the military spirit of his ancestors, Surgeon Taliaferro soon yearned for a more active position, and resigning from the battalion he organized and became colonel of the Tenth Georgia cavalry, which he commanded with rare courage and skill, leaving the army at the close of the war with the brevet rank of brigadier-general. It was this active service that gave Dr. Taliaferro his fine military bearing and trained him to quick movements and prompt results. There were few handsomer or more chivalrous soldiers in the Confederate army, and since the war he ever held in kind remembrance the gallant men of that bloody period. His memorial address at the graves of the dead of the City Light Guards, delivered a few years ago at Columbus, was an eloquent and beautiful tribute to the "lost cause" and its "fallen braves." His practice was large and lucrative. A more perfect gentleman in feeling, manner, thought and action never lived. He was a gentleman by birth, instinct and education. He was an invalid for several years before his death, but continued up to the last actively at work. I prevailed on him to take a much needed rest, and he concluded to go to Tate Springs. For several days before he left he was confined to his bed, and I found him weak and haggard on the morning of his departure, but he had actually in active preparation all the arrangements to operate on a charity patient. His assistant and I prevailed on him not to attempt the operation. He left for Tate Springs that morning, but carried her and several other patients with him. I am told that just prior to his death he operated. His disease was albuminaria, accompanied by valvular heart trouble. He literally died in the harness. The description by the poet of Abou Ben Adhem applies with peculiar grace to our dead brother:

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight of his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" asked Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerly still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light
And showed the names whom love of God had blest
And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

JAMES GRAY THOMAS, M. D.,* was born near Bloomfield, Ky., June 24, 1835. He began his medical studies in the university of Louisville, Louisville, Ky. He graduated in medicine from the university of the city of New York in 1856, and began his life work in Bloomfield, the place of his birth and early home. He subsequently settled near Sardis, Miss., where he was in general practice when the late war broke out. He entered the Confederate service as a surgeon and continued in that capacity till the war closed. He married in Savannah, Nov. 16, 1865, and made that city the place of his residence. He served in the legislature of Georgia through the sessions of 1875 and 1876. This apparent divergence from the line of his chosen vocation was made by him in obedience to a sense of public duty, and in compliance with the urgent solicitation of eminent citizens who desired to return to the legislature a judicious and public-spirited medical man who would lead in procuring the enactment of laws relating to the interest of hygiene in the state. In accepting such public trusts he was especially moved by the hope that he might help to obtain for the state an effective health board. During the session of 1875, the first of his service, the legislature passed an act to create a state board of health for the protection of life and health, and to prevent the spread of diseases in the state of Georgia, and for other purposes. He took a most important part in the preparation and passage of this measure. The board thus created consisted of nine physicians, together with the comptroller-general and attorney-general and state geologist, and it chose Dr. Thomas as its first president, his name appearing as such in its printed reports for the years 1875 and 1876. He was diligent in his attention to the work of the board, and endeavored faithfully to make its ministration effective for the good of the commonwealth. For the first time in the history of the state, physicians were recognized as an active and working element in its government. Systematic efforts were made throughout the state to increase the number of those who would favor sanitary reform, to establish a correct method of obtaining and using vital statistics, to organize local boards of health, to define the power of each board, and to defend the people on the coast line and over avenues of traffic with the interior against the invasion of pestilence from abroad, and to teach them to recognize and fight against preventable disease within their own borders. A due supervision of all the public charities of the state was also to be provided for. In fact, a great movement was started which was intended to secure for the state the inestimable blessing of a good body of health laws, wisely administered. In all this admirable work Dr. Thomas was justly prominent, and had he and his associates been sufficiently sustained by legislative grants and appreciative public opinion, greater results would have been immediately realized. The good he did in turning away from the cherished and most congenial occupations of private practice to serve in public life will link his name as that of a benefactor with the sanitary history of his state and with the annals of state medicine throughout our entire land. In 1877 an act was passed by the Georgia legislature to provide for the drainage of Chatham county, so as to protect the state from epidemics of yellow fever and other diseases, and to appropriate for said purposes one-third of the state tax of said county for the year 1877, and appointing five commissioners to carry the law into effect. On the organization of the commissioners, March 7, 1877, Dr. Thomas was elected chairman. He took an active and zealous part in the work of the commission and was its chairman at the time of his death. The work done by the commission has been effective in promoting the public health, and material prosperity of the chief commercial ocean gateway of the state. In the winter of 1881 Dr. Thomas had strongly urged the importance of organizing, in Savannah, a citizens' sanitary association, looking to the improvement of the public health through the united efforts of private citizens, and as auxiliary to established public methods of sanitation. The result was a public meeting held in the "long room" of the Exchange, Dec. 14, 1881, largely attended by leading citizens of Savannah. By special invitation, the meeting was addressed by Dr. Thomas. His views were so warmly adopted that the organization of the proposed association was immediately authorized, and carried into effect Feb. 10, 1882. On this occasion he was elected president of the association, which began with an enrollment of 259 members, subsequently largely increased. Dr. Thomas continued in this office to the time of his death. Thus while the doctor was assiduous in the private practice of his calling, and never neglectful of his solemn obligations, he was always concerned about the welfare of the public, and ready in suggesting judicious plans to enlist public-spirited citizens in measures for the general health. He was rarely absent from his work, and only for brief periods of rest, when those for whose health he felt a deep sense of responsibility were least liable to be exposed to epidemic influences. He was an esteemed member of the American Public Health association, and no one who had the privilege of attending the session of that body in Savannah will forget how much the success of the meeting turned on his unostentatious but effective service, and how freely and courteously the hospitalities of his delightful home were dispensed. His interest in the national board of health was early, consistent and continuous, and he did what he could to advocate the doctrine of the necessity of the establishment and maintenance of that body as the most ready, effective agency through which to give the entire country the benefit of adequate sanitary supervision and police, to lessen the ravages of indigenous, preventable diseases, and to prevent the introduction on the coast line of such as threatened to invade the country from without. He was ever willing to do the work that pressed upon him to be done, and to turn aside even from the most congenial occupations of home life and the routine of his daily practice, if only the claim was addressed to his keen sense of public duty. He was not only a physician, he was also a patriot. It was in obedience to such motives that he left Savannah at the close of November last, although not feeling well, to attend a meeting in the city of Washington to complete the arrangements for the International Medical congress, to be held in that city in the year 1887. He was taken ill on the railway train near Richmond, but continued on to his destination. After reaching Washington his malady took the form of pneumonia. His wife was sent for; his sympathetic medical brethren aided her in her affectionate and devoted ministrations. At one time the disease seemed to be checked, but the arrest was only simulated; he grew weaker and on the morning of Saturday, Dec. 6, 1884, departed this life, following, as we have creditable evidence, those who had endeavored to imitate the Good Physician. Even this brief narrative of the life of an exalted member of the medical profession would be very incomplete if we did not record one or two more allusions to the quality of the work that he did day by day for the patients who leaned upon him for sympathy and treatment. He was always on the alert to learn anything which might be for the advancement of his science and art. He was ready to seize a new idea, to develop and utilize it. He was studious and meditative in the line of his calling, notwithstanding the activity of his life, and succeeded in finding time to keep up with the advance in medical literature. It is to be regretted that he did not write more. His paper on "Dengue" in the sixth volume of the Transactions of the American Public Health Association is an admirable contribution to the discussion of that obscure and distressing malady. His opinions, oral or written, on medical questions of the day, were always marked by freedom from passion, and by a plain intention to avoid on the one hand the bondage of prejudice, and on the other hasty deduction and restless change. While he was alive to every good impression and suggestion of progress, he was deliberate and judicial in committing himself to that which was new. His honesty and prudence was manifested in these and many other ways, and his patients and professional brethren trusted him implicitly, and were not disappointed. His personal appearance was most attractive and commanding. Tall in stature, he was erect and vigorous in his carriage, impressing even casual observers with the fact that he was a man of more than ordinary force. He carried a good head above broad shoulders; his face was "benignant and serious" and on his manly features a light was radiant which came from a good heart. There was an indescribable quality in his presence and manners which won the confidence of all, but especially impressed and charmed his friends and companions. It is a source of joy and inexpressible satisfaction that there are so many good and true men in the medical profession of the United States. The whole fraternity may well join in thankfulness that the career of Dr. Thomas among his colleagues, neighbors and friends, was blessed as it was to his family, his patients, and the state; that he attempted with so much modesty and unflinching purpose to realize in his daily work and in his public service so high an ideal, and that his last professional act, in the performance of which he gave his life, included the grand idea of the brotherhood of nations and the community of science and benevolence. From those who knew him well the source of the power in his life was not hidden; it sprang perpetually from an humble belief, not only in the supernatural, but in a personal, triune God, upon whose mercy he had cast himself, and whose law he strove to know, to love and to obey.

W. F. WESTMORELAND, M. D., was born in Fayette county, Ga., Jan. 1, 1828; died in Atlanta, Ga., 1890. His father, Robert Westmoreland, was a planter of Fayette county. The Westmorelands of the United States have descended from three brothers, who, prior to the war for American independence, came to this country from England and settled respectively in the states of Pennsylvania, Virginia and North Carolina. The character of this family may be inferred from the fact that a county in each of these states bears their name. The subject of this sketch is a descendant of the North Carolina branch of the family. Having received primary instruction in a neighborhood school of his native county, his education was completed at a high school at Griffin, Ga. He began the study of medicine in 1848, and took his first course of lectures in the medical college of Georgia in the session of 1848-9. His second course was taken at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, Penn., from which college he graduated in 1850. Returning to Georgia he commenced the practice of medicine in Fayette county, but in July, 1851, moved to Atlanta, where he prosecuted a successful and profitable practice until the fall of 1852. At this period he placed himself under the special instruction of Dr. Paul F. Eve, then professor of surgery in the medical department in the university at Nashville, Tenn. There he remained for eight months, enjoying excellent opportunities for acquiring knowledge in this branch of his profession. His tastes led him to surgery, and in order to further perfect himself in this branch he went to Paris in the winter of 1852. He attended upon the lectures of Valpeau, Nelaton, Rioux, Ricord and other eminent men of the profession, and applied himself assiduously to the details of that branch of medical science. He remained in Paris for about two years, enjoying the instruction of the most distinguished professors of Europe and opportunities for acquiring practical knowledge of surgery which were unsurpassed on the continent. Appreciating these advantages, they were improved by him to the utmost. In 1854, while he was in Paris, he was chosen professor of surgery in the Atlanta medical college. He accepted the appointment, and returning home entered promptly and earnestly upon the duties of the position. In 1855-6 he delivered a course of lectures upon surgery in the Atlanta medical college, which demonstrated his thorough knowledge of this branch of the profession, establishing at the same time a reputation for a great skill as a surgeon by the successful performance of many delicate and difficult operations. In 1855 he founded the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal," and assumed the position of editor. Until the year 1877 he continued his connection with the "Journal," either in the relation of editor or proprietor. Although he had acquired an enviable distinction as a surgeon, he aspired to higher attainments and still greater skill. To gratify this laudable ambition he again sailed for Europe in September, 1856. As on his previous visit, he located in the French metropolis, and attended the lectures of the most eminent physicians and surgeons of that country. In addition to his attendance upon the lectures of these distinguished professors, he became a private pupil of Dumas, the celebrated oculist; Robin, the microscopist, and Verneille, surgical pathologist, embracing in the scope of his studies and special instruction everything auxiliary to a complete knowledge of surgery. In 1857, he returned to Georgia, bringing with him as trophies of his assiduous studies, certificates of proficiency from the learned professors mentioned. Locating in Atlanta, he entered at once upon the practice of surgery, his renown as a surgeon constantly growing until his fame extended over the entire country. The war of the states came on, and relinquishing a large and lucrative practice, he tendered his services to his native section. These were promptly and cordially accepted. As surgeon in the field, his knowledge and skill proved invaluable to the southern army. Faithful, efficient and patriotic, he enjoyed the fullest confidence and esteem of those in power and command, while many a hero who bled for the southern cause realized his skillful and kindly ministrations on the field of conflict. Wherever ordered he went with alacrity, considering only the will of his country. Devoted to the cause of the southern Confederacy, he followed her fortunes with pride and hope until the last day of conflict, when, at Appomattox, her flag was furled forever and the cause for which her heroes had battled was lost. Turning sadly homeward, in sympathy with the people of the south, he in due time arrived in Atlanta, desolated by the merciless invader, and resumed the practice of his profession. Although thorough in every branch of medical science, and eminent as a general practitioner of medicine, he particularly devoted himself to the practice of surgery. His success in this branch of the profession was eminent, and made him a reputation that extends to every state of the republic, classing with the comparatively small number of our race who have fully achieved the purposes of their ambition. He was a prominent figure in any gathering of his profession. In the medical society of his city he was president of the Atlanta academy of medicine, was a member of the medical association of Georgia, and elected its president in 1873. He was a prominent member of the American Medical association and frequently attended its sessions. Dr. Westmoreland was one of the most renowned medical teachers in America. For thirty-eight years he was professor of principles and practice of surgery in the Atlanta medical college. His fame as a teacher added greatly to the prestige of the school. He contributed many valuable papers to the literature of his profession. His writings marked him as a physician and surgeon of profound acumen. His writings were of that high order which must cause him to live in the records of scientific medicine. Dr. Westmoreland was one of nature's noblemen. He was the friend of humanity. Though dead he yet lives; lives in the hearts of a grateful people, to whom he so skillfully and unselfishly devoted his life; lives in the hearts of his professional brethren, who loved him for his manly, chivalrous nature, his loyalty to friendship, and his wonderful professional acumen.

SAMUEL G. WHITE, M. D., was born in Milledgeville, Nov. 17, 1824; died in his native city May 13, 1877, aged fifty-three years. His medical education was acquired at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, Pa., from whence he was graduated M. D. in March, 1845. That he stood high in the esteem of the faculty of this renowned school is attested by the fact that during a part of his last term he filled the position of demonstrator of anatomy in this institution. In 1846 he was appointed assistant surgeon of the United States navy, and remained in this service until the conclusion of the Mexican war. Dr. White resigned from the navy, settled in Milledgeville and practiced his profession until 1859. He then went to Europe, attending lectures and clinics abroad until the commencement of the war between the states. When the tocsin of war was sounded Dr. White promptly returned home, offered his services to the southern cause, and was commissioned surgeon of Cobb's legion of Georgia cavalry. He continued in this position during the entire period of the war. Dr. White was a chivalrous, skillful officer, and was greatly loved by the soldiers. He delighted to accompany his command in the thickest of the fight, and heroically ministered to his wounded comrades in the midst of the shot and shell of the enemy. He was one of the ablest surgeons of the army, and with great skill performed many capital operations during his four years of military service. Upon the cessation of hostilities he returned to Milledgeville worn down by honorable service to his country. In common with his people he found himself penniless through the confiscations of property visited upon the southern people by the victorious north. Nothing daunted by this misfortune, he consecrated himself anew to the relief of human suffering, and practiced his profession among the friends of his childhood home until stricken with paralysis, which terminated fatally in May, 1877. Among his people he was the beloved physician, and ministered to the sick and afflicted with skill and tenderness rarely excelled. He was an humble follower of the Great Physician, occupying the position of ruling elder in the Presbyterian church in his native city. At one time Dr. White was president of the board of medical examiners of Georgia, and filled the duties of this honorable position with the faithfulness, zeal and ability which characterized him in the discharge of every duty placed upon him.

FIRST PERIOD. GEORGIA UNDER THE TRUSTEES, 1733-1752.

THE 7th day of July, 1733, was a great day in the little hamlet of Savannah. Doubtless the sun rose as red and hot on that day as it usually does on the 7th of July upon that coast—declared afterward by a departing governor, Ellis, to be the hottest country of which he knew. Said he pathetically, "I have traversed a great part of this globe, not without giving some attention to the peculiarities of each climate, and I fairly pronounce that I never felt such heat anywhere as in Georgia." But this was before the days of remote travels, and a comparison now might give the coast of Georgia comfort. But July as it was, hot or cold, there was business to be done, and whether Gen. Oglethorpe mopped his fervid brow or critically eyed the rafters and roof of the "court house and chapel" to see if his carpenters had done him good work against a summer storm, the business of the colonial parturition had to go on. All day long there were great public acts being done—acts of a sort which made the day most memorable to the colony and its settlers—a day from which they could fairly say that the history of the town and of their property in it had commenced. The time had arrived when the colonists—some 300 strong—were to emerge from the confusion and abeyance of settlement into organization and some sort of permanency. The impecunious settlers came from their lines of board and log houses, in which they had lodged for some five months, and wended their various ways early in the morning under great pines to the little courthouse, new, stanch and unpainted, which stood where the United States custom house now stands. Oglethorpe and his confidentials came also in great state from the general's quarters on the bluff, with salutes of artillery and ringing of bells, and presided over the birth of the new colony, called together in its first meeting. It opened with prayer for divine blessing and assistance, badly enough needed in the future affairs of the infant colony about to be born. Then were named in order the various wards, tithings and streets of the town, from which time henceforth the Savannahese could tell himself where he lived. All this was duly explained by the good general to his delighted followers, with the appropriate reasons for the various names given, few of which reasons have survived to the incurious citizens, although perpetuated in print. After that ensued the allotment of land, in which the settlers were more personally interested—each male inhabitant, so benefited, presumably being the head of a family, existing or in expectancy. These exercises occupied all morning, and the energies of the colonists were then refreshed by a fine dinner at the general's expense, washed down by plenty of English beer.

THE FIRST COURT.

But the events of the long July day were not yet over. The general, who had hitherto retained to himself as governor all legal authority in the afternoon opened the first court ever held in Georgia. Judges there were, appointed by the trustees in the previous November, but hitherto they had discharged no duty. Under the orders of Oglethorpe, Geo. Symes, Richard Hodges and Francis Scott, known as "bailiffs" of the town, took their seats as judges of the civil and criminal court, with Noble Jones as recorder (or clerk) and Richard Cannon and Joseph Coles as constables, and proceeded to try the first case in the colony, with Samuel Parker, Thos. Young, Joseph Cole, John Wright, John West, Timothy Bowling, John Milledge, Henry Close, Walter Fox, John Grady, James Carwell and Richard Cannon as the jury.

In these names we see but two, Jones and Milledge, which we recognize to-day as represented in Georgia; and another curious feature, indicative of the paucity of good jurors, is in the fact that both the constables were on the jury. All duly commissioned and sworn, and certainly fuller of good beer than of legal knowledge, the bench of Georgia undertook its duties, without a bar, in the presence of the general himself, and doubtless with great dignity, yet with many internal tremors, and the wheels of judicial inquiry commenced to move. One hundred and sixty years have passed since that court sat on the afternoon of that July day. Oglethorpe's high court sat in a little frame house on the bluff of the Savannah river, without bar or library. To-day, 300 miles away, the highest tribunal of the state sits in a splendid room of a magnificent granite building, hearing over 600 appeal cases in the year, argued by hundreds of learned counsel. They come to that room from an immense law library at the other extremity of the capitol, and the court itself is surrounded by luxurious chambers and its own judicial library. The first court administered such law as it knew for a few hundred people. The supreme court corrects the errors of the judges for twenty-three circuits, who themselves revise a host of minor judicatories, and try the legal contentions of nearly 2,000,000 of souls. Oglethorpe would have marveled indeed if he could have seen these results of his colonial venture and the growth of the court that administered law under his eyes in 1733.

THE CHARTER.

The authority of Oglethorpe to establish courts in Georgia was derived from the trustees of the colony, who in their turn received their power by charter from the crown of England. That instrument sanctioned by George II., June 9, 1732, for the purpose of creating a provisional government for the colony which Oglethorpe designed to settle, provided:

"That for and during the term of twenty-one years, to commence from the date of these our letters patent, the said corporation assembled for that purpose, shall and may form and prepare laws, statutes and ordinances, fit and necessary for and concerning the government of the said colony, and not repugnant to the laws and statutes of England, and the same shall and may present, under their common seal, to us, our heirs and successors, in our or their privy council, for our or their approbation or disallowance; and the said laws, statutes and ordinances being approved of by us, our heirs and successors, in our or their privy council, shall from thenceforth be in full force and virtue within our said province of Georgia."

It further provided:

"And we do, of our further grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, grant, establish and ordain, for us, our heirs and successors, that the said corporation and their successors, shall have full power and authority for and during the term of twenty-one years, to commence from the date of these our letters patent, to erect and constitute judicatories and courts of record, or other courts, to be held in the name of us, our heirs and successors, for the hearing and determining of all manner of crimes, offences, pleas, processes, complaints, actions, matters, causes and things whatsoever, arising or happening within the said province of Georgia or between persons of Georgia; whether the same be criminal or civil, and whether the said crimes be capital or not capital, and whether the said pleas be real, personal or mixed, and for awarding and making out executions thereupon; to which courts and judicatories, we do hereby, for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant full power and authority, from time to time, to administer oaths for the discovery of truth, in any matter in controversy or depending before them, or the solemn affirmation to any of the persons commonly called Quakers, in such manner as by the laws of our realm of Great Britain the same may be administered."

BAD APPOINTMENTS.

It is obvious to us that the great body of local laws enacted by the trustees for the government of the colony before any fair test of its difficulties had been made, and perhaps all appointments of persons named in advance for the administration of those laws, must, in the very nature of things, have been largely theoretical. Some experience indeed had been drawn from the history of other colonies, but in each of the colonies of the United States the organization was so much independent of others and made by different classes of people for diverse purposes, and under various circumstances, that it was practically impossible to do more than theorize concerning the new colony about to be established in the exercise of purely benevolent designs. We need not, therefore, be surprised to find grave mistakes made by the trustees both in the enactment of laws and in the selection of officials. Nowhere was this more visible than in the appointment of judicial officers. The trustees, in pursuance of the power invested in them, arranged for the establishment of a court in Georgia, for the trial of causes both civil and criminal, to be called the "town court"; for the appointment of magistrates; three bailiffs, a recorder, two constables, and two tithing men. Doubtless as usual, most of these appointments were made by favor; such is the habit now, and even more was it the habit then. The court was empowered to take jurisdiction of "all manner of crimes, pleas, offenses, processes, complaints, actions, matters, causes and things whatsoever arising or happening within the province of Georgia, or between persons inhabiting or residing there, whether the same be criminal or civil, and whether the said crimes be capital or not capital, and whether the said pleas be real or personal or mixed; to be tried according to the laws and customs of the realm of England, and of the laws enacted for the said province." The three bailiffs were to be the judges, the recorder acting as clerk, and freeholders only were admitted as jurors. The names of the first bench of bailiffs have already been given, they having received their commissions a few days before the departure of the first vessel. We do not know of any who conferred great honor upon the bench. They must have been men of some sort of significance to have received their appointments before the colonists left England, but in no other way can their fitness be inferred.

BAILIFFS.

Some criticism has been expended upon their official titles, by which they became judges of the new court, and it has been thought that there was a mistake in conferring the large powers invested in them upon that court, because the judges were called "bailiffs." The objection, however, seems to be hypercritical. The name itself, it is true, had been applied in Europe to a very different sort of judicial officer, but it would seem to be a matter of no importance whatsoever whether the new judges were called bailiffs, justices, or barons, if they had been proper men. Their power was enormous, including that of life and death, as well as of all property rights; but no one could foresee the future growth of the colony, and there appears a certain modesty, not unlike the character of Oglethorpe himself, in dubbing the judges of this court of his little town "bailiffs," rather than a more high sounding name, even though no other court ever held greater power.

THOMAS CAUSTON.

Of the two of the first incumbents, Symes and Scott, we have no record then or thereafter of any personal significance. They were probably men of no great mark, character or ambitions—a probability enhanced to certainty by their subsequent subjugation to a new man. Hodges died shortly after his appointment, and his place was filled, through the nomination of the trustees, by Thomas Causton as second bailiff—rapidly afterward chief bailiff, and therefore chief justice of the colony. This gentleman lacked neither vigor nor ambition; to which positive qualities he added an absence of all scruples that might possibly deter his control, with the sea between him and the governor. One would have supposed his judicial authority, untrammelled by governor or any appellate annoyances, large enough for the accomplishment of most selfish designs; but those advantages were also enlarged for Causton by the position of keeper of the public stores, which he also held. For several years the new colony was much dependent upon the charity that established it for the support of her poor, as well as for the supplies for which her prosperous had ready money. Pauperism springs as often from laziness as from misfortune; and it would be a violent presumption to suppose that the main body of Oglethorpe's people were industrious. Dependent, therefore, as they were—through indolence or bad luck—upon the public stores for charity or for purchases, and passing through the unavoidable mishaps of a new enterprise, it was Bailiff Causton's good fortune in the active pursuit of his prosperity that he governed the colony not only by adjudicating their lives and property, but by cutting off the rations of his enemies, if they showed too stout a resistance—a lethal weapon which no other chief officer of the state, good or bad, has ever since been able to call to his assistance. It is small wonder that under these terrors, all other officials and most of the people yielded; so that in a very short time the chief bailiff was quite the dictator of the colony, and indulged his fancy for arbitrary proceedings and judicial splendor to his heart's content—certainly to the utmost of the poor resources of the colony.

CAUSTON TRIUMPHANT.

This was not gained without opposition. There are always people who believe that the right will win, and because it is the right. Sanguine persons of the colony of this sort there were, who had not the fear of the court or bodily hunger before their eyes, and they attempted a tilt with Causton. They petitioned the trustees at length, setting forth the iniquities of the chief bailiff, and asked that he should be deposed. Probably the trustees had also received private information from some personal friend of a trustee; or perhaps from their secretary in Georgia, Col. Stephens—afterward president of the colony—for they believed the complaint, removed Causton, and sent out Mr. Gordon as chief bailiff. But the astute Causton was a man of far too much resource for the trustees, in one encounter, with so many miles of water between him and them. He had not been removed as keeper of the public stores; and in that capacity he refused to sell to his successor, Gordon, and starved him out. Gordon's stomach seems to have checked his ambition, for in six weeks he left for England; whereon Causton—we may suppose with a sardonic smile—re-took his seat upon the bench, and commenced administering strict justice, with an eye especially turned toward the sins of the late petitioners against him. Among the latter was one Capt. Joseph Watson of the Georgia militia, against whom Causton procured an indictment for perverting the minds of the Indians against the colony. On this trial the judge added to his judicial duties by acting as witness and prosecuting official; but was surprised to find his carefully selected jury inclined to defeat his view of justice by returning a verdict substantially of "not guilty." The chief bailiff ordered them back to find a different verdict. They filed in again without change of mind; again he sent them out with a menacing charge requiring them to find Watson "guilty and a lunatic," and to "recommend him to the mercy of the court." The jury found him "guilty of lunacy," in which verdict, considering the previous petition against Causton and the helplessness of the colonists, there may have been some logic. Causton's justice asserted itself by three years' confinement of Watson in jail, without formal sentence.

JOHN WESLEY'S LOVE AFFAIR.

The most notorious work of Causton's judicial life was his persecution of John Wesley. The latter arrived in Georgia full of missionary purposes in 1736, and while there lost his heart to a young lady named Sophia Hopkins, a niece of Causton's. Of this young lady we have varying accounts. Bishop Stevens, desirous of the exoneration of his clerical brother, says that Wesley had "allowed his affections to become ensnared by the artifices of a lady who possessed many attractions of mind and body, but whose moral character seemed to lack that modesty and integrity, the absence of which makes even beauty deceitful and favor vain," and describes her as having "studied graces and apparent piety." On the other hand, Jones speaks in glowing phrases—drawn from what source of information or inspiration not appearing—of the "charming and coquettish young lady," with none of the defects of character so plainly spoken by the other writers.

WESLEY IN FLIGHT.

But whether she was frivolous or only coquettish, the devout Wesley was hopelessly in love, and remained so until warned by other spiritual guides of the danger to his soul. Upon the appearance of his trouble of mind the young lady broke off her engagement, and eight days afterward consoled herself and punished her victim by marrying a gentleman of Savannah. Whatever was Wesley's share in the affair, it aroused Causton's ire, and thereupon followed "trumped-up" proceedings against the apostle, to which was bent all the energy of the bench; and the civil power so far prevailed against the spiritual that Wesley, wearied and wholly unable to obtain a trial, left for Charleston by boat, "upon the serving of the tide" with the intent to avoid the giving of bail, and, for all future time, the well-known justice of Causton. About five miles from Savannah the waters find a small outlet to sea by a sinuous channel, which winds its way southwardly through marshes and by high bluffs until it becomes the splendid river of Wassaw. Upon one of those bluffs Causton had built himself a fine mansion, embowered in cedars and noble live oaks, whose long branches and mosses still sweep down to the ground. Riding or driving home from the business of the day, the chief bailiff would seat himself on his cool verandah, and surrounded by his happy family, and looking over the prospect of green marsh and shining river toward the shores of Wilmington and White Marsh islands, his heart would expand with joy as he thought of the way in which he had fortified his position, and of the enemies whom he had punished. He had almost reached the summit of his hopes, and doubtless looked forward to a peaceful and wealthy old age—possibly as the absolute master of an independent province.

CAUSTON'S FALL.

But while he could fairly count upon the indolence of trustees in regard to the mental distress of his fellowmen, he had failed to take into consideration the effect upon them of the financial side of his business. While thus triumphant and prosperous, in all the peace of a good man, the vouchers and accounts forwarded to England by him, as keeper of the stores, alarmed the trustees much more than his judicial methods, and they again sent orders for his removal and the appointment of Mr. Henry Parker in his place. Fortunately for them, in this their second essay of strength with the resourceful chief bailiff, Oglethorpe was then in America, and in Frederica, observing the Spaniards. He received his orders before his return to Savannah—Causton not to be sent to England, but to be held in custody or under bond. Upon Oglethorpe's arrival at Savannah he was met in state by the magistrates—Causton at the head—with due welcome. The latter was soon informed by Oglethorpe of the charges against him, which he resented with vigor, but on Oct. 8, 1738, was removed from office, held under his own bond, with property security, and notified to account. Failing to do this in any proper manner, he was ordered to London, where he went before the common council of the trustees. This proceeding producing no satisfactory results, he was permitted to embark for Georgia, where he promised to produce the vouchers needed to balance his accounts, but died at sea, doubtless to the great relief of the Savannah colonists, who had good reason to fear the final outcome of a struggle between his astuteness and the distant trustees.

HENRY PARKER.

When the trustees sent out orders for the removal of Causton we saw them appointing Mr. Henry Parker in his place—an appointment not carried then into effect. No reason appears for his failure to take his seat, which was instead filled by Col. William Stephens. Most likely Oglethorpe did it out of his own wise judgment. But as to the man Parker, what was the truth? We have his character sketched by Tyerman, the biographer and devoted admirer of John Wesley. Parker was so unlucky as to have been of the court before which Wesley had been summoned after his love worries. Enough and more than enough for Tyerman. Parker, says he, was a carpenter, and could not read or write. Parker was a drunken rascal, “an absolute slave to liquor.” But bad for Tyerman, the biographer, that self same Parker, in a colony wherein were Noble Jones and James Habersham and Jonathan Bryan, was shortly afterward made vice-president of the colony under the aristocrat, Stephens, and president at his death. As we have said, Causton’s vacant seat was filled by Col. William Stephens, of memory as happy as Causton’s is bad.

BAILIFFS QUARRELSOME.

He had been the secretary of the trustees in Georgia, and of him all good things can be said. His associates must have troubled him greatly, in the language of our writer, for they were “inefficient, quarrelsome and disposed to make the interests of the public subserve their private aims.” The inefficiency of the Savannah bench seems to have impressed the trustees, for, with a desire to procure for them a respect, which neither their conduct nor ability had inspired, the trustees sent them over splendid judicial robes; those of the bailiffs being purple, edged with fur, and the recorder’s being black, tufted. The bailiffs, however, had become so much at variance with each other that even in such a simple matter as gowns they could not agree; and it was three months before they could so far settle between themselves their contentions over their robes as to wear them on the bench. But when they finally composed their difficulties on that subject, and sat in their gowns, the genius of this stroke of the trustees became manifest in the order and decorum of the court, “such as had not been seen in a great while.” Whether this pleasant effect was produced upon the members of the bench or the people, the chroniclers do not state.

FREDERICA’S COURT.

But fortunately the town court of the three bailiffs, with its inefficiency and malpractice, was destined to be of but short life. In February, 1736, Frederica had been settled by Oglethorpe and established with municipal and judicial service, precisely as had been Savannah. The life of its court was so short and its course so bad that labor upon its history is worth nothing to anyone. Enough to say that they quarreled and mis-governed with all their vigor for five years. Some bailiffs could not even write. That might have been borne with comfort if they had understood what justice meant. So they went on their way of brief authority, misusing all things under them and abusing all people around them until the whole system of town courts in both jurisdictions, filled by such appointments as has been named under it, wearied the trustees and brought them to break it up. To us it seems that the system was not so wrong as were the persons appointed under it. Practically there was no great difference in the new plan adopted for both jurisdictions in 1741. Instead of town courts and a present governor the trustees on April 15 divided the whole colony into two counties, one to be Savannah, including all the country north of Darien, and the other Frederica. Over each there was to be a president and four assistants, who managed the civil and judicial jurisdiction of the two counties. William Stephens was made president of the county of Savannah, with Henry Parker, Thomas Jones, John Fallowfield and Samuel Mercer (or Marcer), assistants. No appointments were made for Frederica at this time, the council waiting for Oglethorpe and his information.

NEW COURTS.

As to the new judicature it will be noticed that the chief change was made by putting the civil power into judicial hands, rather than reserving that to a civil person or body. (Happy and richer, indeed, would Causton have been if this good fortune had happened to him.) The increase of two judges, called assistants, made no difference in principle. After all, if better things came from the new order—and much better things did come—they came partly from the weight of the trustees' hands, felt from across the ocean, in wiping out the old jurisdictions, and making new; a result easily seen by the colonists, and very instructive of the measure of power that did somewhere exist, if slow to act; and partly from the increased authority given to the upright Stephens, who from chief bailiff of a court, thus became president of the whole colony of Savannah, with power of vice-governor, Oglethorpe retaining civil and military control as of old.

WILLIAM STEPHENS.

It is pleasant to report that Col. Stephens was entitled to and received the respect and obedience of all persons, to which he was entitled by rank, birth and character. He was the son of Sir Wm. Stephens, lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Wight, and was for twenty-six years an honored member of parliament; and in 1743, when the two counties of Savannah and Frederica became united, he became president of the whole colony. He was then seventy years of age. Notwithstanding the drawback of age, however, he continued to administer the duties of his office until 1751, when, being made aware by his reluctant assistants of their embarrassments growing out of his age and infirmities, he resigned and was succeeded by Henry Parker, the vice-president, and died at Bewby, near Savannah. Of the other assistants appointed at the same time with Stephens, it is noticeable—as is also true of Stephens—that Parker and Mercer are the only persons who came over first with Oglethorpe. The others seem to have been more recent arrivals, or were selected and sent over from England with a special eye to their fitness.

CONSOLIDATION OF COURTS.

The information received by the trustees, upon Oglethorpe's return to Europe, as to the rivalries and jealousies between the two governments and judicatories of Savannah and Frederica, and the difficulties to be expected out of two independent boards, determined the trustees to unite them under one central authority; and in May, 1743, they revoked their former orders, and consolidated the two counties under the jurisdiction of the president and assistants of Savannah, as such of the whole colony, the bailiffs of Frederica remaining a local and subordinate court.

JUDICIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Fixed terms of court four times a year were to be held by the general court at Savannah. Besides the local court at Frederica, bailiffs were created at various remote points, with power to try what was termed "petit causes," and to commit offenders to await trial by the general court at Savannah in such cases as exceeded the very limited jurisdiction of the local bailiffs. We thus find affairs differing very slightly from what they were during the time of the bailiffs. Savannah, the chief point and place for holding the general court and president and assistants, instead of bailiffs—but bailiffs exercising the real functions of bailiffs, properly so called, at any place or point where a justice of the peace might be needed. No writs of error or appeal, and no higher appellate court, the president of the court also vice-governor of the colony.

NO LAWYERS ALLOWED.

As yet we have no bar, attorneys specially warned off, and not allowed to practice or plead before the general court, or any other court in the colony. Why they were excluded it is difficult to say. Not by the act of the colonists, from whom objections to attorneys might naturally be expected, as many of them had sad recollections of that sort; but the exclusion came from the trustees. To have originated with them out of sympathy with the unfortunate debtors would have indicated a degree of delicacy hardly to be expected from those times. But excluded lawyers were, and not permitted at all until the new jurisdictions were established by the crown, after the surrender of the charter.

SUNDRY CHANGES.

Under these provisions the colony lived prosperously enough, so far as the administration of justice was concerned, and without event worthy of record here, until the surrender of its charter. In the meantime, we note several changes in the bench, besides the accession of Stephens as president. Parker died a year after his appointment and was succeeded as president by Patrick Graham, of whom there is nothing notable, except that he was not only of sufficient importance then to be president, but afterward a member of the colonial council, until he disappears out of colonial records. Samuel Mercer (or Marcer) misbehaved in some way—facts not stated, except that "he had proved faithless to his trust."

JAMES HABERSHAM.

His place was taken by James Habersham, the merchant-partner in the house of Harris & Habersham, the oldest firm in Georgia, and he himself the ancestor of a line of gentlemen, easily among the best, if not the best, in the history of the colony and state. Of him as assistant justice of the colony there is little to be noted. His fine qualities do not appear in records or in books until after the new government was in, and the troubled time of Gov. Wright had come upon the colony. Then he shows himself a man of note—full of strength, firmness and dignity. Not carried away from his post of duty as vice-governor by affiliations of friendship or blood, but loyal to the crown, and stanch to his position until he died. But we are now thinking of him as a member of the general court, in which respect there is nothing to be said.

MORE CHANGES.

Col. Noble Jones, an intimate friend of Oglethorpe's, and the holder of various offices of trust in the colony, was made assistant justice in the place of Parker, promoted, and Pickering Robinson and Francis Harris in the place of Thomas Jones and John Fallowfield. Of these men but one name need be remembered, and that name affords a curious illustration of the very doubtful nature of the colonists' resistance to royal authority. The two members of the bench whose names have come down to us without loss of character to the present time are Jones and Habersham. Both men of the highest character—honorable, patriotic, thoughtful and considerate—yet when the war comes on we find them and their sons on different sides; the fathers standing by the crown with tenacious loyalty—the sons as vigorous in aggression against it. Such things we may notice hastily as we record the bench of the trustees, but of things judicial there is nothing to be remembered. The most and best that can be said is that from the time that Stephens became president until the surrender of the charter justice was so efficiently and quietly administered that it made no noise, and we have no echoes.

SECOND PERIOD. GEORGIA UNDER THE CROWN, 1752-1777.

THE CROWN JUDICIARY.

We now come to the surrender of the charter by the trustees, which occurred June 23, 1752, a few days prior to its legal expiration. From that time, until the arrival in Georgia of Gov. Reynolds to put into effect the formal establishment of the new courts by the privy council, the judges then holding office were by proclamation retained, and continued to discharge their judicial duties even after Gov. Reynolds arrived, and until the attorney-general came over and set judicial matters in order. In the summer of 1754 the crown granted the order of the lords commissioners of trades and plantations creating a permanent plan of government for the province. By this plan it was provided that there should be a court of record, to be known as the general court, to be held four times a year on the second Tuesday in June, April, July and October, and to have the same jurisdiction in the province that the courts of the king's bench common, pleas, and exchequer exercised in England. This court was to transact civil business only, all criminal business being tried by a court of session of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery, to be held twice a year by the same judges who presided in the general court. Two grand juries were provided, but this was found insufficient, considering the heat of the country, and the misery of jail confinement; and afterward there were four. The general court was located at Savannah, the presiding judge was to be called the "chief justice of Georgia," and to be appointed by the crown; and had this advantage over the ancient bailiff, that he must be a barrister-at-law, who had attended at Westminster. To him was appointed a salary of five hundred pounds sterling, comparatively a very much larger salary than that now enjoyed by his present successors in the granite capitol building. With him were three assistant justices, who were appointed by the governor, and had only honor for their reward, getting no pay except on the death or absence of the chief justice.

It will be seen, however, that the salary of the chief justice was considerably more than five hundred pounds, as he also received perquisites and fees. Gov. Wright estimated the entire income of the chief justice in 1773 at £1,020—comparatively more than is now paid the whole bench of the Georgia supreme court. The powers of a chancellor were vested in the governor, to whom also was committed the jurisdiction of the ordinary in the probate of wills and in the administration of estates. A court of errors, consisting of the governor and colonial council, heard all appeals from the lower courts. No appeal lay unless the judgment exceeded £300; but if it was more than £500, a further appeal could be prosecuted to his Britannic majesty in council. A court of vice-admiralty, with a justice appointed by the crown, had jurisdiction of maritime causes.

COURT OF VICE-ADMIRALTY.

This court was of much greater importance in those days than in more modern times even, as wars with France and acts of piracy were constantly on hand and furnished material for its work. An appeal lay to the high court of admiralty in England. Gov. Reynolds presided temporarily as vice-admiral and judge of the admiralty court. Jas. Edw. Powell was its judge advocate; Wm. Clifton, advocate general; Alexander Kellet, marshal, and Wm. Spencer, register. Justices' courts were provided for minor causes, appeals being permitted where the debt or damage claimed was forty shilling sterling.

ROYAL JUDGES.

No appointment of chief justice was immediately made, but commissions were issued on Dec. 12, 1754 to Noble Jones and Jonathan Bryan as justices of the general court, which held its first term on the first Tuesday of January, 1755.

NOBLE JONES.

We have already referred to Col. Noble Jones, the first acting chief justice of Georgia, and of him it remains only to be said that he retained his seat upon the bench in that capacity, and afterward as assistant until his death, which occurred in October, 1775, a faithful and upright judge, loyal to justice, to his manhood and to the crown. At the time of his death, Gov. Wright was a prisoner in the hands of the revolutionists.

JONATHAN BRYAN.

Jonathan Bryan shared at an early date the animosity of the Georgia whigs against England. At a public meeting of citizens in the autumn of 1769, when resolutions of non-importation of English goods were adopted, we find him presiding. This course so incensed the crown that, in December, he was removed from his seat in the council. Whether he had previously resigned his seat on the bench the records do not disclose. He afterward threw himself zealously into the revolutionary struggle, and upon the capture of Savannah by the British on Dec. 29, 1779, he was, notwithstanding his years, confined in one of the British prison ships, there to suffer the privations and misery considered in those days the proper and natural treatment of defeated rebels.

LAWYERS ALLOWED.

With the establishment of this general court we note the first appearance of lawyers before the colonial courts—probably a necessary corollary to the admitted necessity that a lawyer should preside. The chief justice, a man of Westminster, no longer content to rely upon his own views of natural justice, but desirous of hearing both sides through accustomed agencies and upon decided precedents. Who the lawyers were and how they lived and what profit they made, we know not. If we consider their fees and the value of official places, no fortunes were piled up by them:

"A retaining fee in any cause, 7s. and 1d.

"Every attendance necessary in the courts, 1s. and 5d.

"Drawing a declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, demurrer, joinder in demurrer, or other pleadings, 2s. and 10d.

"A brief in every cause, 3s. and 7d."

We have here some of the charges laid down by statute in 1773:

Pryce, the attorney-general in 1773, found his fees produced him £215. Powell, the judge of the admiralty, got out of his fees only £10 per annum. The two clerks of the crown and courts got from both offices, £613. Altogether we can fairly say that the bar may have got along respectably, but that wealth did not lie in their way. The new order of judicial things under Govs. Reynolds, Ellis, and Wright worked smoothly enough, and between the years 1754 and 1775 but three matters of any importance impeded the regular course of justice and are to be noted as disturbing elements.

WILLIAM GROVER.

If Jones and Bryan had been left upon the bench without a chief we would not have to record the disgrace of the first chief justice of the colony, Wm. Grover, who was appointed to that office on April 13, 1759. In 1762 he was suspended from office by Gov. Wright, who in a report to the board of trade and plantations, Jan. 3, 1763, gave the following reasons for his act:

"I. Although a member of council, Chief Justice Grover, without cause, absented himself from its called meetings, and failed to discharge the duties devolving upon him as one of that important body.

"II. Although a crown servant and in the receipt of a salary of £500, so far from rendering any assistance in the conduct of public affairs, he constantly manifested a disposition to oppose and thwart measures conducive to the general good.

"III. In a manner wholly unjustifiable, he sought to influence the deliberations and opinions of the general assembly.

"IV. His judicial powers were improperly exercised to the disturbance of military discipline and subordination.

"V. He was arbitrary and oppressive in the enforcement of the legal process of his court, and careless of the rights of personal liberty.

"VI. In reporting to the governor the judgments and sentences of the court of sessions he was utterly negligent.

"VII. He refused to attend a special court of oyer and terminer ordered for the trial of vagabond Spaniards who had, near Darien, murdered McKay, his wife and two negroes.

"VIII. Toward the governor his behavior was uniformly insubordinate and contumacious.

"IX. In the discharge of his official duties he was partial and not above suspicion."

The charges were fully examined and sustained by the board and Grover was removed from his office by the king in March, 1763. Of him, his life and abilities, and the date of his death we know nothing worthy of record. The most conspicuous facts are that he was chief justice, was removed, and that while he was under suspension published a libel in verse against the governor. The libel was found written on the wall of a building near the state house in Savannah, and ran thus:

"From Britain's gay island where liberty reigns,
Where Flora and Ceres enliven the plains,
Where George still with wisdom and glory defends
The blessings which nature profusely extends;
Whence comes it dear W—that again thou explores
From regions to happy American shores?
Carolina, her agent, must surely bemoan,
And each vot'ry of Hermes re-echo the groan.
Thy fortune expiring he no more can raise.
His sons shall no longer thy eloquence praise.
Is it ambition courts thee with soft soothing air,
Or power, or riches, that make thee repair
To climates so sultry?
It is not ambition alone does invite,
But power and riches both equal delight;
For what makes all doctrines most plainly appear,
It cannot be less—than a thousand a year.
When lordly I stalk a phantom of state,
Though mean my appearance, my heart is elate.
Plans of castles I dread, make speeches to F— G—
Who like—and—are my ready good tools.
A council submissive attend on my nod,
Or, if fractious they prove, I'll suspend them, by God.
Hoc voleo my motto, sic voleo my rule.
Now damn you, W—ll G—r, who says I'm a fool?"

This nonsense was thought worthy of an address from the general assembly to Gov. Wright and of a formal answer from him.

ANTHONY STOKES.

A second source of annoyance arose during the incumbency of Grover's successor, Chief Justice Anthony Stokes. This gentleman was an able lawyer and an accomplished man. He came to Savannah from England in 1760, and was made chief justice in 1763. Here at last, and for the first time, Georgia had a man who was both a jurist and honest, upon its bench. For a while no more Causton's, or natural justice, but law firmly and decently administered. But alas! for Savannah and the people and law and decency, the time quickly came when things were bad for the loyal servants of the crown, and mere fitness went for nothing. We will come presently to the administration or non-administration of law during the revolution. Suffice it to say now that Stokes stood by the government and remained in Savannah during these troubled years, doing what in him lay, until the provisional congress of the colony took charge of its courts in 1775. If any law was administered after that time and until the British went away we know not of it. But it is not difficult to believe that Stokes still did the best that he could while his commission was honored. He was arrested in March, 1776, as an act of reprisal for the imprisonment of some American officers, and was released upon parole. The town being in American hands, it may be imagined that the chief justice led no pleasant life until he went away with the other officers of the crown, returning when Savannah again fell into the hands of the British in December, 1778. His only consolation in those dark days must have been in the companionship of the civil officers of the crown, who, with very few exceptions, remained staunch to their government—not chopping or changing with every wind. His house, library and papers were destroyed by fire from bursting shells in 1779, during the investment of Savannah by the French and Americans. He left for England finally in 1782, and was of that forlorn band of men, women and children who were forced to leave the city just before its surrender to the “patriots” in July, 1782, who encamped in misery and privation of all sorts on the sands of the Tybee, dying three and four a day, and whose wretched remnants were at last taken away and scattered over the world.

STOKES' TREATISE.

But Stokes got to England, and there published a most excellent treatise on the American colonies in 1783, in which you will find no rancorous word against the successful party. He was an acute observer of people and things, and was of moderate passions; took a very human and philosophical view of the American revolution; believed and printed it, that if the upper house of the general assembly had been distinct from the council, and had been appointed for life with hereditary baronetcies, Georgia would have remained loyal; thought the same thing of the other colonies, and as we have seen men and known them, he may have been right. He wrote much more sense than was usually written in those days, and promised us more—an account of what he had seen in the colonies—“if he is not out of pocket by this work;” but no more appearing, it reasonably will be inferred that the worthy chief justice was out of pocket and so remained, to the great loss of ourselves, and the truth of history—or whatever truth there may be in history—now hidden, as to Georgia, under piles of windy oratory and fine patriotic cant called history.

“CRACKER” IMMIGRATION.

While he was chief justice there was a rapid movement of immigration from Virginia and the Carolinas to the middle and western part of Georgia—a tide of colonists not to be desired. Lawless and ungovernable, they oppressed the Indians and were a standing menace to the peace of the colony. For these lawbreakers a bill was brought into the colonial assembly in 1773 to establish circuit courts in west Georgia—west Georgia being then near Macon and bounded by the Ocmulgee river. But events moved too fast, and in the presence of trouble with England it was dropped, and the general court remained at Savannah. Of these settlers Stokes says:

“CRACKER” CONQUEST.

“Georgia is also subjected to another disagreeable circumstance beyond any other of the thirteen states, which is this: The southern colonies are overrun with a swarm of men from the western parts of Virginia and North Carolina, distinguished by the name of ‘crackers.’ Many of these people are descended from convicts that were transported from Great Britain to Virginia at different times, and inherit so much profligacy from their ancestors, that they are the most abandoned set of men on earth—few of them having the least sense of religion. When these people are routed in the other provinces they fly to Georgia, where the winters are mild, and the man who has a rifle, ammunition and a blanket can subsist in that vagrant way which the Indians pursue; for the quantity of deer, wild turkeys, and other game there, affords subsistence; and the country being mostly covered with woods, they have it always in their power to construct temporary huts and procure fuel. The eastern coast of Georgia, in which they plant rice, is at this time thinly settled on account of the emigration of the loyalists, and the greatest proportion of the inhabitants are negro slaves; whereas in the western part the inhabitants are numerous, and daily increase by the accession of the 'crackers' from the other provinces; and it is highly probable that these people will in time overrun the rice part of the country, as the Tartars in Asia have done by the fruitful cultivated provinces in the southern parts of that country. What induces me the rather to think so is, that during the king's government these 'crackers' were very troublesome in the settlements, by driving off gangs of horses and cattle to Virginia, and committing other enormities; they also occasioned frequent disputes with the Indians, whom they robbed and sometimes murdered, the Indians in their turn, according to their custom, murdered the first white man they met, by way of retaliation. To a familiar situation with those 'crackers,' would the disciples of Hume reduce the people of this country, could they succeed in abolishing Christianity, and persuading the world to believe that moral and natural defects are on the same footing. Georgia being bounded by the most northern stream of the river Savannah, it extends greatly in that quarter, forms part of the western boundary of South Carolina, and joins North Carolina. Since the late provisional treaty no other nation but the Indians can contest with them the right to that large and fertile country which lies between Georgia and the river Mississippi. During the civil war the Americans lost much of that apprehension which they formerly entertained for the Indians, for the 'crackers,' who are destitute of every sense of religion, which might withhold them from acts of perfidy and cruelty, have been discovered to outdo the Indians in bearing hunger and fatigue; and as they lead a savage kind of life, they are equally skilled in the arts of bush fighting, and discovering the enemy by their tracks. These men will naturally settle fast in the western parts of North Carolina and Georgia; and as the Indians dwindle away before them they certainly threaten ruin to the civilized parts of the rice colonies, who have not now a common parent to call to their assistance." Terrible consequences these in the mind of the chief justice—the civilized Christian coast harried by the uncivilized heathen "cracker" until Christianity and civilization should be blotted out from Georgia, and the "cracker" and heathendom left supreme. Another precedent doubtless was when Christian Britain was invaded by the heathen Dane, and the praise of Wodin and Thor were sung instead of the psalms of David—"cracker conquest" would be like "Danish conquest," and "cracker anarchy" take the place of any law. But the prophecies of the worthy chief justice have come to naught. No raids and no blood spilled. Instead of the "cracker" heathenizing the coast, Stokes' "cracker" has himself become civilized, and has bent his unruly pagan neck to the yoke of the law; some envious persons say, makes the law of the state. If that be true the "cracker conquest" of Georgia may have been accomplished indeed, but not after the precise manner that the chief justice feared.

Putting aside the vaticinations of the chief justice there is a truth absolutely to be gotten from his statement as to the building up of Georgia, of which too little is known. We know of the settlement of Georgia by Oglethorpe and his English, and of the Salzburgers up the Savannah river, and of the Puritans from Dorchester, S. C., and of the Highlanders at Darien. But what of that large portion of the state between the eastern counties and the Ocmulgee river before 1770? Stokes says, and there is no reason to doubt that Stokes knew of the fact, that in the forty years succeeding Oglethorpe's arrival that portion of the state was being settled, not by the overflow of the colonists from the eastern counties, but by the pressure of hardy colonists stealing down, as it were, from the north behind the colonists of Georgia, and between them and the Indians. Thus it was that even before the revolutionary war the middle of Georgia was settled by men who, so far from having any connection with the regular colonists, were entirely independent of their movements and governments, and to a certain extent hostile. Yet another fact we get from the chief justice, or at least what he considered to be a fact, something stated by him which requires very much more consideration and record. He says in his view, that these western pioneers, called "crackers," were the descendants of convicts. He probably knew some instance to verify his assertion, and of those then in the colony and spoken of by him it may have been largely true. It is not possible that Stokes would have stated it without some very clear knowledge of his own. But what he does not mention is that the convicts whose descendants thus came to Georgia were not the ordinary convicts, so become because of ordinary crime, but political convicts, because of uprising against the crown. In the latter part of the seventeenth century the ordinary convict in England was in most instances punished in England as he had always been. But the man who rose with Monmouth or the Scotch covenanters or the English Jacobite, was punished by transportation to Virginia. We find Jeffries sending off thousands after the Monmouth rebellion. These were the convicts that were sent to Virginia; and if the Georgia "cracker" is able to establish his descent from such a sort, he has no need to blush, for the bravest men and the finest women in England were transported as convicts to the plantations. After the war the name "cracker" was applied to all the small farmers who migrated thither from other states and made the bone and sinew of Georgia.

THIRD PERIOD. GEORGIA DURING THE REVOLUTION, 1777-1789.

REVOLUTIONARY COURT.

While Anthony Stokes was chief justice a dual administration of the law was set up by the Americans. On Dec. 1, 1775, the provincial congress of the colony assumed control of the courts, and a committee of fifteen persons was appointed to hold the quarterly sessions in Savannah, as a court of appeals "to hear and determine between the parties and sanction or prohibit processes according to the circumstances of the case." They did not interfere with the existing organization of the courts, but the chief justice was notified to regard the congressional instructions as law.

AUTHORITY CHALLENGED.

The authority of this appellate court was questioned by the royal attorney-general. What else could he do? The colony was still loyal. The provincial congress and its court represented the opinions of only a part of the people—Gov. Wright still present and the royal government still supreme, at least in name. But name served little as against resolutions, and the logical attorney-general was thereon ordered to leave.

END OF COLONIAL COURTS.

The machinery so established, it may be presumed, served its purpose after some fashion—purposes more political than judicial, and with many breaks and halts judicial business went lamely on—the provincial congress and council of safety being paramount, and the royal governor having but the name and no actual power; and on April 15, 1876, a temporary constitution for Georgia was adopted and promulgated by the provincial congress, and a copy thereof sent to George Washington. All laws then in force were continued, and it was provided:

CONSTITUTION OF 1776.

"V. That there shall be a chief justice, and two assistant judges, an attorney-general, a provost-marshal, and clerk of the court of sessions, appointed by ballot, to serve during the pleasure of the congress. The court of sessions, or oyer and terminer, shall be opened and held on the second Tuesday in June and December, and the former rules and methods of proceeding, as nearly as may be, shall be observed in regard to summoning of juries and all other cases whatsoever."

"XL. All causes, of what nature soever, shall be tried in the supreme court, except as hereinafter mentioned; which court shall consist of the chief justice, and three or more justices residing in the county; in case of the absence of the chief justice, the senior justice on the bench shall act as chief justice, with the clerk of the county, attorney for the state, sheriff, coroner, constable, and the jurors. And in case of the absence of any of the aforementioned officers, the justices to appoint others in their room pro tempore. (And if any plaintiff or defendant in civil causes shall be dissatisfied with the determination of the jury, then, and in that case, they shall be at liberty within three days to enter an appeal from that verdict, and demand a new trial by a special jury, to be nominated as follows, viz.: Each party, plaintiff and defendant, shall choose six, six more names shall be taken indifferently out of a box provided for that purpose, the whole eighteen to be summoned, and their names to be put together into the box, and the first twelve that are drawn out, being present, shall be the special jury to try the cause, and from which there shall be no appeal.")

"XLIV. Captures, both by sea and land, to be tried in the county where such shall be carried in; a special court to be called by the chief justice, or in his absence, by the then senior justice in the said county, upon application of the captors, or claimants, which cause shall be determined within the space of ten days. The mode of proceeding and appeal shall be the same as in the superior courts; unless after the second trial an appeal is made to the continental congress; and the distance of time between the first and second trial shall not exceed fourteen days; and all maritime causes to be tried in like manner."

"XLVI. That the courts of conscience (justices' courts—why called courts of conscience no one can tell) be continued as heretofore practiced, and that the jurisdiction thereof be extended to try cases not amounting to more than ten pounds."

"LII. A register of probates shall be appointed by the legislature in every county, for proving wills and granting letters of administration."

"LIII. All civil officers in each county shall be annually elected on the day of the general election; except justices of the peace, and registers of probates, who shall be appointed by the house of assembly."

Here will be seen only a continuance under the Georgia congress of the royal courts. No court in the colony anywhere except in Savannah. Elsewhere only justices' courts under bailiffs. Provincial congress was poor and paid its chief justice only £100.

JOHN GLEN.

John Glen was elected chief justice in April, 1776, being the first chief justice of republican election and right. Of his antecedents we know nothing. He had been one of the most active revolutionists, and a member of the council of safety. Evidently an aggressive, commanding man, but what sort of lawyer and judge he was has not come down to us. His judicial duties did not prevent great activity in him in colonial and revolutionary affairs. No records exist of courts held by him as chief justice, nor have we the names of his assistants; but his course, whatever it was, pleased the American party, for on Jan. 10, 1778, after the new constitution of 1777 had been adopted, he was re-elected chief justice, now of the state.

CONSTITUTION OF 1777.

In the constitution adopted Feb. 5, 1777, we find for the first time the basis and lines of our present judicial system—parishes now wiped out and counties made in their places: Chatham, Effingham, Burke, Richmond, Wilkes, Liberty, Glynn and Camden—judicial circuits to be of subsequent creation.

In each county a superior court was established to be held twice a year—the days of court considered of sufficient importance for a place in the constitution itself.

"All causes of whatever nature shall be tried in the supreme court" must be misprint. There was no supreme court, except as hereafter mentioned; "which court shall consist of a chief justice and three or more of the justices residing in the county."

This constitution does not provide how many assistant justices there shall be in each county. As a matter of fact, however, it was so construed that there was elected—while it was in force—but one chief justice for the state, and two or three assistant justices for each county. When the superior court was held the chief justice of the state presided with the county assistants. The counties being few, and the business light, this was easy to be done. It is not difficult to see that from 1777 to 1783, with the whole of the settled portion of the state in war and disorder—first, patriots occupying territory, having persecuted or killed tories, and then tories occupying the same territory, having persecuted or killed patriots—every part in restless movement, and no woman even feeling safe from week to week, the sitting of courts was a very doubtful if not an impossible matter outside of Savannah. We know not even the names of the assistant judges in that time. It is very dubious if any were appointed, and if appointed their offices must have been absolutely nominal. With the exception of Savannah and such desultory judicial proceedings as Chief Justice Stokes may have laboriously kept on foot, we may understand that there were no courts open in Georgia from 1776 to 1783. There was no law except the law of war as administered in the fiercest spirit of a civil struggle. During that time, therefore, we need look for no names or records except in respect of chief justices.

As we have seen, John Glen, the strong politician, was elected chief justice in 1777. His name frequently appears subsequently in revolutionary transactions, and it is a curious fact, bewildering to one's mind, as to what the real state of the country was; for in August, 1780, after the capture of Savannah by the British, and after the defeat of d'Estaing, and while it may be supposed that the city was subjugated by the large British force in possession, Chief Justice Glen appeared in town and defied the authorities. What can be the "truth of history" in view of such a fact? The chief justice of the provincial assembly, whose troops had been defeated and driven back into the swamps of the river and the woods of the middle counties, and into Richmond and Wilkes counties, going in safety into the chief town in the military occupation of the army and there braving the lion with impunity! Savannah may have been under the heel of the enemy, but the heel was very light. When Glen died does not appear, but we find him and Geo. Walton practicing law in Savannah in 1787 before Chief Justice Howley, and Glen judge of the eastern circuit in 1798.

WILLIAM STEVENS.

On Jan. 4, 1780, William Stevens was elected chief justice and John Milledge attorney-general. This William Stevens was attorney-general under his chief, John Glen, in 1776, but beyond that fact he is a name to us and nothing more.

JOHN WERRIAT.

On Aug. 16, 1781, when Dr. Nathan Brownson was elected governor there was some betterment in judicial affairs. John Werriat as elected chief justice and Samuel Stirks attorney-general. That things looked more promising for the revolutionary party is apparent by the increase of the salary of the chief justice to £300. John Werriat had been for years a conspicuous figure in Georgia politics. He, too, was a man of very positive convictions and force of character. He was made president of the provincial congress of Georgia in 1779. After the war in 1788 he became president of the convention, which, at Augusta, ratified the Federal constitution, and died ten years afterward at his home in Bryan county full of years and honors.

AEDANUS BURKE.

In August, 1782, Aedanus Burke was elected chief justice to succeed John Werriat, but it is doubtful if he ever took his seat, or even accepted the office. The subsequent course of his life furnishes strong proof that if he ever thought of presiding, it was only a temporary impulse, and that he did not finally consent to serve. He was an Irishman of decided ability and, like most able Irishmen, of overflowing wit. Born in Galway in 1743, he was educated at St. Omer's in France for the priesthood. What deflected him from that life has not come down to us, but from the West Indies, whither he had wandered, he came to South Carolina about 1775. There, or somewhere in his travels, he had become a lawyer, and it is illustrative of his great capacity of some sort that in 1778 we find him on the supreme bench of that state. Like another distinguished Irishman, afterwards chief justice of this state, he probably won his way in South Carolina more by his bonhomie than by profound legal learning, and set the inestimable fashion of good story-telling in a state which has since given us, hand in hand with traditions of fire-eating propensities, some of the best judges and wittiest raconteurs in the world. The outside Philistine who has judged South Carolina from its serious side has been in forlorn ignorance of the generations of mirthful lawyers, whose companionship while living was delightful to each other and to the elect, and whose memories still provoke to laughter. Petigru, McCord and McGrath had their prototype in Burke. Being an Irish-American with a French education, of course he hated England. That was to be expected. We therefore find him naturally an eager revolutionist—so much so that when the British overran South Carolina he, then on the bench, eagerly embraced the excuse and became a soldier. Drifting then into Georgia with the fortunes of the war he was a favorite here, as he had been in South Carolina and, as you will remember by the date, was elected chief justice just before the peace, but as we find him back in South Carolina and upon its bench shortly after the end of the war, the natural presumption must be that he could not bring himself to consent to break off the ties that bound him to South Carolina, and to live permanently south of the Savannah river. Subsequently he served in congress from South Carolina, and died in 1802. In his own state his memory has come down fragrant of wit and fun, but the production which brought him most into notice in the world was a pamphlet published by him about the Order of the Cincinnati shortly after its organization, in which he fiercely assailed it. He mercilessly ridiculed the aristocratic ideas and notions of this society which was considered a self-created nobility in a democratic country, and directed against its members such universal laughter that in haste to hide themselves from the mirth he raised, they hurriedly threw away most of the borrowed feathers with which they had adorned themselves, and made their society the modest and decent republican institution which it now is. Mirabeau afterward translated this skit into French and used portions of it with great effect in his speeches in the national assembly that changed the government of France.

RICHARD HOWLEY.

As we have noted while Burke was elected in 1782 he did not take his seat, for it was not he who held the first courts in Savannah after the re-occupation by the victorious provincials. On Oct. 1, 1782, we find the courts opened and its business in full blast under Richard Howley, chief justice of Georgia, with Jos. Clay, Wm. O'Brien and Wm. Gibbons, assistant justices. Why Chief Justice Howley has been ignored by historians and no allusion made to him as the first chief justice of Georgia after the revolutionary war, we cannot understand. But chief justice he was and presided in Savannah with great regularity, and under him the courts and bar were organized. Historians have depicted the circumstances of that day as woeful, and such they must have been. The greater part of the colony occupied and re-occupied by both sides, business destroyed, plantations broken up and many of the best men on both sides dead or removed away, Chief Justice Howley must have sat in his court with saddened heart. This gentleman had been no inconspicuous figure in colonial affairs. In 1779, when affairs in Georgia were at their worst, d'Estaing defeated and gone away, and little hope of the success of the revolutionary party, Richard Howley, Geo. Walton and others constituted themselves the general assembly of Georgia at Augusta. Wm. Glasscock was its speaker, and it elected Geo. Walton governor of the state; they chose also Geo. Walton as delegate to congress, and selected an executive council. We find, therefore, at the same time, in the state, two executive councils, one under John Werriat, as president of the state, and the other under Geo. Walton, as governor. There was some dissension between them, but the feelings arising from the conflict could not have lasted a very long time, inasmuch as the persons engaged in both executive councils were within a few months afterward acting in perfect accord. Walton remained governor not quite two months, being succeeded in January, 1780, by Howley, who was governor scarcely more than a month, leaving then to take his seat in the continental congress, to which he had been elected. Mr. Howley's career in congress need not be commented upon here. He remained in congress until he was elected chief justice. Like his other offices, his judicial career was short, for upon Jan. 31, 1783, Geo. Walton was elected chief justice and Gov. Howley took his place as a member of the bar, at which he had a large and lucrative practice, until his death in December, 1784. We find his name in all the most important cases immediately following the war. With the election of Richard Howley we get upon safe ground, for now we first have records of judicial proceedings in the state of Georgia, and from that time the minutes of the various courts will show the names of the officers who have filled the seat of justice.

GEORGE WALTON.

As we have said, Chief Justice Howley was succeeded by George Walton. The career of this governor and chief justice has been written by the able hand of Jones. So much the foremost man in Georgia was Walton that perfunctory notice of him should not be taken. Here is abundant reason for extracts from Jones' biography:

"Born in Prince Edward county, Va., in 1749, and becoming an orphan at a tender age, he passed under the care of a guardian who, as the family tradition runs, unwilling to assume the burden of his custody and education, apprenticed him to a carpenter. The industry and fidelity of the lad were commendable, and his desire for intellectual improvement attracted the notice both of employer and companions. Unable during the day to give any attention to his books, and too poor to afford the luxury of a lamp, he read them nightly by the light of fat fagots which he collected and husbanded for the purpose. Intent upon his studies he refrained from those nocturnal sports which too often lead the young and inexperienced into dissipation, idleness and sometimes ruin. By judicious use of his evening hours he made under the circumstances rapid advancement in knowledge, eagerly perusing all good books which could be borrowed from friends and neighbors. So favorably impressed was the master with the character, intelligence and ambition of his apprentice that long before his articles were concluded he relieved him from their obligation and permitted him to retain the fruits of his daily industry. Thus young Walton accumulated some money, which enabled him when about twenty years of age to leave Virginia and seek new fortunes in Savannah. Arriving at this little commercial metropolis of the colony of Georgia, he resolved to become a lawyer. Henry Young, Esq., received him into his office and gave him the benefit of his library and of his instruction. After suitable preparation he was called to the bar, and at once entered with zeal upon the practice of the profession of his choice. * * * * *

"Responding to a public call, a respectable number of the householders and inhabitants of the province assembled at the watchhouse in Savannah on July 27, 1774. After an animated discussion a committee was raised, of which George Walton was a member, to prepare resolutions similar to those adopted by the northern colonies, declaratory of Georgia's condemnation of the oppressive measures inaugurated by parliament. That there might be an expression of opinion from some of the more distant parishes, unrepresented in this convention, the meeting 'stood adjourned' until the tenth of the following August. * * * * *

"On June 21, 1775, a call was published, signed by Noble Wymberly Jones, Archibald Bulloch, John Houstoun and George Walton, requesting the inhabitants of the town and district of Savannah to meet at the Liberty pole on the following day at ten o'clock in the forenoon for the purpose of selecting a committee to bring about a union of Georgia with her sister colonies in the cause of freedom. The alarming situation of affairs in America, and particularly in Georgia, was urged as a reason for punctual and full attendance. At the appointed place and designated hour many were present, and a council of safety, consisting of William Ewen, William LeConte, Joseph Clay, Basil Cooper, Samuel Elbert, William Young, Elisha Butler, Edward Telfair, John Glen, George Houston, George Walton, Joseph Habersham, Francis H. Harris, John Smith, John Morel and Seth John Cuthbert, was selected, with instructions to maintain an active correspondence with the continental congress, with councils of safety in other provinces, and with committees raised in Georgia parishes. This business concluded, a number of gentlemen who had attended the meeting, dined at Tondee's tavern. * * * * *

Memorable in the political annals of Georgia were the proceedings of this provincial congress, which convened in Savannah on July 4, 1775. Every parish was represented, and the delegates were fitting exponents of the intelligence, the dominant hopes, and the material interests of the communities from which they respectively came. This was Georgia's first secession convention. It placed the province in active sympathy and confederated alliance with the twelve other American colonies, practically annulled within her limits the operations of the objectionable acts of parliament, questioned the supremacy of the realm, and inaugurated measures calculated to accomplish the independence of the plantation and its erection into the dignity of a state. In all the political agitations and movements which antedated and led up to this important convocation, George Walton had borne a prominent part. He stood shoulder to shoulder with Archibald Bulloch, Noble Wymberley Jones, John Houston, the brothers Joseph and John Habersham, Jonathan Bryan, Joseph Clay, Edward Telfair, and others who were specially influential in dissipating the power of kingly rule. This congress perfected its organization by electing Archibald Bulloch president and George Walton secretary. While it lies not within the compass of this sketch to enumerate its proceedings, we may state in a general way that it proclaimed, in terms most emphatic, a just conception of the natural and constitutional rights which appertained to Georgians as citizens of the colony and subjects of Great Britain; testified determined opposition to the late objectionable acts of parliament; expressed admiration for the heroism of New England, and a stern resolve to share the fortunes of the sister colonies; appointed delegates to, and manifested a willingness to observe all orders promulgated by, the continental congress; professed unswerving loyalty to the principles of American liberty, and suggested measures deemed appropriate in the present perplexed condition of public affairs.

Mr. Walton was appointed upon the "committee of intelligence," and was also named as one of the members to present the "articles of association" then adopted, to the inhabitants of the town and district of Savannah for signature by them. In association with the Rev. Dr. Zubly, Dr. Noble W. Jones and William Young, he was commissioned to prepare and submit to the people of Georgia an address containing an account of the state of American affairs and a narrative of the proceedings of this provincial congress. This address, which is said to have been framed by Mr. Walton, is a model of its kind. In defiance of the protest of Gov. Wright, Mr. Walton and his associates of the council of safety thoroughly purged the militia of the loyal element which lurked in the ranks of its commissioned officers. By a resolution of this provincial congress he was continued as a member of the council of safety, and of that body he was in December, 1775, chosen president, with Edward Langworthy as secretary. * * *

"Archibald Bulloch was elected president of the provincial congress, which assembled in Savannah on Jan. 20, 1776. That sterling patriot, and John Houston, Lyman Hall, Button Gwinnett, and George Walton were then chosen as delegates to the continental congress." * * *

With the exception of an interval in 1779, when he filled the gubernatorial chair of Georgia, Mr. Walton was continued as a member of the continental congress until October, 1781. In association with Button Gwinnett and Lyman Hall he affixed his signature to the Declaration of Independence. As a member of the treasury board, of the committee on naval affairs, and of other committees, he rendered intelligent and willing service. With Robert Morris and George Clymer he was commissioned to transact such continental business as might be found necessary to be done in Philadelphia; and George Taylor and himself were appointed commissioners to make presents to, and confer with, the Indians at Easton, Penn. It was upon his motion, in 1780, that the treasury board was empowered to draw bills of exchange, aggregating $100,000 in specie, at ninety days, upon the Hon. Benjamin Franklin, minister plenipotentiary of the United States near the court of Versailles. With Edward Telfair and Edward Langworthy, on July 9, 1778, he signed the articles of confederation, and on Dec. 17 following he and Dr. Lyman Hall, as special commissioners from Georgia, waited upon Gen. Lincoln at Charleston "to inform him of the true situation of matters in this state, and saw how essentially requisite it was that some vigorous and decisive measures should be taken for its defense against the incursions of its southern neighbors."

When Col. Campbell, late in December, 1778, effected a landing at Girardeau's Bluff and moved upon Savannah, defended by Gen. Robert Howe, George Walton, who then held the rank of colonel of the First battalion of the First regiment of foot militia, formed for the defense of Georgia, with 100 men, was posted on the south common, on the right of the American line, to guard the road leading to Great Ogeechee ferry. Although informed by Col. Walton that there was a private way through the swamp, by means of which the enemy could pass from the high grounds of Brewton Hill plantation and gain the rear of the American right, and although urged by him to have that route properly observed, Gen. Howe neglected to give the matter any attention. The consequence was that Sir James Baird, with the light infantry, supported by the New York volunteers under Col. Trumbull, conducted by a negro guide, following this unguarded route, gained the rear of the American right, and, falling heavily upon the militia detachment commanded by Col. Walton, dispersed it with great loss. In this shock, Col. Walton, severely wounded in the thigh, fell from his horse and was captured. At the sound of these guns, Col. Campbell, running his field pieces to the front, opened fire upon the brigades of Huger and Elbert and ordered a vigorous charge all along his line. Attacked in front and rear Gen. Howe's forces gave way. A retreat was sounded, a panic ensued, and the Americans retreated in a disorderly manner through Savannah, made their way as best they could to the high ground beyond the Springfield plantation swamp, leaving the town and all it contained open to the victor. By the musket ball which he received while endeavoring with his militia to stay the onset of Sir James Baird Col. Walton's thigh was broken. Judge T. U. P. Charlton says that he never recovered from the effect of this wound but limped to the day of his death.

The following letter (the original of which lies before us), penned with a trembling hand from his couch of pain, and addressed to his young wife, will be read with interest:

"Savannah, Jan. 4, 1779, 11 o'clock p. m.

"My Dear Girl: I was very happy to hear just this moment, by a flag, that you were safely arrived in Carolina. It is my earnest desire that you keep with your sister until you hear from me again. Your dear mamma continues still extremely ill at our house, and I am afraid she cannot long survive.

"The day you left your brother and myself, my dear Dolly, in the chances of it I received a wound in the thigh. The bone is broke, but cures of this kind are quite common. I have every possible comfort from my conquerors, their hospital surgeons to attend me, with Trail, Irvine, and Brydie. And they tell me that they expect to see me do well. Be therefore of good spirits, and let me not hear by every flag that you are inconsolable, which will only operate to depress mine. At any rate, you ought to recollect that in these troublesome times you have no right to expect a life of superior tranquillity to your neighbors.

"My love to Polly. Brisbane is in town, perfectly well. I suppose he writes by this flag, though I know nothing about it, having just been apprised of it myself.

"God bless you, my dear, and remember that you are sincerely loved by a man who wishes to make honor and reputation the rule of all his actions.

"GEORGE WALTON." * * *

When so recovered from his hurt as to be able to walk Col. Walton was allowed to proceed to Sunbury, where for sometime he remained a prisoner of war. In consideration of the fact that he was a member of the continental congress, that he had signed the Declaration of Independence, and that he was a prominent citizen, the British authorities at first demanded in exchange an officer with the rank of brigadier-general. His term of service in the continental congress having expired he was finally exchanged for a captain in the navy, and proceeded to Augusta, which was then the capital of republican Georgia.

By the general assembly which convened in that town in November, 1779, Col. Walton was elected governor of the infant commonwealth. There were then two executive councils actually organized and claiming to exercise important functions within the limits of the state wasted by a common enemy and rent by internal feuds. Violent were the collisions of parties, and confused was the administration of public affairs. Southern Georgia was in the hands of the enemy, and the republican government of the upper portion of the state was impecunious, weak and peripatetic. Fortunately little necessity existed for the office either of legislator or of governor.

Short and uneventful was the gubernatorial career of Mr. Walton in 1779. By the ensuing general assembly Richard Howley was, on Jan. 4, 1780, elected governor, and Edward Telfair, George Walton, Benjamin Andrew, Lyman Hall and William Few were appointed delegates to the continental congress. While members of and in attendance upon this congress, Messrs. Walton, Few and Howley apprehended that it was the design of the British ministry to submit overtures of peace upon the basis of freedom to such portions of America as were then in possession of the revolutionists and of retention by the crown of such other parts as were actually held by the king's forces. As Georgia at that time was largely under the dominion of the enemy, deeming it their duty promptly and emphatically to protest against acquiescence by the continental congress in any such proposition, they prepared and caused to be printed in Philadelphia in January, 1781, over their own signatures, a pamphlet entitled Observations Upon the Effects of Certain Late Political Suggestions by the Delegates of Georgia. Referring to the fact that Georgia had been in great measure reduced by conquest they entered a forcible plea against the entertainment of the doctrine of uti possidetis, and urged that inasmuch as the inhabitants of that province had united in the common cause and had expended their blood and fortunes in its support, it would be unjust and inhuman for the other parts of the Union separately to embrace the result of the common efforts, and leave them under the yoke of bankrupt and enraged tyrannv. "To preserve the states entire is the object of the alliance with France, and it cannot be the interest of the other great branch of the family compact that we should again make a part of the British empire. Georgia is a material part of the Union, and cannot be given up without affecting its essential interest, if not endangering its existence. * * * As to America, no part of it could expect to be free while England retains both ends of the continent." Whatever may have been the effect of this political tract, certain it is that if memorialized on the subject, the continental congress declined to entertain the rumored basis of pacification. With the authorship of this manly protest the pen of Mr. Walton is credited.

"In January, 1783, that sterling patriot and worthy gentleman, Dr. Lyman Hall, was chosen governor of Georgia, and on the 31st of that month the Hon. George Walton was elected to fill the position of chief justice, with Samuel Stirk as attorney-general. * * * * *

"In 1787 Judge Walton was appointed a delegate from the state of Georgia to the Federal convention charged with revising the articles of confederation, and reporting such alterations and provisions as might be deemed adequate to the emergencies of government and the preservation of the Union. Prevented by judicial engagements, he did not attend. The year previous he had represented Georgia in the preliminary settlement of differences touching the boundary line between that state and South Carolina.

"In 1789 he occupied for a second time the gubernatorial chair. The term of service then lasted for only one year. It was during this administration that Georgia remodeled her constitution. Augusta was still the capital of the state, and it was here that Gov. Walton received from the president of the constitutional convention the constitution then adopted, affixed the seal of state to it, and proclaimed its provisions for the information of the inhabitants. * * * * *

"In 1795 and 1796 Mr. Walton represented Georgia as a senator in the congress of the United States. He was a member of the Union society of Savannah, and a trustee of the Richmond academy. As one of the trustees of the university of Georgia he rendered valuable service in formulating plans and adopting measures for the promotion of higher education in Georgia.

"For many years and at the time of his death he was judge of the middle circuit of this commonwealth. The state was then divided into three judicial districts—the eastern, the middle and the western. The middle circuit embraced the following counties: Screven, Burke, Montgomery, Washington, Warren, Richmond, Columbia and Jefferson. As a judge, few men in this commonwealth ever attained unto and none transcended the reputation acquired and maintained by Mr. Walton."

To this need only be added that Walton was also appointed the first judge of the superior courts of the eastern judicial circuit in 1790, and so remained until the autumn of 1791. He seems to have removed to Augusta shortly afterward. We find him there as judge of the middle circuit from 1799 to 1804, when he died.

WILLIAM STITH.

Chief Justice Walton resigning in the summer of 1786, William Stith was elected chief justice in his place in October of that year. Here we have another name, which is nothing but a name, except so far as the discharge of judicial duties is shown by the records of court, but of Chief Justice Stith there is no other public record known to us.

JOHN HOUSTOUN.

His term of office was very brief, cause not appearing. John Hustoun succeeded him in the same year. This chief justice did not even take his seat upon the bench. Had he done so a worthy name would have been added to the active list of Georgia's justices. He was an able lawyer, a politician of enlarged views and great experience, governor of the state twice, and always possessing the confidence of its people; came from one of Savannah's oldest families, born in 1744, dying in 1796, and buried at White Bluff, near Savannah.

HENRY OSBORNE.

In March, 1787, Henry Osborne was elected chief justice in the place of John Houstoun. Little exists in any recorded form of this chief justice. He presided as such for nearly two years—from March, 1787, to January, 1789—went to his courts with regularity and seems to have omitted nothing in the due discharge of his functions. Of his career we cannot speak except so far as to note that he was a satisfactory judge. So much we may infer, for we find him again the first superior court judge of the western circuit after the constitution of 1789, presiding with Walton at Savannah, and often sitting alone in the eastern circuit, sat in Savannah down to September, 1791, and then disappearing, the time of his death not appearing.

NATHANIEL PENDLETON.

The career of Nathaniel Pendleton, twelfth and last chief justice of Georgia before the last organization of a supreme court, is much more varied and interesting than those of his predecessors. He came of a sound stock—that family of Virginia Pendletons which has furnished so much brains to the United States, both before and after him, his uncle being the eloquent Pendleton of revolutionary fame, and the rival of Patrick Henry; and his grandson George H. Pendleton of Ohio, for a long time the favorite aspirant for the national presidency in the minds of democrats, when democrats could not elect presidents of the United States. Judge Pendleton was born in Virginia in 1756, and entered the revolutionary army in 1775, serving on the staff of Gen. Nathaniel Greene; doing doughty service at all times, and especially at Eutaw, for which last exhibition of gallantry congress thanked him. The war over he came to Georgia—as we now send our sons to western territories—studied law, and practiced in Savannah. His abilities were nothing extraordinary, but sufficient to make him first the attorney-general of the state, and then chief justice in January, 1789, so remaining until his office was abolished by the constitution of that year. In 1787 he had represented the state in the national convention which adopted the Federal constitution; and it was in that way that his good qualities so commended him to Gen. Washington that he suggested Pendleton to his own advisers for the national office of secretary of state. But the name did not please Alexander Hamilton. Too much Virginia—too much of Jefferson and Madison, and not enough of Hamilton and New York, objected Hamilton. So the appointment was not made, and thus through Hamilton, Pendleton was not secretary of state. Afterward Pendleton became district judge of the United States at Savannah, but did not remain long in Georgia. Was carried by ambition and love in 1796 to New York, where he took a high place at the bar. Hamilton living in the same place at the same time got to know Pendleton better, who was magnanimous enough to forgive him for defeating him with Washington, and even went farther in generosity—so far as to volunteer his services as his second on that fatal day when he fell before Burr's bullet. As to Pendleton, it is recorded that he then went on the supreme bench of New York for Dutchess county, and died in that state in 1821. And there, in New York, he was buried—the last chief justice of Georgia before 1847.

END OF THIRD PERIOD.

We have now passed through the courts of the revolution, and their continuance under the constitution of 1777. We have seen the royal chief justice, Grover, removed, and the faithful Stokes departing; Chief Justices Glen, Stephens, Werriat and Burke holding the name, and nothing more, while the war prevailed; the reorganization of the courts by Richard Howley, and the vigorous administration of justice by Walton, Stith, Osborne and Pendleton—Burke and Houstoun never sitting—twelve chief justices of Georgia, all told, before chief justices were abolished—mostly men of mark and substance. Let it always be remembered that within that time there was but one circuit in the whole of Georgia, all counties being in that circuit; and that the chief justice of the state was then presiding judge in every county of the state.

Feeling our way thus painfully, but with knowledge somewhat exact, considering all circumstances, through the dimness and obscurity of colonial judicial birth; of judges trying to work justice in revolutionary times when there could scarcely be said to be any other law than that of might; and through the reorganization of courts by the new state of Georgia; we have at last landed upon that peaceful shore which is almost without history because it was without event, when under the constitution of 1789 and the judiciary act of that year, chief justices were no more in Georgia, and when superior courts were created. We have thus left the dim, mysterious and inaudible voices of our ancient judges—visible to us only by their acts; and have come to the days when reports of the courts have made their judgments articulate.

EARLY BAR.

Looking to the bar of the state we come upon names that commence to be familiar to us, having met them before in Georgia affairs, and by tradition. Richard Howley, during his short career before the bench of which he had been chief justice, had the largest business. With him we find Samuel Stark, William Gibbons, James Whitfield, Abraham Jackson, Nathaniel Pendleton, Matthew Hall McAllister and William Stephens.

FOURTH PERIOD. GEORGIA AFTER THE REVOLUTION, 1789-1796.

We are now at the time when chief justices were ended for a while, and superior court judges sat in their places. This was accomplished by a convention which sat in Augusta in the summer of 1789, and made a new constitution to take effect Oct. 9 thereafter; and by the new judiciary act of 1789, putting the new constitution into effect.

By that constitution it was provided:

"A superior court shall be held in each county twice in every year, in which shall be tried and brought to final decision all causes, civil and criminal; except such as may be subject to a Federal court, and such as may by law be referred to inferior jurisdiction.

"The general assembly shall point out the mode of correcting errors and appeals, which shall extend as far as to empower the judges to direct a new trial by jury within the county where the action originated, which shall be final."

"Courts-merchant shall be held as heretofore, subject to such regulations as the general assembly may by law direct.

"The judges of the superior court, and attorney-general, shall have a competent salary established by law, which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office; and shall hold their commissions during the term of three years.

"All elections shall be by ballot, and the house of representatives, in all appointments of state officers, shall vote for three persons, and a list of the three persons having the highest number of votes shall be signed by the speaker and sent to the senate, which shall, from such list, determine, by a majority of their votes, the officer elected, except militia officers and the secretaries of the governor; who shall be appointed by the governor alone, under such regulations and restrictions as the general assembly may prescribe. The general assembly may vest the appointment of inferior officers in the governor, the courts of justice, or in such other manner as they may by law establish."

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789.

The general assembly, which met in the fall of 1789, passed the well known judiciary act which has been ever since the framework of the judiciary system of the state. By it the assembly arranged: That from and immediately after the passing of this act, two fit and proper persons, duly qualified, shall be elected judges of the superior court, which judges shall have precedence according to the time of their election; that the judges of the said superior court, or any one of them, shall hold the said courts in each county twice in every year, at the respective times, and in manner following, that is to say, commencing in Camden and Washington, on the first Monday in January next, the Monday after in Glynn and Greene, the Monday after in Liberty and Franklin, the Monday after in Chatham and Wilkes, the second Monday after in Effingham and Richmond, and the Monday after in the county of Burke, and that the counties from Burke to Camden, inclusive, be the eastern district, and the remaining counties the western district; and the second term shall commence on the first Monday in July next thereafter in Camden and Washington, and be continued throughout each district in the same rotation as directed in respect to the fifth circuit; that the said superior court shall have full power and authority to exercise jurisdiction in and to hear and determine, by a jury of twelve men, all pleas, civil and criminal; and all causes of what nature or kind soever, according to the usage and custom of courts of law and equity (except such as are hereby referred to inferior jurisdiction), on the days and times hereinbefore mentioned; and shall consist of at least one or more judge or judges; that the judges of the said superior courts shall be, and they are hereby vested, with full powers to regulate the proceedings in said courts; and to make and establish all necessary rules for the orderly conducting of business therein, according to law, and the usage of courts; and shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths or affirmation, and to punish, by usual fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the judge or judges presiding, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the said court.

And it was further enacted that no person should be allowed to practice or plead in any of the superior or inferior courts, until examined in open court and admitted by one or more of the judges of the superior court.

SUPERIOR COURTS.

Here we find the beginning of the circuit system of our state; two circuits, eastern and western, and but two judges, with power to hold court in any one of the counties, together and separately. And so they considered the act, because we see Judges Osborne and Walton sitting together in Richmond county as early as Jan. 1, 1790, and after that time either judge sitting in either county, or both together.

Rules were to be made by them and rules they made, the first rules governing the superior courts of this state made in Richmond superior court on Jan. 1, 1790, by Walton and Osborne, judges, and on Jan. 18, 1790, by the same judges in Chatham county, as the diligent student may still find in the records of the superior courts of those counties. No more chief justices until a supreme court was established by another authority in 1845.

This method of administration of justice in the little state worked smoothly enough for the time being, there being no appeals or writs of errors to any other court, and the two judges making final decisions in all causes before them, being the courts, having all judicial power.

MIDDLE CIRCUIT CREATED.

No other court or body had appellate jurisdiction of any nature over the two judges of the two circuits until 1797. Then the middle circuit was made out of the counties of Burke, Screven, Montgomery, Washington, Jefferson, Warren, Richmond and Columbia, and three judges were demanded. It was provided that they should preside in each circuit alternately so that no two terms should be held by the same judge in the same circuit successively.

APPELLATE PROCEEDINGS.

Something appellate was also arranged in this form:

That the judges, attorney-general and solicitor shall meet annually at Louisville on July 10, for the purpose of forming rules for the government of the superior court, determining on such points of law as may be reserved for the argument, and may require a uniform decision, and for giving their decisions on such constitutional and legal points as may be referred to their consideration by the executive department. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to or be construed to authorize the judges to enter upon any proceeding which may affect any cause in its progress to final decision agreeably to the constitution in the county wherein the defendant or defendants reside; nor shall any order or decision of the said judges be promulgated or tend to preclude the admission of any new evidence which may arise in the progress of any cause prior to the final decision and entering upon judgment thereon in such county; very feeble appellate power this, but something at least toward uniformity and comparison of thought.

SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES.

Before 1797 the superior court judges of Georgia who held the whole judicial power since chief justices ceased can easily be named. First came George Walton, always justly in some office or other and much sought after in all affairs of the state, judge from the beginning of 1790 to the end of 1793. With him for a short time only was Henry Osborne until 1791. The latter leaving the bench finally in that year, his place was filled by Ex-Chief Justice Houstoun, willing to sit again as Ex-Chief Justice Walton was doing, and Osborne had done, and judge until 1796. William Stith followed Walton in 1793 and was again succeeded by Walton in the same year, the reasons for these changes not appearing. We find both Walton and Houstoun out, and William Stephens and William Few in their places in 1796, the year before the middle circuit was created. From 1797 their names are all known and printed, and we have given them to the inquisitive reader in another place.*

SUPERIOR COURT DAYS.

The judicial history and methods of Georgia are matters of no note from 1797 until the establishment of a supreme court. The years intervening between 1797 and 1846 witnessed the peaceful growth and steady progress of the state from the feebleness of a colony into the power of a full-grown commonwealth. They saw the judicial territory gradually expanded from two circuits into eleven. The Ocmulgee circuit was created in 1813, the southern circuit in 1819, the northern and Flint circuits in 1822, the Chattahoochee in 1826, the Cherokee circuit in 1832, the Coweta in 1833, and the southwestern circuit in 1840, each marking development and progress. They witnessed the quiet submission of a large population to a system of judicial decisions without the possibility of review, except in Federal matters—a system which would now be rejected by a civilized people as impossible, because of the premium thus held out for the arbitrary exercise of power. And yet no discontent arose nor is there a trace of bitterness that has come down to us. On its face it speaks most highly for the characters of judges and people of that day, that, under conditions which we would now regard as intolerable, there was no revolt of bar or suitors, no proposed impeachment, no heated controversies. Nothing happened of any sort indicating criticism of judicial methods until, without agitation or noise, the state came to see that no judge ought to be entrusted with arbitrary power without hazard of review, and out of that thought established a supreme court.

NO SUPREME COURT.

It would be an interesting inquiry to go into this subject of the contentment of the people of Georgia with the exercise of judicial authority by a single judge. Doubtless Walton and Houstoun and a few successors had made such lodgement in the public confidence that their decisions were abided by without question, but, as will be seen by examination of the list of judges, their successors, with some exceptions, were men of no especial note, and with names that did not universally commend them to implicit obedience. Most likely the men who exercised the voting powers of the state were not informed in such matters, or imbued with any perception of the benefits to be derived from careful revising tribunals. Possibly again, one or two generations were required to pass away before the new men could naturally free their minds from the trammels of the old colonial methods, which involved the exercise of the same judicial power by one man. But, whether it was from habit or ignorance, the fact remains that Georgia woke very slowly from the sleep which followed the revolutionary struggle, during which time we can well fancy that many sorts of laws were administered in the various circuits. The evils of the system are well set forth in a message from Gov. Forsyth to the legislature of 1828:

"The condition of the judiciary requires your most serious attention. Under the present arrangement of eight judges of the superior courts, each confined to the circuit for which he was elected, supreme in his authority, not bound by the decisions of his predecessors or contemporaries, and not always by his own, which will be in their turn disregarded by his successor, there can be neither uniformity nor certainty in the laws for the security of the rights of persons or property. It is an awful reflection that property, life, liberty and reputation are with us dependent upon the decision of a single judge, uncontrolled and uncontrollable within his circuit, and not always distinguished for ability, intelligence and integrity. The confusion produced by contemporary contradictory decisions every day increases; property is held and recovered in one part of the state, and lost in another part of the state, under the same circumstances, rights are asserted and maintained in one circuit and denied in another in analogous cases.

"So much depends upon the opinion of a presiding judge that suits are matters of speculation and management. The most astute lawyer, scrupulously conscientious in the advice given to his clients on cases submitted to him, can only inform them what will be the result if actions are brought and decided during the term of the then presiding judge. Suits are brought or postponed, pressed to trial, suspended or delayed by the parties, according to the known or supposed opinion of the presiding judge and the nearness and remoteness of the time when a new election of judges must occur. We have all the complicated judicial machinery for the correction of erroneous judgments. Appeals, writs of error, motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment are used as if in mockery, since the appeals are tried, the writs determined, the motions decided by the same judge whose erroneous judgment is to be corrected, arrested or set aside.

"All the delays of the English system are permitted, but time only is gained or lost, unless, indeed, the presiding judge has a mind of extraordinary vigor and magnanimity capable of discovering and prompt to confess its errors, or death or a new election removes him from his place. The destruction of this judicial octarchy by the substitution of a single supreme judge, whose decision should govern in all circuits, would be an important improvement. It is not necessary to vest such tremendous power in the hands of one individual. The object to be accomplished can be attained by less dangerous means. The most simple and obvious remedy is the establishment of a court for the correction of errors, etc. This remedy cannot, in my judgment, be applied without a change in the constitution, which requires that 'errors shall be corrected and new trials determined in the superior court of the county in which the action originated.' Under this clause of the constitution, however, conventions of the judges have been required, and in these properly regulated, a palliative may be found for the existing disorders, until a radical cure can be effected by an alteration of the constitution."

CIRCUIT RIDING.

Still, subject to this difficulty, this part of the judicial life of Georgia is that which is to-day more full of interest than any other. The best lawyers lived of course in the larger towns, and traveled the circuit with the judge as do the barristers of England. While they accepted retainers in other circuits, as a rule, they adhered to their own circuits. There being no railroads they rode together to the county towns, and there stayed until court was over. They slept together, and ate together, walked together and joked together. No one was free from their jests and pranks, not even the judge himself. Time and space are not given for the recording of the riding of these circuits—they would fill many volumes—and even now the oldest Georgia lawyer looks back with a laugh and a sigh to those merry days of his legal life. Obligated to argue cases in all their various phases without assistance of libraries on the spot, one might have supposed that the Georgia lawyer of 1820 was of inferior learning because his argument did not smell of the lamp of the night before, and because the table before him was not burdened with calf bound volumes. But such was not the case. The library of the lawyer of those days was very small in comparison with the libraries of this book-producing age. It consisted mainly of Coke and Blackstone and Fearn, and a few others of the older writers, together with the common law, equity, and exchequer reports of England, and the supreme court reports of the United States. Some of them also had such reports of the eastern states as were then being given. But what they had they knew. They had to use their knowledge on the instant, and without reference to digests. A point being sprung, they must know the law and the cases, or the readiest or most logical man would go down before his well-equipped adversary. There was no time then to search through encyclopaedias of law, and to hand in briefs the next week. The student of law studied his profession laboriously, and while he was at home did not cease to study and review the cases. When Berrien or Law or Tom Cobb or Andrew J. Miller arose, the adversary who was superficial had a bad quarter of an hour. Thus there were great lawyers in Georgia in those days, as good, I fancy, as have ever been since with all our libraries and all our digests. The experiences of the lawyers on their circuits were often very amusing. The court houses being located often in country villages, and not seldom in spots that could not have been dignified with the name of village even, their fare was quite precarious; and often in the matter of decent cleanliness, taverns, where they boarded on circuits, required education. Judge Andrews says:

“Most inn-keepers, after a few circuits, learned to have water, clean sheets and scalded bedsteads at the beginning of every court, and clean towels in the rooms every morning; though I heard of a case in the Cherokee circuit, not many years since, where a landlady, in the process of learning, declared that ‘these lawyers must be a dirty set of fellows, as they will not use the same water and towels after each other, for I can wash my four children in the same water and wipe them with the same towel, and God knows they are dirty enough.’” But, take it all in all, the old Georgia lawyer looks back upon these days as the school boy does upon his spent vacation. Let us see who some of those old lawyers were.

JOHN MCPHERSON BERRIEN.

John McPherson Berrien, who was judge of the eastern circuit in 1810, was born on Aug. 23, 1781, in New Jersey, the son of Maj. John Berrien, a revolutionary patriot. His birth occurred in the house formerly occupied by Gen. Washington, whence he sent his farewell address to his army. It so happened to Judge Berrien that not only the place of his birth and his father's position, but all the circumstances of his ancestry were such as to create that aristocratic feeling which never left him. When the edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685 his ancestors, being Huguenots, fled from France, and sought shelter in Holland. They came from that country to this, and settled in New Jersey, where his grandfather, John Berrien, became judge of the supreme court of that state. His father was not only an officer in the revolutionary war, but one of distinction. Georgia can justly claim as her son the distinguished subject of this sketch, as his father removed to this state while he was little more than a baby. The education of the son was most carefully directed both in New York and in New Jersey. It is said of him that he was always the brightest pupil in his school, and easily at the head of every class. He graduated at Princeton at the early age of fifteen years, and read law in the office of the Hon. Joseph Clay in Savannah, and was admitted to the bar in 1799 before he reached his nineteenth year. He immediately began the practice of his chosen profession, and from the outset was marked, and gave strong promise of the eloquence which he later attained. Precocious in marriage as he had been in education, he took his first wife at twenty-two years of age. He was elected solicitor-general in 1809 and the next year became judge of the eastern circuit, which office he held until 1821. While on the bench he delivered before the convention of all the judges at Augusta his opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the "alleviating law." In this judgment he was enabled to display the firmness of conviction which always subsequently guided his actions. In the war of 1812 Judge Berrien was elected to the command of a regiment of cavalry watching the British from St. Simon's island. No opportunity, however, for an engagement offered itself, and the war closed without an occasion for the usefulness of his military ardor. Nevertheless, as an officer he was entitled to credit for all proper energy and military zeal.

Senator from Georgia.—He was elected to the legislature in 1822, and was chairman of the judiciary committee, in which capacity he introduced the resolution under which Schley's Digest of Laws was authorized. His reputation was so much increased by his handling of his committee that he was elected to the United States senate, and took his seat as a member of that body March 4, 1825. He was then in the forty-fourth year of his age, and made a most favorable impression in the senate at once by his acuteness and thoughtful attention to all matters of importance, and his eloquence charmed those who heard him. He was so very youthful in appearance that Chief Justice Marshall styled him "the honey-tongued Georgia youth." Much has been written and said of the eloquence of Judge Berrien, and when it is remembered that there were many eloquent men among the statesmen of that day, his high position among them cannot be overrated. His style and language were so beautiful, his voice so musical, and his manner so graceful, that he was called the American Cicero.

Attorney-General.—On the election of Gen. Jackson to the presidency he tendered the office of attorney-general to Judge Berrien, who resigned his seat in the senate and entered the cabinet in 1829. This cabinet was dissolved in 1831 by the resignation of the greater part of its members on account of the famous Eaton difficulty.

Dissolution of Jackson's Cabinet.—The cause of its dissolution was absurd enough to have been translated into opera bouffe. Maj. Eaton, the secretary of war, was the possessor of a wife, well known in her youth in Washington, where her father kept a tavern. Things were said of lively Peg O'Neal—true or not—but such things as ordinarily exclude a lady from social life. Even re-baptism by marriage with the president's senatorial friend could not wash her reputation clean, therefore society rebelled, and left her out. To the president the matter went, probably represented by Peg in tears. He had known her as a girl at the tavern. Her husband was his friend. Enough, and more than enough. Of course society falsified, and with many "by the eternals!" the thing must be made straight, and society must welcome her. But society, president or not, was willful. President got to roaring. Dutch minister's wife would not sit by Peg, indeed! Would send Dutch minister home, but for reasons. Our own faithful niece, presiding in the White House, will not call. Go home to Tennessee then;

and home she went. Cabinet ministers' ladies must call. Ministers replied that they did not interfere in such matters, and that he could not regulate their domestic affairs. All his raging and roaring could effect nothing against the female edict; but the cabinet resigned at his request. Excellent business this for the president of the United States, provocative of Homeric laughter in foreign diplomatic circles! But with all his folly, and raging, and childish violence there were qualities in Jackson of such a high order as few men ever have.

Senator Again.—The next nine years Judge Berrien passed in the practice of his profession, but was again elected to the senate in 1841, and re-elected in 1847. An instance of his firmness of will can be found in his refusal to obey the resolution of the legislature of 1841 instructing him to reverse his vote on certain questions. This was followed by a vote of want of confidence, which he answered by a conclusive address to the people and the people sustained him. Resigning again in 1852 he retired permanently from public life and died in 1856.

Character.—Among the great lawyers of Georgia it is likely that most men would give the first place to Judge Berrien. Politician as he was, he never permitted his political life to oust his legal studies. At all times he combined extraordinary labor in his profession with whatever were the duties undertaken in the public service. Most men think of him as senator or statesman, but those who know him best remember him as the consummate lawyer. There are still living many who can recall his personal appearance before the court; tall, stately and handsome, he was the beau ideal of the barrister. Perhaps from nature, or more probably from association, his manners, extremely refined and polished, were as decidedly reserved, and had none of the geniality usually found in the men of his day. And when he wished to be cold the iceberg could be no colder. An old lawyer tells of an encounter between him and a young man who thought highly of himself, and, coming from Charleston, had panted for a trial against Berrien. At last he was gratified and had a case. Opening his argument at a table covered with books, he observed that Judge Berrien was constantly gazing at the ceiling with a wicked, sneering smile, while he twirled his eye glasses. At last Mr. C. was lashed into fury by the perpetual smile, and shouted to the court: "The gentleman may smile at me, but before I am done he will not smile at my law." At once Berrien arose to his full height, and said in his stateliest manner and most sonorous tones, laying his hand on his heart: "On my soul, may it please the court, I was neither thinking of the gentleman nor his laah." (He pronounced it nither.)

WILLIAM HARRIS CRAWFORD.

William Harris Crawford has been mentioned as one of Georgia's greatest lawyers, but not with perfect appropriateness. He was a great man, but his greatness found its work in statesmanship, and not in law. He practiced only six years in his whole life, from 1799 to 1806; and the six years of judicial life passed by him as judge of the superior court, from 1827 to 1834, can scarcely be counted as years of acquisition. Born in 1771 and dying in 1834, he passed nearly his whole life in Federal office after reaching manhood, and in this sketch of Georgia lawyers there is little place for him. Judge Garnett Andrews knew him well, and here is what he says of him as judge: "When he came on the bench he was so impaired, mentally and physically, by bad health, that he was but the wreck of what he had been, so much so that I doubt doing justice to the memory of so great a man whom I never knew in his prime. He was the largest man I ever saw to be so well proportioned, and his face and head indicated a brain of the highest order, as it no doubt was, when in full health. His greatness was manifested, not only by his talents, but by his stoicism (I know not what else to call it) by an indifference to all ostentation, and a disregard of mere effect. He never did anything with a view as to what might be said or thought of it. He was entirely above all the weakness, vanity, envy and such like contemptible passions, except prejudice, which the rest of mankind are more or less heir to. If he made a speech he thought nothing of the manner of delivery; if he wrote he thought nothing of the style, save to express his ideas clearly. He cared nothing to please, if he could convince. So, in society, he cared nothing for its conventionalities, not because he felt above or below them, but because he was so concerned about the practical, that he cared not to think of such matters; and after I knew him he carried it to such an extent that he seemed to be wanting, sometimes, in delicacy. I say seemed, for he never designed to hurt the feelings of anyone, but taking it for granted that all were as practical as himself, it did not occur to him that the sensibilities of others would suffer by the truth. To a lawyer who had repeated his argument until the judge had become bored, he impatiently exclaimed: 'Mr. C., you go round, and round, and round like a blind horse in a gin.' Clark and the Clark party having been his life-long political opponents, he never spared them, thinking that thereby he was honestly doing God and the country service, not understanding how delicacy should stand in the way of such a laudable object. Once, at Lincoln court, a witness was sworn whose evidence was the subject of not very complimentary remarks at the dinner-table, where two Clark men were present. Upon someone saying that the witness was an old Clark man, the judge replied: 'I thought so, I thought so.' George A. Young, now of Mississippi, as remarkable for his refinement, consideration and delicacy as the judge was for the want of them, said, to shield the two at the table: 'There were some very good and clever Clark men,' when the judge promptly replied: 'Mighty few, mighty few, mighty few.' Holding a two weeks' session of Wilkes court, he remained at his tavern on Sunday without going to church. At dinner his landlady, chiding him for it, said: 'Mr. H. had preached a "mighty good sermon,"' when the judge replied: 'Mrs. A., I presume you are like my mother, who would go to church and hear the veriest jackass preach and say, a mighty good sermon, a mighty good sermon.'

JOHN FORSYTH.

Much of what has been said of Crawford is equally true of another great Georgian, John Forsyth. Lawyer he was by profession, and little more of the lawyer he was. Admitted to the bar in 1802 and going to congress in 1811, from that day he was all statesman and no lawyer, to his death in 1841. His life has been written and anyone can read it. Orator, politician and statesman, he was an ornament to his state, of whom the state was justly proud. But he was no jurist, and we will pass to less aspiring men of much humbler fame.

JOHN M. DOOLY.

John M. Dooly's name is associated with the most humorous traditions of the bar of Georgia. Solicitor-general of the western circuit in 1802, and judge in 1816, his wit has made him famous. Says a contemporary. "When I first knew this extraordinary man he was in the prime of life, and I shall never forget the impression which his person made upon me. He had a large head, with a bold, elevated forehead, heavy eyebrows, prominent nose, small, compressed mouth, large, vivid, sparkling eyes, with long lashes, which, frequently opening and shutting, gave his countenance an expression as if under the influence of an electric battery, from which the beholder at first sight was almost sure to recoil. His peculiarity of voice, which was sharp and discordant, was well calculated of itself to get up attention from all within its reach. But there was a point, a special felicity of expression, in all he said, marked with a conciseness which showed him at once to advantage, and which silenced all other tongues when he spoke. The learned and the ignorant, the old and the young, all felt his power to please, and did him honor. It was his wit and sarcasm which gave him such power to please and to hurt. I never knew his equal in either, yet the very subject of his wit, from the happy manner in which it was played off upon him by the judge, was generally the first to join in the hearty laugh which it produced."

Another mirth-loving lawyer writes: "Like Charles II., Dooly could not only say good things to set off his bad deeds, but what was more fortunate, could say them of the deeds themselves, and always thus gild the pills of impropriety which he administered to the public. When up almost all night trying Holderness, the sheriff voluntarily placed a small pitcher on his bench, half filled with toddy (the pitcher—not the bench—the bench was dry) and when it was finished he told that officer to 'bring some more water out of the same well.' When he went to Buck Walker's faro table and broke the bank during Wilkes court, after having eloquently charged the grand jury against the vice and crime of gaming, he excused himself by saying, that 'finding he could not suppress it by the juries, he had to take that method to do it himself.' When at the bar Col. Dick Long got the better of him in a stick fight, he told the former that he 'need not be so proud of the victory, for it was no such great thing, as he had fought through six states and had never yet found any one he could whip.' When Mr. Tait, with a wooden leg, challenged him, his reply was that he 'could not fight Mr. Tait, as they would not be on an equality unless he, Dooly, could be permitted to put one leg in a beegum,' and on being told that he would be published as a coward, said he 'preferred filling two newspapers to one coffin.'" But these samples suffice—a good judge and a man of infinite jest.

ANDREW J. MILLER.

Andrew J. Miller was a specimen of the best of Georgia lawyers. He was born in 1806 and had too large a practice in Augusta and the eastern counties to accept judicial office at any time. He was easily the head of the bar of his day, and to his cool, clear mind his own professional brethren looked with perfect confidence. He was not selfish in his life, but gave himself and his abilities zealously to the state in its legislature for eighteen years. Probably, almost certainly, if he had lived he would have served in more conspicuous office as the time drew nigh when he could feel that he was entitled to the repose of a veteran of the bar, but death at fifty robbed the state of a great jurist and of a wise man of affairs.

PETER CONE.

In this account Judge Peter Cone cannot be omitted. "The most agreeable circuit companion I ever knew," said a contemporary, "besides being one of the ablest, if not the ablest, lawyers in the state. He had wit and inexhaustible humor that made his society on the circuit always agreeable. He once represented his county in the state senate, when he had several acts passed that were worth more than all the others of the session, and which will, no doubt, stand their ground almost without amendment, as long as Georgia shall have statutes. In the senate, as at the bar, his humor and wit enlivened very much that sedate body. The following is an instance of his capacity to make amusement out of anything and everything: When one of the candidates for doorkeeper came to his room, canvassing for his vote, the judge asked 'if he had ever kept a door;' being answered in the negative, he next asked the aspirant for portal honors if he had 'ever seen a door kept,' and receiving the same answer, he asked the seeker of votes if he had 'ever read a treatise on door-keeping,' and the answer disclosing that he had never gone through such a preparatory course, to learn the mysterious art of door-keeping, the judge told him that he was unfit for such a responsible and difficult office, but if he would get the proper books and study the art honestly and diligently for twelve months he should have his vote next year."

WILLIAM H. UNDERWOOD.

But more marked and extraordinary in his humor and wit than even Cone or Dooly was William H. Underwood, at one time judge of the western circuit. His name was famous from the mountains to the seacoast for the humor, the odd expressions, the fantastic manner in which he expressed himself about everything that came before him. We suppose that a volume could be written filled with the amusing sayings of Judge Underwood. Unfortunately, like most of the good things of the Georgia bar, they were unwritten, and will die with the lives of the men who heard them or to whom they were told. Judge Garnett Andrews has rescued a few of Judge Underwood's jests from oblivion, and no apology need be made for giving them in his words: "I found him at the bar when I was admitted, rugged in appearance as was his mind. He had an un-lawyerlike look, stammered or rather spoke with difficulty, but he had that all-important element of a lawyer—an ability to see the strong points of a case, as well as a searching discrimination, which could always see the true difference between things not the same, however much like they might appear to some. He was then esteemed a humorist rather than a wit. Before he died he was an eloquent advocate, as well as a profound lawyer, and decidedly the greatest wit of his day in the state. The convictions of his conclusions, whether as lawyer or politician, were painfully intense, so much so, that he was nearly his whole life on the weak side in the latter. He was held by his logic with a cord so strong that he was obliged to follow, let it lead where it might. He not only grew in knowledge and eloquence, but in wit—which of all gifts is thought to be the most independent of cultivation—so that in the latter years of his life he was even superior to Dooly in this captivating quality of the mind. He had a slow and distinct utterance of every word and syllable that gave a raciness to all he said. Of many good things said by him I can recollect but few. The first and about the beginning of his reputation for wit was at Oglethorpe court, when the solicitor and his immediate predecessor were disputing over that old bone of contention, the costs made by the latter and collected by the former, from fines imposed during his term. The incumbent, after a long and heated argument, closed by saying he was 'not very fastidious about it no how,' when Underwood promptly replied: 'I now understand the derivation of the misunderstood word, fas-tid-i-ous, which I now learn means, to hold fast and for a long te-di-ous time.' Arguing with the usual fervor of his convictions, before a judge reputed to have been very arbitrary, he was arrested, with Blackstone in hand, by his honor announcing he 'decided against him and did not wish to hear any more law or argument.' Underwood answered: 'By no means do I wish to read law with any expectation of convincing your honor, but only to show what a great fool Blackstone was.'

"Gold had been discovered in the Cherokee country in fabulous quantities, it was believed. The lands were to be disposed of by lottery, and everybody entitled to draw looked on the Indian attorney as one who delayed their possession of a fortune. He was in consequence in danger of lynch law, then being inaugurated to the great disgrace of the country. The Indians refusing to sell their lands, Georgia had extended her laws over the whole of their territory, at which the indignation of Judge Underwood was lofty and in its furiousness, to some, amusing. Living near the Alabama line, he practiced in some of the courts of that state, and on occasion he was taunted by a young 'squirt' of the profession with 'not understanding what was law in Alabama, that the law of the gentleman from Georgia might do for that state, but he would inform him that Georgia law was not in force in Alabama.' Underwood, in reply, among other things, said: 'My young friend has reminded me that I could not introduce Georgia law into his state, and, with much confidence, repeated the assertion. I think the young man is rather premature in his boastful congratulations, for I will let him understand that of which he seems to be ignorant, to-wit: that Georgia takes the liberty of extending her laws over all the adjacent savage tribes, and, what concerns the young man personally still more, with very little evidence or ceremony she hangs or sends to the penitentiary all the young savages that traduce her, or are in any manner in her way.'

At this time Gen. Jackson was at the height of his popularity, and having taken strong measures for the removal of the Indians, was more popular in Georgia, perhaps, than in any other state; and for that reason, more unpopular with Judge Underwood than any other man in the United States, and he took every occasion to give his opinion of that distinguished individual. To the astonishment of all of his friends, he delivered a Fourth of July oration at the court house of his county town, and some of them having expressed their surprise that a gentleman of his age and distinction should occupy his time with such an insignificant matter, he gave as a reason that he not only wished to abuse Gen. Jackson before a large audience but also by authority. He, too, like Judge Dooly, had his controversies with his landlords at the taverns, but, unlike Dooly, all in a good humored way. At a court, thinking his landlord was remiss, he asked John Mabry if he had taken the oath of the special bailiff. "Why?" asked Mr. Mabry, the landlord. "Because you have kept us without meat, drink or fire—candlelight and water only excepted; and that is the oath which is administered to the bailiff before he takes charge of the jury, John Mabry, and from the way you have kept us in this court I thought you must have taken it. If you have, John Mabry, I can certify you have scrupulously observed it." He never forsook horseback and saddle bags while I knew him for buggies or railroads, and always rode a fine animal, about which he felt great anxiety. Stopping all night with Charter Campbell of Madison, when his bill was presented next morning, he said: "Well! Mr. Campbell, do you really think I owe you three dollars for the entertainment of me and my gray horse, Cherokee?" "Oh, yes, judge! It is a fair and usual charge." "Well, Mr. Campbell, if the poet had stopped with you instead of saying 'man wants but little here below nor wants that little long,' he might have said, 'If man has but little here below, and stops with you, he will not have that little long.'"

During the know-nothing campaign a drummer, recommending his tavern, said it was a "know-nothing house," when Judge Underwood replied: "Well! If the landlord knows less than Jim Toney—his old landlord of the tavern—I shall not risk myself with him." Having been asked the politics of a friend, whom he accused of fickleness, he said: "I can't say, for I have not seen him since dinner." Judge Thomas of Elbert—in which county Underwood once lived—meeting him, said the people of that county would like to see him there, and he (Thomas) thought he could make a pleasant visit to the old place. "Yes," said Judge Underwood, "there is an honest stupidity about the people of Elbert which is amusing, and which I rather like." Some citizen of the county, who took the remark of Underwood as offensive, meeting him afterward, rebukingly said he ought to take it back. "Well," said the judge, "I will take part of it back, and since the county voted for Buchanan I will withdraw the word 'honest.'" As I before intimated, he was the most independent man in politics in the state, of his distinction. Often, not caring for the red rose or white, guelph nor ghibelline, he would thrust, right and left, his sharp cimeter into all who exposed themselves to his wit. However, in the latter part of his life he seemed to have settled down in opposition to democracy as indicated by another anecdote. Howell Cobb having made an appointment to speak at Lumpkin court on Tuesday, for some cause, postponed it until the next day, the day for taking up the criminal docket, according to the practice of the court. Underwood asking the reason of the postponement, and not receiving a satisfactory answer, said: "I think it a very proper time, as that is the day for taking up the democratic docket, and if the defendants all should appear there will be a very general turnout of the party." For a long time he was accused of being an old Federalist of the John Adams school, which, in Georgia then, was little short of a charge of theft, and having been taunted with it by a politician, who said: "There have always been but two parties in the country, and we class you with the Federalists, for all know that is your place." "Yes," said Underwood, "there have always been two parties, Federalists and fools, and I have never heard you accused of belonging to the Federalists." "On being importuned to move to the town of Marietta, he said he would not like to live there, but thought it the best place to die in that he knew of, and gave as the reason that he could leave it with fewer regrets than any other place in the world. And what may seem to be a strange coincidence, he died in Marietta."

But the patience of readers will not permit separate mention of the scores of really able and distinguished lawyers, educated and trained in the forum of our superior courts. To be even fairly faithful it should include Thomas W. Cobb, who resigned his seat in the senate of the United States to run for the superior court bench; Upson, considered by many the profoundest lawyer in the state; George R. Gilmer (sometime governor), who foamed and spat upon the jury; Oliver Hillhouse Prince, the delightful companion and inveterate jester; Duncan G. Campbell, father of the late Associate Justice John A. Campbell, and himself a fine orator; John A. Heard, quick at points, and ready in reply; Tom Peter Carnes, full of law and fun; Thomas S. Foster, of Greensboro, more politician than lawyer; Eli S. Shorter, of powers that would have sustained him in any position; Richard Henry Wilde, the courtly gentleman with poetic fancy—but the task is impossible. Mere mention of names is too perfunctory, and more than mere mention is beyond the occasion. Still it would be unpardonable should we leave this delightful theme without the mention of two names, both of which came into prominence toward the end of the period of which we are thinking. Of the first of these men, Thomas R. R. Cobb, we shall see more when we come to the code of Georgia, of which he was largely the parent. But the second ought to be spoken of now.

HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON.

The very spot of his birth, now little but ruins, marks emphatically the difference between his early days and ours. The writer has often passed the ruined homestead in old Burke county where Gov. Johnson was born. There is nothing now that shows the home by the roadside except a clump of bushes on the old red Georgia hill, one of those hills of which our poet Lanier sang so tunefully and hopefully. Johnson was a university of Georgia man and early disclosed great power of mind and strength of will. He addressed himself early to political life and was elected governor of Georgia in 1853. His unusually solid qualities made him so conspicuous in the Union that in 1860 he was nominated for the vice-presidency, with Stephen A. Douglas for president. But it was not until after the civil war that the greatness of Gov. Johnson exhibited itself, yet in a manner that found no response in the sympathies of his fellow countrymen. When the dreadful conflict had ended in the defeat of the south, and provisional governments took the place of governments by election, when petty officers were lording it in insolent style over every county under the title of the Freedman's bureau, when no man knew what would be the fate of his state, his person, or his property, when Gov. Brown had returned from the Old Capitol prison, with advice to the people whom he had recently urged to the bitterest war, to accept the inevitable with open arms, and to embrace the doctrines of their late enemies, in order that, with the doctrines, they might reap the substantial benefits; when B. H. Hill was writing his Notes on the Situation, pressing upon the people the policy of resistance by peaceable methods to every attempt of the north to impose upon the south the legal and illegal results of the war—then came a letter from Johnson, as grand a letter as was ever written by man, in which he declared equally against servility and childish rage. "Preserve your self-respect," was his message to his people, "and in good season all things must come right for you." This generation is not in position to decide whether the fortunes of the south would have been better or worse if she had heeded these words rather than hastily re-entered the union which she had as hastily left, groaning under invariably corrupt elections, and critical of dishonest repudiations; but posterity may possibly be more severe upon us than we are now upon ourselves. The last years of Gov. Johnson's life were spent upon the bench of the superior court. His career had been too much that of a politician to permit him to be also a profound lawyer; but, like Crawford, he presented the spectacle of a very great man on the bench administering more in the nature of a personal law than the law of statutes and books. Many still remember his charges to the grand juries. In them he would put all the power of his splendid intellect, and as he would solemnly place before his juries the duties incumbent upon them his charge would be unconsciously converted into such a grand and eloquent oration as men have seldom heard elsewhere.

FIFTH PERIOD. GEORGIA UNDER A SUPREME COURT, 1846-1895.

We come now to the point in the history of the state when it was last seen by the people that the arbitrary power of a single judge must have its check by the revision of another tribunal, and to the establishment of its supreme court. In 1835 the constitution was amended, and the supreme court authorized the following provision: "The supreme court shall consist of three judges, who shall be elected by the legislature for such term of years as shall be prescribed by law, and shall continue in office until their successors shall be elected and qualified, removable by the governor on two-thirds of both branches of the general assembly for that purpose, or by impeachment and conviction thereon. The said court shall have no original jurisdiction, but shall be a court alone for the trial and correction of errors in law and equity from the superior courts of the several circuits, and shall sit at least once a year, at a time to be prescribed by law, in each of five judicial circuits to be hereafter laid off and designated by the legislature for the purpose, at the most central point in such judicial district, or at such other point in each district as shall be by the general assembly ordained, for the trial and determination of writs of error from the several superior courts included in such judicial districts." Although this amendment would seem to fully authorize the establishment of a supreme court, effect was not given to it until Dec. 10, 1845, and not until the people had in 1843 reaffirmed their desire for a supreme court. Into the causes of this delay it is not necessary to examine, but the supreme court, as now constructed, has always been traced, so far as its birth is concerned, to the constitutional amendment of 1843, and not to that of 1835.

The act which carried the amendment of the constitution into effect reads partially as follows:

"1. Sec. 1. Be it enacted, That in pursuance of the first section of the third article of the constitution, there shall be, and it is hereby established, a court for the correction of errors, to be called the supreme court of the state of Georgia; the said court shall consist of three judges, who shall be elected at the present session of the general assembly; one, for the term of six years; one, for the term of four years; and one for the term of two years, during which terms they shall respectively hold their offices, unless sooner removed, in the manner pointed out by the constitution. No person shall be eligible to the office of judge unless he shall have been duly admitted and licensed to plead and practice in the courts of law and equity in this state, ten years, at least, prior to his election.

"2. Sec. 2. The said supreme court shall be holden at the times and places following, to-wit: On the second Monday in January and third Monday in June, in each year, for the first district, to be composed of the eastern and southern judicial circuits, alternately at Savannah and Hawkinsville. On the fourth Mondays in January and July in each, for the second district, to be composed of the southwestern and Chattahoochee circuits, alternately at Talbotton and Americus. On the second Mondays in February and August in each year, for the third district, to be composed of the Coweta and Flint judicial circuits, alternately at Decatur and Macon. On the fourth Mondays in March and September in each year for the fourth district, to be composed of the western and Cherokee circuits, alternately at Cassville and Gainesville. On the first Mondays in May and November in each year for the fifth district, to be composed of the middle, northern and Ocmulgee judicial circuits, at the city of Milledgeville."

Since the organization of the court under this provision it has remained substantially as created by that act, the chief change being in the concentration of the court and its records at Atlanta, the seat of government, thus reversing the peripatetic manner in which the court had been held from circuit to circuit.

THE NEW SUPREME COURT.

We have thus arrived at the time when there was again a chief justice in Georgia—fifty-six years since the last one sat—now with two associate justices.

JOSEPH HENRY LUMPKIN.

The first chief justice was Joseph Henry Lumpkin, who was elected with Hiram Warner and Eugenius A. Nisbet, they being associate justices. For the purpose of inaugurating the new court it would have been difficult to have found in this state men better qualified. Judge Warner may be said to have been the exponent of hard common sense on the bench; Judge Nisbet full of profound erudition in decided cases; while Judge Lumpkin was the man above all others to carry the courts forward in the line of progress and simplification favored by the people, but distasteful to the older lawyers. The profession of law is always conservative, and prefers to abide by decided precedents rather than to enter upon untried paths. The tendency of the age has been and is to curtail words and simplify proceedings; but in almost every state attempts in that direction have been met by "strict construction" from the bench under the specious insistence of the side of a case benefited by that method. The people of Georgia desired the simplification sought in other states; but it required all the force and authority of Judge Lumpkin to give effect to his desire. It may well be conceded that but for his determination in this respect the simplifying statutes would have been construed and chipped away until the spirit embodied in them was wholly dead.

Doubtless there was somewhat more of oratory in his decisions than is usually found in reports, and it is possible that they are open to the criticism of being emotional. But the service that he performed to the state from 1846 to his death in 1867 was invaluable, and cannot be too highly rated. He cut away the bonds of words by which legal measures were fettered, and for all time set the precedent for liberal construction of remedial statutes in the practice of law.

HIRAM WARNER.

Judge Hiram Warner has already been mentioned as appointed associate justice in 1846. He remained on the bench until he resigned in 1853; and was again appointed—this time chief justice—in 1867. Again he took his seat as associate justice in 1869; but upon the resignation of Chief Justice Lochrane in 1872 he again became chief justice and remained so until he resigned in 1880, dying in 1882. He was a man of profound common sense, well versed in the law; a man of great firmness, inflexible in his opinions and methods, passionately attached to the settled principles of law and to the constitutions of the nation and state; disdainful of political views as controlling legal construction, and altogether scornful of expediency and inconsistency. We shall see more of him in another place.

EUGENIUS A. NISBET.

A glance at the decisions of the supreme court from 1846 to 1853 will show what an admirable lawyer Judge Nisbet was. Always safe and sound, his opinions evince hard study and thorough examination. Judge Nisbet was born in 1803, and lived eighteen years after he left the bench, dying in 1871. Nothing is more curious in the history of Georgia than that the two most ardent and stalwart champions of secession in the convention of 1861 were Eugenius A. Nisbet, the venerable ex-justice and conservative jurist, and Thomas R. R. Cobb, Georgia's greatest lawyer—both men of profoundest piety and submission and devotion to the commands of Christ.

EBENEZER STARNES.

Judge Warner was succeeded in 1853 by Ebenezer Starnes of Augusta. Here again we have on the bench a most admirable lawyer of the old school. Judge Starnes had a large practice, from which he was tempted to go to the bench, and which he was able to regain fully in 1856 on his return to the bar. His decisions, like Judge Nisbet's, disclose the well-equipped jurist. Judge Starnes died about 1870. It was said of him by men of his day, that he was cold and indifferent to others. How little we know of our fellow-man is illustrated by this case. The writer remembers well a young man who went to Judge Starnes for advice as to studying law. There was no tie of blood or marriage that called for especial sympathy or help; but Judge Starnes at once put everything aside and went into the whole business; ending by urging the young man to come to him for examinations; and then took him out to walk. Passing a book store the judge carried his young friend in and introduced him to the owner. "Mr. Richards," said he, "this young gentleman may want some books. Let him have all he wants and send the bill to me." Then to his young friend confidentially, "You see, you young fellows have not much since the war, and I want you now to buy a full library—all the books you need—and some day you will make a big fee and can settle with me." And yet to this poor, blind world he passed as hard—he, whose heart was big enough to have furnished a dozen ordinary men.

HENRY L. BENNING.

Judge Nisbet was succeeded in 1856 by Henry L. Benning. Judge Benning sat until 1860. He entered the Confederate army, served as brigadier-general and died in 1875. He was much better fitted for the practice of law than for the supreme bench. At the bar he was adroit and eloquent and no one was more beloved and admired.

CHARLES J. M'DONALD.

Judge Starnes was followed in 1856 by ex-Gov. McDonald, who was one of the ablest, if not the ablest judge that Georgia ever had, uniting the qualities of statesman to that of jurist. He was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1793. He early became one of the democratic party of the state, and was elected governor in 1839. After his retirement to private life he resumed the practice of law and successfully followed it until he went to the supreme bench, where he remained until his resignation in 1859. He lived only a short time after leaving the bench, dying in 1860. His decisions are models of learning and forcible reasoning.

LINTON STEPHENS.

The seat of Judge McDonald was filled in 1859 by Judge Linton Stephens. Judge Stephens was always a better lawyer than his eloquent brother, and his tenure of the bench was a source of satisfaction to the bar. He was born in 1823; practiced law in Hancock and adjoining counties; and was considered one of the best equipped jurists in the state. He remained on the bench until his resignation in 1860. He died in 1872.

RICHARD F. LYON.

Judge Lyon was elected to the bench in 1860, following Judge Benning. He was a big burly man, full of energy and industry, but, like Judge Benning, was never as much at home on the bench as he was at the bar. He was born in 1817 and remained on the bench from 1860 until 1866, when, his term expiring, he resumed practice, and followed it as laboriously as the youngest member until he died in 1892.

CHARLES J. JENKINS.

We have in Judge Charles J. Jenkins another of Georgia's great judges—one who like McDonald was as much statesman as lawyer. Gov. Jenkins was born in Beaufort district, S. C., and being bred to the bar, as usual exhibited a taste for political life. But he was on the whig side—the losing side in Georgia politics in those days—and although his reputation for ability, eloquence, learning and integrity became very great, he played no successful part in Georgia politics until after the civil war. In 1860 he was appointed to the supreme bench in the place of Judge Stephens and there displayed his powers of logic and great erudition of law, until he was made the first governor of Georgia elected by the people upon the re-establishment of civil government in 1865. When under the reconstruction measures of congress that civil government was again swept away, Gov. Jenkins, with perfect dignity and the abiding respect and applause of his people, retired from the governor's chair never again to appear in public life. His death occurred in 1883.

DAWSON A. WALKER.

Upon the expiration of Justice Lyon's term of office in 1866 he was succeeded by Dawson A. Walker, one of the most admirable judges who ever sat upon Georgia's supreme bench. Judge Walker came originally from Tennessee, where he was born in 1819; but in 1845 removed to Murray county, Ga., and entered upon the practice of law. After having held the office of judge of the Cherokee judicial circuit, he was elected to the supreme bench of Georgia, but remained but two years on the bench, his term expiring in 1868. Judge Walker was pre-eminently a lawyer, full of profound learning in his profession, and gifted with very clear methods of expression. The end of his term upon the bench was a misfortune to the state, for she lost thereby one of the best judges who ever served her. After leaving the bench he returned to the practice of law in Dalton, Ga., where he remained the object of the respect of his fellow-citizens until his death in 1881, notwithstanding the adoption by him of political views hostile to the white majority in the state, and his quiet life was broken only by his candidacy for the governorship of the state in 1873, and by the filling of a Federal office for a short time.

IVERSON L. HARRIS.

Iverson L. Harris was elected to the bench in 1866, and remained until 1868. He was born a Georgian and entered Franklin college (now the state university) in 1820 and was graduated with honor in 1823. He was admitted to the bar after a short course of study and in 1859 was raised to the bench of the superior court of Ocmulgee circuit, where he remained until he was elected to the supreme bench. He died in 1876, full of years and honors, having attained the good old age of three score and ten. Judge Harris was a bold and rapid thinker, and with his large intellectual endowments, legal learning and innate sense of justice, could not have failed to attain success on the bench of the highest court of the state. He held with even hand the scales of justice and was far above the plane of favoritism or bias toward the litigant or advocate.

JOSEPH E. BROWN.

In 1869 ex-Gov. Joseph E. Brown was elected chief justice to succeed Chief Justice Warner, who thus became an associate justice only. Gov. Brown was governor of the state at the commencement of the civil war, and was the champion of the democratic party in Georgia and an ultra secessionist. After the war he was elected chief justice by the republican legislature, having associated himself with that party in the state. Judge Brown was too much in political life and high office to have been at any time a very profound lawyer. His chief characteristic was astuteness in public—perhaps also in private—affairs. He had that keen, cool judgment which led him to see intuitively what course would be most profitable to him from the standpoint of worldly wisdom. That judgment was not as useful always to his fellow men as to himself, or it is possible that Georgia would not have seceded, that the dreadful civil war would not have been. In his own ideal of life he was pre-eminently successful. From a superior court judgeship, in which he displayed neither great learning nor eloquence, to become the most popular governor of his state; from a mere governor of a state to become the most potent instrument in lighting the torch of civil war, and—next to Davis—the most famous civilian in the south; from the head of a seceding state to become the persistent opponent of the Confederate government in its struggles for life, and to have endeared himself to thousands of his people by his resistance to the Confederate congress; from a captive governor of a belligerent state to become the acceptor and champion of the conquerors of his people; from a secessionist democrat to become the republican chief justice of the state; from the republican office-holder and the name upon which the people spat, to become the democratic senator, revered and all powerful until he died; and, above all, in the midst of ruined fortunes and beggared respectability, on every hand around him, to have grown richer steadily and unceasingly, not only in wisdom and honors, but in money; and from a poor country judge to have died one of the wealthiest men in Georgia—surely here was success indeed, and that of such an extraordinary kind as pointed him out the possessor of abilities not every day or everywhere to be found.

If, at the end of the civil war, the people of Georgia could have been imbued with the spirit of Gov. Brown, and could have followed his example in every detail; if a whole people could have been found capable of cool calculation; if they could have turned from bitter war to warm friendship with their enemies; if they could have divested themselves of all memory of the useless spilling of the blood of gallant sons and brothers; if they could have ignored the manner in which the struggle had been for many years steadily forced upon the south; if from the graves of the slain and the smoke of ruined homes they could have turned to embrace their conquerors and to advocate their measures; if, knowing the colored race as they did, they could not only have cheerfully acquiesced in their freedom, but could have welcomed them into the ranks of equal citizens, and could have looked forward with willingness to the exercise of a voting and governing power which, in the nature of things, must be, for long years at least, a purchasable commodity, that people would have gone down to history as one so far devoid of the usual emotions of the human heart, or as far above them, that they could be classed only with the mythical races—the Cyclops and the Centaurs of the pre-historic world. It is essential that the reader should understand to some extent Chief Justice Brown's career to fully comprehend an episode that occurred between him and Judge Warner while on the same bench in 1869—a fierce conflict that can be found in the decisions of that time—such a conflict as never happened before and, it is to be devoutly hoped, will never happen again; a conflict in which the dissenting justice, Warner, expressed himself as unwilling to be “embalmed in judicial infamy,” and in which the chief justice replied by repelling the idea of his having “pharasaical pretensions;” a conflict which the bar regarded with horror and disgust. Yet it grew out of the very qualities of Chief Justice Brown and Justice Warner, to which allusion has been made. The war had ended in utter ruin to the people of the south. Losing a large part of their possessions, they still owed debts—in many instances to northern people. The legislatures, accepting the theory of repudiation enforced upon them by congress in certain classes of debts, were inclined to go farther in the same direction between man and man than was compatible with constitutional prohibitions. Various statutes were passed looking to the relief of the debtor class, and affecting in terms the remedy, but really striking at the cause of action. All such legislation found in Warner a stern opponent whenever it contravened the constitution of the United States and practically impaired the obligation of contracts. Lawyer in all his thoughts, he could not bring himself to ignore the law because of wish to relieve. On the other hand, the chief justice, facile and expedient, was not only in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the statutes, but was abundantly willing to give effect to them whenever, by any plausible reasoning, they could be sustained. The angry spirit of the old-time lawyer rebelled against subterfuges and sophisms, as well as against the politician giving utterance to them, and in his wrath he struck the bench itself, and the chief justice replied by sneers and disclaimers that were unworthy of that bench. The right of the matter was demonstrated by the supreme court of the United States, which sustained Judge Warner in most of his dissents, but the temper of the controversy will always remain in the Georgia reports to puzzle the students as to the real cause of so much judicial heat. After his retirement from the bench Gov. Brown went to the senate of the United States, where he remained until shortly before he died. No man ever lived in Georgia whose course and methods were in the end more conclusively successful.

HENRY K. McCAY.

Judge Henry K. McCay, who became associate justice in 1869 and resigned in 1875, was one of the acutest minds ever upon that bench. He loved reasoning for its own sake, and delighted in the subtlest forms of logic. A fine lawyer, he gave great satisfaction to the bar, while it may be regretted that he devoted his best powers to sustaining the unconstitutional legislation that Judge Warner as steadily opposed. But in those heats that then and there arose on the bench, Judge McCay bore himself calmly and with dignity. He was always regarded as the jurist of the supreme court while he was on it, and his resignation was deeply regretted. After that happened he was appointed district judge of the United States for the northern circuit, which position he filled until he died in 1886.

He was born in Northumberland county, Pa., on Jan. 8, 1820. He graduated from Princeton college in 1839 and shortly thereafter came to Georgia to live. He studied law in the office of Chief Justice Lumpkin, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. In the war between the states he served in the army of northern Virginia, under Stonewall Jackson, during several campaigns. At its close he was brigadier-general of state troops. He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution in 1868, and many of its wisest provisions were the results of his efforts and influence.

OSBORNE A. LOCHRANE.

Upon the resignation of Chief Justice Brown, Osborne A. Lochrane was appointed chief justice, and filled that office for a short time, resigning in December of 1871 to re-enter the practice of law. Judge Lochrane was born in Ireland in 1829 and had all the traditional wit and humor of his nation. He came to New York in 1846 and traveled thence to Athens, Ga. While a clerk in a drug store he was encouraged by Judge Lumpkin to study law, in the pursuit of which he soon found success and eminence. He first practiced in Savannah in 1850, but went from there to Macon in the same year. In 1861 he was appointed judge of the Macon circuit, and was twice re-elected—afterward appointed judge of the Atlanta circuit in 1870. Adopting republican tenets, he was appointed the successor of Chief Justice Brown upon the supreme bench. Judge Lochrane was much more ready and eloquent than profound. No one was ever a better companion, and no one ever encountered the vicissitudes of life with a more cheerful or a brighter spirit. After he left the bench he returned to the practice of law, in which he remained until his death in Atlanta in 1887.

WILLIAM W. MONTGOMERY.

Judge Warner becoming chief justice in 1872, William W. Montgomery, of Augusta, was appointed associate justice in his place. This able and scholarly judge is still living, and cannot, therefore, be further mentioned in this sketch.

R. P. TRIPPE.

After the expiration of Judge Montgomery's term of office in 1873, Robert P. Trippe was elected to succeed him. Judge Trippe sat until he resigned in 1875. He was one of the best of a not unusual type of men in Georgia—more the advocate than jurist—more politician than lawyer. Eloquent and practical, his true position was rather before the jury than on the bench. But his common sense, straightforwardness, and conscientious devotion to his work made him a most acceptable judge, and his resignation was greatly regretted.

LOGAN E. BLECKLEY.

Judge Trippe was succeeded by Logan E. Bleckley. Judge Bleckley had been long one of Georgia's most distinguished lawyers when he went on the bench, and since that time has filled a prominent place in the public mind. He resigned in 1879 because of overwork, but was appointed chief justice in 1887, which place he filled until he resigned again from the same cause in 1894. He is still living and further comment would not be in place.

JAMES JACKSON.

At the same time that Judge Bleckley was elected the other vacant seat was filled by James Jackson, who subsequently, upon the resignation of Judge Warner in 1880, became chief justice—so remaining until his death in 1887. Judge Jackson came from stanch Georgia ancestry. He was the grandson of the Senator Jackson—afterward governor—who so bitterly fought the Yazoo fraud and overcame its friends. Judge Jackson was a man of great warmth of heart and kindness of feeling and received and retained the loyalty and affection of the entire bar of the state.

MARTIN J. CRAWFORD.

Upon the resignation of Judge Bleckley in 1880 Martin J. Crawford was appointed in his place. Judge Crawford was born in Jasper county on March 17, 1820, and died in 1883. He began to study law at an early age and was admitted to the bar by a special act of the legislature before he was nineteen years of age. In 1854 he was appointed judge of the superior court of the Chattahoochee circuit. In 1855 he was elected to congress. He was one of the delegates from Georgia to the provisional congress of the Confederate States at Montgomery, Ala. He felt it his duty to serve his country in war as well as in peace, and raised a regiment of cavalry and was elected its colonel and remained with it until he was captured. Judge Crawford was an able and astute lawyer. Whatever was before him he gave it his best efforts. His decisions are clear and concise and show both his learning and labor.

WILLIS A. HAWKINS.

What has been said of Judge Trippe is equally true of Judge Hawkins. He was appointed in 1880 to fill a short term made vacant by the resignation of Judge Warner and the promotion of Judge Jackson to the chief justiceship. It was his misfortune to be on the bench for less than four months, but in that short period he made a good record as the reports will show. He was born in Madison county, Ga., Jan. 15, 1825, was admitted to the bar on May 7, 1846. When the civil war began he raised a company which became a part of the famous Twelfth Georgia, of which he became the colonel. He died on Nov. 28, 1886, and left a memory as an eloquent and able advocate, a fair and fearless jurist, a true and faithful friend.

ALEXANDER M. SPEER.

Judge Alexander M. Speer, who is still living, was elected in 1880 and served but a short time—until 1882.

SAMUEL HALL.

In the person of Judge Samuel Hall the supreme bench acquired one of the best lawyers in the state. He was elected in 1882 and died on Aug. 28, 1887, while on the bench. He was born in Chester district, S. C., on Oct. 20, 1820. His father moved to Georgia in 1837 and he was graduated from Franklin college, afterward the university of Georgia, in 1841. He was admitted to practice of law in the superior court of Crawford county in 1842. He took some interest in politics, but the law suited the natural turn of his mind. He was eminently an upright judge and in searching for the truth and to arrive at the right he spared no time or trouble. It can truly be said of this eminent jurist, that he lived honestly, ill-used nobody and gave everyone his due, both as a man and as a judge.

M. H. BLANDFORD.

Martin J. Crawford was succeeded by Judge M. H. Blandford in 1883. His term expired in 1890 and he resumed the practice of law at his home in Columbus, where he still lives.

THE PRESENT BENCH.

This enumeration brings us to the present bench, composed of Thomas J. Simmons, who was first elected associate justice in 1887, and became chief justice in 1894, on the resignation of Judge Bleckley. Samuel Lumpkin was elected in 1891; and Spencer R. Atkinson was elected in 1894. It would be a pleasant task to present the careers of these gentlemen, but one that must be denied the writer, in pursuance of the character and limitations of this sketch.

We cannot forbear, however, the expression of regret that the supreme court of Georgia is not placed in circumstances more in accord with the wishes of its members and the necessities of the bar and people. To-day, in the granite capitol, they examine the decisions in nearly a thousand cases a year, with the same assistance—and no more—than their predecessors had in 1846 when they revised one-fifth of that number. They are expected to hear, examine, study, decide, and write their decisions in such a number of causes as is beyond the power of any three or ten living men. Overworked—tasked beyond any human strength—they go through their conscientious discharge of duty, hoping, almost beyond hope, that the people will devise some means of help, and so order their duties that they will be able to point to their work with self-approval, in that the work is not only done, but well done, to the satisfaction of the bar and the bench of other states.

GEORGIA UNDER A CODE OF LAWS.

The most important product of the bar of Georgia has been the code of the state—a measure, of course, ordered and approved by the legislature, but from beginning to end the work of members of the bar. The gravity of this undertaking will be more fully understood when it is known that it is the only code of its kind in the United States. In most states there are so-called codes of laws; which upon examination will be found to be but compilations of existing statutory laws. Very likely in most instances the compilers would have been daring enough to have attempted what was accomplished by the writers of the Georgia code; but apparently, and probably justly, they have doubted the extent of their powers, and have refrained from any other work than bare compilation. The writer remembers the desire in that direction of the codifiers of Maryland laws, who examined all accessible codes, approved of that of Georgia as the best code in the world, and regretfully decided that they held no such commission as that used by Cobb, Irwin and Clark.

Codification was not a new topic in Georgia in 1860. As far back as 1827 Gov. Forsyth had brought the matter to the attention of the legislature, pointing out that the eighteenth section of the third article of the constitution provided "that within five years after the adoption of this constitution the body of our law, civil and criminal, shall be revised, digested, and arranged under proper heads, and promulgated in such manner as the legislature may direct." To carry into effect this section of the constitution an act was passed by the general assembly on Dec. 6, 1792. Other acts having relation to the subject were consequently passed, but contemplating only codification of statute laws. Gov. Forsyth insisted that the authors of the constitution obviously contemplated the revision, digest, and arrangement of the written and unwritten law of the state; and that the terms "the body of our law, civil and criminal," were general, and comprehended within their scope the common law equally with the statute. He therefore urged the matter upon the attention of the legislature; but while it was duly referred, for some reason unknown it never found shape in any action.

The subject was revived in 1858 by George A. Gordon of Savannah. The circumstances cannot be better described than by the words of Judge Richard H. Clark, one of the codifiers himself.

It has proven fortunate for the state that by it legislation necessary to perfect her political and judicial system has been secured, which, if done gradually, would not even now be done, perhaps never. Under this change of laws, making up of new laws, and repealing of old laws, there was a grave constitutional question, but fortunately, before it was made the code was adopted by the constitutions of 1861, then of '68, and repeated by the constitution of '77. At the time of the law providing for a code, there were but few codes in the United States. As I remember, five in number—those of Virginia, Alabama, Tennessee, California and Louisiana. Codes were not popular. Codes were deemed impracticable, to a particular extent impossible. Georgia had been a state nearly a century, and had not felt the need of a code. Prince's digest of 1837, succeeded by Cobb's of 1850, seemed all that was necessary, and when the legislature of 1858 made provision for a code, and a code that would be such an innovation, the whole state was surprised. Indeed, the legislature was itself taken by surprise. The history of it is this: George A. Gordon was a member of the house from Chatham. He was a young lawyer, aged only twenty-eight years. He had married in Huntsville, Ala., and of course made visits to that place. There he intermingled with many of the best lawyers of that state. He heard them extol the code of Alabama, adopted in 1852. He examined and fell in love with the Alabama code, particularly with its plan and style. He determined Georgia should, if he could accomplish it, have a code on the plan of the Alabama. He went further. He conceived the idea of codification of the common law of force in Georgia. In pursuance of this purpose you will find by reference to the house journal of 1858, that on Nov. 29, among other bills introduced by Mr. Gordon of Chatham was one to provide for the codification of the laws of Georgia. By that bill the prospective code was to be on the plan of the Alabama code, "which should as near as practicable, embrace, in a condensed form, the laws of Georgia, whether derived from the common law, the constitutions, the statutes of the state, the decisions of the supreme court, or the statutes of England in force in the state." The law also prescribed that the legislature was to elect three commissioners to execute the work. It is manifest from this statement that the design of the code, including the feature that distinguishes it from other codes, originated with Mr. Gordon. There is some doubt as to who is the author of the judiciary act of 1799, that then distinguished Georgia from her sister states mainly by abolishing special pleading, but there is no doubt that George A. Gordon was the originator of the code of Georgia, and that his efforts and influence secured the law requiring it.

So much for the origin and design of the code. Now, as to its execution.

The commissioners elected by the legislature to compile the code were Iverson L. Harris, David Irwin and Herschel V. Johnson. Judge Irwin was the only one of those elected who consented to act, and with him were associated Thomas R. R. Cobb and Richard H. Clark.

THOMAS R. R. COBB.

Mr. Cobb was one of the most remarkable men of this or any other time. Born in Athens, Ga., in 1823, he was but thirty-nine years of age when he lost his life as a Confederate brigadier at Fredericksburg. To any one who lived in Georgia, and therefore, as a matter of course, knew Gen. Cobb's reputation at the bar in the time that he carefully eschewed public life; to those who knew of him as the grave professor of law in the state law school—to those who were aware of his part in the preparation of the incomparable code of the state—and all lawyers knew of it; to those who saw his enormous influence exercised in the affairs of the state in 1861, when enthusiasm had seized him and made his judgment captive; to all who knew, as nearly all did, that in talent, legal knowledge, industry and personal influence he was the admitted head of the whole bar of Georgia, it would seem almost incredible that this position was attained by Gen. Cobb before his fortieth year, in a state in which were such statesmen as Robert Toombs, Howell Cobb, Benjamin H. Hill, Herschel V. Johnson, Alexander H. Stephens and Charles J. Jenkins, and such lawyers as William Hope Hull, William Law, Thomas E. Lloyd, Andrew J. Miller, Samuel Hall and William Dougherty. What a genius was there! What fertility of thought! What clearness of mind! What fairness of logic! What overwhelming power of application! For it is never to be gain-said that, as a jurist, in the highest sense of the term, Mr. Cobb was far above any lawyer who has ever lived in Georgia from its colonization down to the present time.

DAVID IRWIN.

With Mr. Cobb was also Judge David Irwin. This able man was born in Wilkes county in 1807, and died in Marietta in his seventy-ninth year. He was much before the public in his long life, but the greatest service that he ever did his native state was that which we are now considering. For many years a sound lawyer, his tenure of the superior court bench in the Blue Ridge circuit had familiarized him with the details of legal practice and judicial procedure, so that he went to his work fully prepared to do the portion thoroughly that might be entrusted to him. In addition to these mental qualifications he possessed very unusual common sense—a faculty much called upon in determining the vexed questions of pleading, which were thus submitted to the codifiers. The third gentleman who undertook and executed that work was Judge Richard H. Clark, of Atlanta—clarum et venerabile nomen—who lives to-day in a green old age the object of the unbounded respect and affection of his fellow citizens. Judge Clark has so charmingly described the production of the code that no apology is necessary for using his language:

“The commissioners soon met in Atlanta to agree upon the method of proceeding and entered vigorously and sincerely upon the work. We parcelled it between us in this way: To myself was assigned part first, ‘the political and public organization of the state.’ To Mr. Cobb second and fourth parts, ‘the civil code’ and the ‘penal laws,’ and to Judge Irwin the third part, ‘the code of practice.’ The general preliminary provisions were made after the other parts were completed, and are the work of Mr. Cobb, amended and added to by the other commissioners. As each commissioner finished a title, he had two copies made and sent to each of the others, so each could examine the work of each, to be prepared with suggestions of changes when we met to pass upon the whole work. This making the first draft, and then two copies, was very laborious, and I had to employ an assistant to make the copies as I proceeded, so that when I was done the original copies would also be done. We had no shorthand or typewriting then, and every word had to be written in full and with the pen. Of the two years allowed I devoted at least one year in all exclusively to the code, but it was not consecutively done, except for three or four months at a time. When we had finished, in August, 1860, we met again at Atlanta and went through the whole work, section at a time. By working from 8 till 1, and from 2 to 7, and from 8 to 10 or 11, or as long as we could, we finished by 12 o’clock Saturday night, having begun Monday morning. It was working more hours per day for several days than I have ever done before or since. Mr. Cobb seemed not in the least fatigued, but Judge Irwin on Thursday said that he could not appear at night any more, and if we insisted on meeting then we would have to go on without him. Mr. Cobb had an engagement the next Monday that could not be postponed, and we had to proceed, for the engagements of each of us were such as to make another meeting, before the committee of the legislature would assemble the following October, impracticable.

“As I said, we finished at 12 Saturday night, and I do not think that before or since I was ever so wearied mentally. Mr. Cobb seemed as fresh as the morning we started. We conversed on the difference in our conditions, and he told me he had never felt weariness from mental labor; and no matter what engaged his mind, in five minutes after retiring at night he was asleep, that he carried no thought or trouble to bed with him, and that whenever he chose he could close his mind like shutting a book. He said before he slept that night he had to draw a short bill in equity to save the return day of a court in his circuit. He was the most perfect specimen of 'a sound mind in a sound body' I have ever seen.

"The next meeting of our commission was at Milledgeville, in October of the same year, before the joint committee of the legislature to examine and report upon the code. This committee, on the part of the senate, were Hines Holt, Daniel S. Printup and William W. Paine, and, on the part of the house, George N. Lester, Isham S. Fannin, William G. Deloney, Miles W. Lewis, Charles N. Broyles and Charles J. Williams. B. B. DeGraffenreid was elected secretary of the commission and committee.

"We went through the whole code, reading each section. Each commissioner read the sections of his part. There was opposition to some of the sections, but serious only occasionally; but the result was the whole work was accepted and adopted by the committee. Their clear, comprehensive and conclusive report to the legislature will be found in the preface of the original code of 1882. Hon. Hines Holt, of Muscogee, one of the senate's committee, an able lawyer, and one of the most graceful of men and fluent of speakers, scanned the work of the commissioners more critically than any other member. The commissioners, among themselves, concurred as to every law in the code except three. The dissenting one was myself. I made my objections known to the committee, but, after argument against me by Messrs. Cobb and Holt, my objections were overruled. Afterward the legislature sustained me by excepting one in the act adopting the code. The other was soon repealed, and the last, though yet in the code, at section 2293, prescribing 'no abatement of rent' for destruction by fire or other casualty, is almost a dead letter, because the written contracts for rent have since become almost stereotyped to the contrary.

"What the most learned of lawyers said could not be done, has been done, and successfully done. That it has been successfully done is proven from the overwhelming fact that it has been on trial twenty-seven years and has been found adequate to every emergency. The credit of its distinguishing feature belongs to Gen. Cobb, as that was the part assigned to him and was solely his production, except as amended by the other commissioners. And likewise the part assigned to each of the other commissioners was exclusively the work of each, except as likewise amended. When completed, it was, as I have said, a code that filled the definition of true codification. Besides making a system out of the existing laws, both common and statute, it repealed old laws and enacted new laws, but so as to be consistent with the legislation of the past, and for the purpose of making that legislation more effectual and complete."

Thus the work was done, and Georgia received from these able and painstaking men a written body of laws such as is possessed by no other state or people. That it should have been attempted at all was daring; and that it should have succeeded in anything like its perfection was marvelous, and one of the greatest triumphs of the mind of man. If these words be thought to be in any respect too warm, let the reader turn to other so-called "codes" in any civilization and in any age, and when he learns their inadequacy, and then recalls the various, the desultory, and the obscure sources of the laws now embodied in the code of Georgia, he will think the encomium passed upon it and upon its authors far too cold and feeble.

We have thus followed the career of the bench and bar of Georgia from Oglethorpe's little "town court" in Savannah, through the courts of the bailiffs—no bar as yet. We have seen the royal courts with their chief justices and their bar; the revolutionary courts and their chief justices; the superior court judges, supreme in authority; and we have traveled with the supreme court from its organization to the present time. We have seen the supreme bench filled by the best material that the state could offer, notwithstanding the enormous labor, and that the salaries are not more than those of many well-paid clerks.

We have found a governor of the state plainly reminding its legislature that the incumbents of the superior bench were "not always distinguished for ability, intelligence and integrity." But we have nevertheless noticed upon the bench many men of fine legal knowledge and luminous intellects, despite the fact that they are paid in so niggardly a fashion, that it is only surprising that they consent to fill the place. Finally we have traced the history of the greatest legal achievement of this or any state, from first to last, the work of Georgia lawyers. But in all this there is little history of the bar. The bar has no history, because as a body it has no events. Unlike most bars, in Georgia it had its distinct birth, in the permission to use their professional knowledge and skill before the royal courts. From that time to the present the history of the legislature and of the bench of the state, is the history of the bar and has no separate existence, and it would be a task as fruitless of good, as difficult of execution to select from the mass of excellent lawyers who have lived in this state, and have aided in making its laws and in giving them force and construction, all those who have been distinguished in their generation by their especial qualifications and distinction.

Any close observer of the bar of Georgia will be struck at once with the characteristic of self-reliance and independence of thought that obtains everywhere. Having no system of leaders in cases, and every lawyer undertaking for himself to handle the business entrusted with him, a habit has been bred of close study, each for himself in his profession, and of dependence upon no external aid. The result necessarily is, that nowhere in the Union can be found a body of better prepared, more thorough, and more independent thinkers than in this state.

A very striking characteristic of the Georgia lawyer is his respect for the bench, and the consideration of the bench for the bar. In almost every circuit there are lawyers more than the equal of the bench in age, learning and abilities. Other result than this could not be expected, in viewing the fact that the incomes of the best lawyers far exceed the salary of the judge. But notwithstanding this difficult fact, the relations between the bench and the bar have always been self-respectful and considerate in the extreme. With very few exceptions the judges have never used their positions and authority so as to harass or mortify the counsel, and the low-bred coward and bully upon the bench is an unwonted sight; and so the bar have ever exhibited an unbounded respect for the judicial office and a desire to uphold the hands of the court. In the history of Georgia will be found no such things as accounts of tyrannical judges and of a subservient bar. But the bench and bar, each regardful of each other's duties, rights and privileges, each careful as to the feelings and susceptibilities of the other, have gone on together for more than one hundred years, hand in hand, without an event to break that current of brotherly affection.

MISCELLANEOUS SKETCHES.

N. J. HAMMOND. One of the most eminent of the members of the legal profession in Georgia, if not in the south, is Nathaniel J. Hammond of Atlanta. No one outranks him; and his superior ability is cheerfully conceded by his compeers. Disdaining to use the usual methods he has nevertheless steadily advanced step by step to the pre-eminent position he now holds professionally and as a legislator. Mr. Hammond was born in Elbert county, Ga., Dec. 26, 1833. While he was yet young his father, Amos W. Hammond, who was a lawyer, removed to Monroe county, Ga., where Mr. Hammond received his primary and preparatory education. In January, 1850, he entered the university of Georgia—then Franklin college—from which he was graduated in 1852. The year following he was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice. A year or two later his father and himself came to Atlanta and established the law firm of A. W. Hammond & Son. The firm at once took a leading position, secured a large and influential clientage, and became special counsel for the Southern Express company and other strong corporations. In 1861 Mr. Hammond was appointed solicitor-general of the circuit, and held the office until 1865. In 1867 he was appointed reporter for the supreme court of Georgia, retaining the office until 1872, when he was elected attorney-general of the state, and was re-elected for successive terms until 1877. In 1873 he was made a member of the committee of forty-nine of the citizens of Atlanta, who formulated the present charter of the city, which was passed by the general assembly, and received the signature of the governor Feb. 28, 1874. In 1865 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention held that year, and again as a member of the constitutional convention held in 1877. In this last convention he was a member of the judiciary committee; and it is no disparagement to any other member of that body to say that, both as a member of that committee, and of the convention, no member did more faithful work, or was more potentially influential in framing that constitution. That same year, 1877, he was elected to the Forty-sixth congress, and re-elected to the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth, during which he secured the establishing of Atlanta as a port of entry, and an appropriation for building the custom house and postoffice. Among other important committees he was placed on the committee on judiciary, having the distinction of holding second place—ranking next to the chairman. Since his retirement from congress Mr. Hammond has held no political position but has sedulously applied himself to the practice of his profession. For many years there have been but few very important cases before the superior and supreme courts of Georgia, or district and circuit courts of the United States, in which Mr. Hammond has not represented one side or the other. He stands unexcelled as to skillfulness of management, unsurpassed as to knowledge of law and precedent, and in general success; and is equally powerful before a jury and the bench. A well-known popular writer has said of him that "he is a born lawyer; that he has an incisive mind that goes to the core of any legal question or case that he has in hand." And Judge Warner is credited with saying that "for wonderful quickness of mind he was the only match for the illustrious Ben. H. Hill." Regardful always of self-respect he never forgets the respect due to others. The membership of the Georgia bar does not include one who is a sounder or a profounder constitutional lawyer than Nathaniel J. Hammond; and his pre-eminence in this important branch of his profession was distinctly recognized when he was placed second on the judiciary committee when he was in congress. In addition to a large and influential general clientage, he is special attorney for the Atlanta & West Point and Central railways and other wealthy corporations. He is also specially employed under appointment by President Cleveland to represent the United States in the interstate commerce cases now pending in the United States supreme court. Mr. Hammond has filled many and important public offices; steadily moving upward until he reached congress—every time transferred to a higher position. Too self-respectful to indulge in an unseemly rivalry for office, yet laudably ambitious, he has willingly accepted and ably filled every office his appreciative fellow-citizens have seen fit to bestow. His eminent mental and legal qualifications, and the absolute purity of his private life and public character, would proudly sustain the traditional purity, ability and dignity of the supreme court of the United States. Mr. Hammond was married in 1858 to Miss Laura Lewis, a happy union which has been blessed with seven children, six daughters and a son, who is the able partner of his father in the practice of his profession. Mr. Hammond is a valued member of the First Methodist Episcopal church, south, and is chairman of the board of stewards. He is also a member and chairman of the board of trustees of the university of Georgia.

WILLIAM RIDGELY LEAKIN, a prominent attorney-at-law of Savannah, Ga., was born in the city of Baltimore, Md., on Feb. 13, 1859. The Leakins are of Irish and English descent. The great-grandfathers of William R. Leakin served in the colonial army during the war of the revolution. His paternal grandfather, Gen. Sheppard Church Leakin of Maryland, was an officer in the war of 1812, and was present actively at the bombardment of Fort McHenry. Rev. George A. Leakin, D. D., son of Gen. Sheppard Church Leakin and father of William R. Leakin, was born in the state of Maryland in 1817. He was named after Gen. George Armstead, with whom Gen. Leakin was associated at Fort McHenry. He was for forty-eight years the rector of Trinity church, Baltimore, and is the author of several valuable books of a scientific and religious character, one of which, The Law of Periodicity, is known the world over. William Ridgely Leakin was reared and received his earlier education in the city of Baltimore, and in 1876 entered Trinity college, Hartford, Conn., from which institution he was graduated in July, 1880, with the degree of B. A. and subsequently received the degree Master of Arts from his alma mater. Soon after his graduation he removed to Albany, Ga., and tutored there for two years, studying law the while, and the fall of 1882 came to Savannah and completed his law studies in the office of Chisholm & Erwin, being admitted to the bar in June, 1883. For seven years after admission to practice he was connected with Messrs. Chisholm & Erwin, but has since pursued his profession alone. Among the members of the Savannah bar noted for its unusual strength, he sustains a most desirable rank, and any discussion here as to his legal ability would be a work of supererogation. He is a member of the American Bar association, the Georgia Bar association, Georgia Historical association, and is judge advocate of the First battalion of infantry, Georgia volunteers. Mr. Leakin is also connected with the Savannah board of trade, is a pay member of the time-honored Chatham artillery, and a member of the Commercial club, Savannah Yacht club, the Oglethorpe club and Greenwich Park club. Among the fraternal and benevolent orders he is a member of the Hibernian society, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and is a Knight

Templar Mason. He is also identified with Sons of the Revolution of Georgia, having served as delegate to the national convention of that organization. He is and has been a delegate from the Georgia association to the American Bar association. He is a member of the Christ church (Episcopal) of Savannah, and has been a delegate to the diocesan convention of Georgia. He is also a director of the Y. M. C. A. at Savannah. He is a member of various social organizations. He married Miss Ruth Stewart, a well-known leader of Savannah society, the daughter of Maj. James T. Stewart.

JUDGE RICHARD H. CLARKE has occupied a very conspicuous place among the people of Georgia for fifty years. Commencing public life at a very early age he has constantly been before the public and under all circumstances has had the confidence and admiration of his fellow-men. After a literary education he studied law and was admitted to the practice of a profession in which he has won distinction on the floor of the courtroom as an advocate and on the bench as a judge. He appeared in political life in 1849 as a state senator when George W. Towns was governor and at a time of very considerable political excitement. He was about the youngest of a very distinguished number of Georgians in the legislature, among whom were Charles J. Jenkins, Andrew J. Miller, Thomas C. Howard, Joseph E. Brown, Lucius J. Gartrell, David J. Bailey, and Lenton Stephens. It was in this legislature that a warm debate occurred over certain resolutions concerning the relations between the states of the south and the Union. The following resolution was at last passed with very few dissenting votes, viz.: "Resolved, That the people of Georgia entertain an ardent feeling of devotion to the Union of these states and that nothing short of a persistence in the present system of encroachment upon our rights by the non-slaveholding states can induce us to contemplate the possibility of a dissolution." Another famous measure was the woman's bill introduced by Andrew J. Miller, whose object was to secure the property of married women from being seized to pay the debts of the husband. Judge Clarke proposed to submit the bill to a vote of the people of the state in the election for governor for 1851, but his proposition failed by a small majority. The same legislature elected McDonald, McAllister, Dougherty and Law to a southern states' convention which afterward met in Nashville. In all the debates upon the questions of that memorable legislature Judge Clarke took an influential part. One of the most exciting events in the political history of the state occurred in 1857, when the democratic convention wrangled for days over the nominee for the office of governor. Judge Clarke was a conspicuous member of that body, being on the committee of compromise which settled the disagreement by the nomination of Joseph E. Brown, and supported the report of the committee by an admirable speech in eulogy of the ability of the nominee, who was then very little known throughout the state. In 1858 the southern commercial convention met in Montgomery, Ala. It was a very large body, composed of delegates from all southern states and assembled to discuss the material interests of the south. Gov. Brown appointed Judge Clarke a member of the body, together with such men as George U. Crawford, B. H. Hill, Joel Crawford, F. S. Bartow, A. H. Colquitt and H. V. M. Miller. A few years later he was selected with Thomas R. Cobb to codify the laws of Georgia and the work was rapidly and admirably done. The committee appointed to examine it reported favorably and it was adopted in 1860. Judge Clarke was also a member of the Georgia convention which passed the ordinance of secession Jan. 19, 1861, and did a very fine service for the state in the reconstruction period as counsel against the illegal efforts made to control the legislature of the state. In all his subsequent life he has adorned the legal profession, and as judge of the superior court for many years has enjoyed the confidence of the bar and the people. While he has devoted his energies chiefly to his profession he has also enriched his own mind by wide reading in general literature. Perhaps no man in the state has a more general and accurate knowledge of the history of Georgia. His many sketches of public men and events as published in the papers simply show how extensive is his acquaintance with the course of public affairs for many years. As a courtly gentleman he is unsurpassed. Genial, hospitable, full of good humor and a ready conversationalist he is at all times most welcome whenever any gathering of friends takes place. Still in fine health, mature in intellect and with large legal learning, his place on the bench is well filled and he will be remembered in Georgia as one of its ablest and purest judges.

GEORGE W. GUSTIN, one of the most prominent members of the Macon bar, was born near Morristown, N. J., Jan. 29, 1846. At the age of three years he was taken by his parents to Newark, in the same state, and there the family resided until he was fourteen years of age. He gained his rudimentary education in the Newark schools and in his fifteenth year his father and mother went to Florida. They chose Fernandina as their city of residence and remained there two years, then came to Macon in 1862, where Mr. Gustin continued to live since that time. Four years later he entered the Lumpkin law school at Athens, Ga., graduating the same year. He then located in Macon and for the remainder of his life practiced his profession in that city. In March, 1864, Mr. Gustin answered the call to arms and entered the Confederate service, enlisting in Company E, Phillips' legion of cavalry, then known as the Bibb cavalry, and served until the surrender, in North Carolina, under Hampton and Butler. Having attained prominent standing in his profession he was, in 1882, elected to the state senate and during the session of 1882-83 was chairman of the special judiciary committee and member of the committees on railroads, lunatic asylum and general judiciary. In 1884 he was elected to the lower branch of the Georgia state legislature and again took a prominent part in the deliberations of that body, being appointed chairman of the committee on banks and member of the committees on general judiciary, railroads, privileges, elections and penitentiary. Two years after his last service in the state legislature he was elected judge of the superior court, Macon circuit, to fill the unexpired term of Judge T. J. Simmons, who had been elected to the supreme court of the state and whose term would have expired Jan. 1, 1891. Mr. Gustin, however, resigned his seat on the bench one year before that time and resumed his private practice, in which he was remarkably successful, having carried to a victorious verdict many celebrated causes before the supreme and lower courts. For many years he was a member of the board of education in Macon, taking great interest in all matters pertaining to the amelioration of scholastic systems and giving his services freely in furtherance of all improvements in this connection. He affiliated with the Episcopalian church. In the island of Jersey the Gustin family had its inception, the emigrant ancestor forsaking that isle for a new home in America. Mr. Gustin's father was Samuel I. Gustin, a native of New Jersey, who removed as above related to Florida and later to Georgia, where he served in the home guards during the late war, participating in a skirmish at Macon in 1864. He was a planter and manufacturer and died in 1881 at the age of sixty-six years. The unexpected death of Judge Gustin early in this year was a great shock to his many warm friends, who admired him not only for his eminent abilities, but also for his sterling character and moral uprightness.

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES was born in Willington district, Abbeville Co., S. C., Nov. 9, 1856. He graduated from the university of Georgia, August, 1875, and married Mattie Gardner Simpson, of Hancock county, Ga., April 17, 1878. He was editor of the "Daily Florida Union" and "Daily Florida Herald," Jacksonville, 1882-1887, was elector-at-large of Florida democratic ticket in 1884; led ballot of the state; removed to Georgia in 1887, was editor-in-chief of the Atlanta "Journal" in 1887, editor and manager "Tribune," of Rome, Ga., in 1888, elector-at-large of the democratic ticket in 1888, led ballot of the state, and was orator of Southern society, New York, 1889. His second wife was Annie E. Cothran, of Rome, Ga., 1890. He was memorial orator over Henry W. Grady, 1889; orator New England society, Philadelphia, 1890; orator New England society of Boston, 1893, and again 1894; orator world's congress of journalists, Chicago exposition, 1894; orator world's congress of dentists, 1894; orator and campaign speaker on urgent special request of President Cleveland and Senator Hill in New York during the presidential campaign, 1892; orator at opening of woman's department, world's fair, Atlanta, 1895; orator university of Virginia, 1894, and orator Merchants' club, Boston, 1895. From 1892 to date he has held a foremost place on American platform, with securely established national fame as reformer, orator and apostle of the New South. Perhaps no American of this generation has enjoyed so early in life, and in such sustained connection, so many and such dazzling triumphs of eloquence as the subject of this sketch. The nephew of John C. Calhoun, his grandfather the patron and benefactor of McDuffie, and the intimate of Hayne, Preston and Legare, he was born in an atmosphere of eloquence and statesmanship. When Henry W. Grady died in the meridian of his brilliant and fortunate life it was remarkable to observe the unanimity with which the press and people of the north and south turned with expectancy to John Temple Graves, then quietly editing the "Daily Tribune," of Rome, Ga. Up to that period his growth had been gradual, but out of the nation's bereaved hour his name flamed up immediately into fame, and was soon on every lip. Since that period his career has been a succession of triumphal marches that have landed him, at the age of thirty-eight, upon the pinnacle of a national fame as the south's representative orator and one of the most eloquent of living Americans. With a brilliant reputation for college oratory, Graves began life as a teacher in the public schools of West Point and La Grange, making, during this time, two memorial speeches over Confederate graves, which attracted much attention. The routine life of the school room was irksome to his eager ambition and he sought more congenial employment. About this time the sensational contest between Joseph E. Brown and Gen. A. R. Lawton convulsed the state, and the young orator and journalist caught its graphic points in a ringing article that went into Avery's History of Georgia as the "finest bit of descriptive writing of that decade." From this he blossomed easily into newspaper life and went to Florida, where he rose rapidly from reporter to be managing editor of the "Union," the only daily in the state. He afterward established the "Daily Herald," which became the leading factor in Florida politics, and its editor, with one exception, the most distinguished man in the state, at twenty-nine. He engaged actively in three political campaigns in Florida and swept the hustings with his eloquence like a prairie fire. The chronicles of 1882 to 1887 in that state speak of his campaign speeches as without a parallel in the history of Florida. It was a common thing for his enthusiastic audiences to carry him on their shoulders from the public platform, and in many instances the horses were unhitched from his carriage and he was drawn by leading citizens through crowded streets amid shouting multitudes, pelting him with flowers and adulation. And all this not as a candidate—for he always ignored and declined office—but simply as a spontaneous tribute to an eloquence which Henry Grady declared the most phenomenal he had ever listened to. After having led the democrat electoral ticket in Florida in 1884 the health of the journalist-orator and that of his wife failed in the Florida climate and he returned to Georgia. He was immediately offered and accepted the editorship-in-chief of the reorganized “Atlanta Journal” in 1887. But the desire for absolute freedom and independence of utterance led him to resign this responsible position, and its brilliant prospects, and to accept the editorship and control of the “Tribune,” of Rome, which was established under him and recorded three phenomenally brilliant and successful years under his management, until he voluntarily resigned the editorship in loyalty to a political conviction which differed from the views and interests of all its other owners. During this period, and within a year after his return to Georgia, Graves was chosen without an effort to lead the democratic electoral ticket of Georgia in 1888, and thus presented the only instance in the political history of the south of a young man, under thirty-two, who had in two successive presidential campaigns, been chosen as democratic elector-at-large in two great states, and led the ballot in both of them. About this time Henry Grady died. Graves and Grady had been bosom friends, and the former has a letter from the latter saying that no man ever understood him as did the friend who survived him, and was destined to complete his work. Grady told a dozen men that Graves was the only man who could take his place if he should die, and in this judgment the world instinctively agreed. Graves’ oration over Grady’s dead body has gone into all languages, been published in all countries, is spoken to-day by American youths in all the great American colleges, and is fixed in literature as one of the few classics of American oratory. One sentence of this oration, “And when he died he was literally loving a nation into peace,” is graven upon Grady’s monument in Atlanta and will live as long as the life it commemorates. From the day of the Grady memorial John Temple Graves was in demand all over the country. Every platform was open to him. He could choose his audience anywhere in the republic, and in the measure of his strength he met the obligations of his genius and opportunity. He thrilled New York with a matchless oration on Feb. 22, 1890. In December of the same year the New England society of Philadelphia gave him a wonderful ovation, along with Gov. McKinley, of Ohio, and President Harrison. In 1892 his campaign speech in New York won him the laurels of the national canvass and the cordial thanks of the national committee, and an especially cordial letter from Mr. Cleveland thanking the southern orator for “the unparalleled enthusiasm he had created in the president’s home town”—Buffalo. In 1893 the New England club of Boston gave Mr. Graves an especial dinner, at which the journalists of New England were invited to meet him, and here Mr. Graves made, without notes or preparation, a speech which the Boston papers declared equal if it did not surpass the best thing Grady ever did. The same club invited him back in 1894, when he repeated the triumph of the year before, and as this volume goes to press, southern expectation is on tip toe over his speech to be made Oct. 17 before the Merchants’ club of Boston, where Grady made his last address. Three times called to Boston in three successive years. Not many men have had this honor. The magnates of the great Chicago world’s fair invited Mr. Graves to make the oration before the world’s congress of journalists, representing the south. The world’s dentists chose him also as their orator, and for all the years since 1890 he has had the refusal of the commencement platform of the great colleges and universities of the country. Since 1893 he has been a leading and brilliant figure of the American lyceum, discussing on all the great platforms of the country the leading social and political questions of the time, and making his famous lecture, The Reign of the Demagogue, and Uncle Tom's Lost Cabin, so vital that statesmen and educators have called the two orations distinct and vital moral forces in American politics. In every oration or speech that has fallen from his lips there breathed patriotism, fraternity, truth and sincerity. Like his great kinsman, his eloquence was logic on fire. Of all the achievements of Mr. Graves' life he himself takes most pride in the Georgia state campaign of 1894, where on the issue which he had raised of clean politics and a pure judiciary, he fought single-handed on the stump and in the columns of the press and reduced the old partisan majority of 70,000 to one of 20,000 by the issue he had precipitated. In this campaign Mr. Graves' three letters to the "Constitution" stirred the state like bugle blasts. They will go down in Georgia's history alongside of Ben Hill's Notes on the Situation and have had a distinct and powerful effect upon subsequent politics in the state. They are preserved in thousands of scrap books throughout the country. In summing up the life and achievements of John Temple Graves it may be well to know his own estimate of his motives and powers. "I have never felt that I was greater than others," said he. "I believe the merit of all my work is in its sincerity. I have never in one conscious moment of my public life said one word that I did not believe to be true. I have never with pen or tongue championed an unworthy cause. I have never used position, power or opportunity to gratify a private grudge or to prosecute a private gain. I have loved my country, loved humanity and revered God, and in the greater honors than I have deserved, which have come to me so lavishly, I have always felt the pain of my own unworthiness, and offered to myself and to the world no other explanation than I was sincere." In this statement his contemporaries concur. It is also well in this summary to record what the ripest thinkers and observers of his time have said of this truly remarkable Georgian. For all that may have seemed extravagant or overdrawn in any line of the foregoing sketch the impartial reader will find abundant justification in the voluntary and judicial estimate which the really great men of the country have placed upon the genius of this brilliant and accomplished orator. These are the comments in brief:

"John Temple Graves is the most eloquent southerner of to-day."—Henry Waterson.

"He has the most phenomenal eloquence I ever heard."—Henry W. Grady.

"He is a born orator if one ever came into the world."—Boston Globe.

"He surpasses Ingersoll in rhetoric and delivery."—Robert Irwin Fulton.

"He is the most brilliant and statesmanlike orator heard in New York in years."—Grover Cleveland.

"John Temple Graves may be called the successor of Henry W. Grady."—"Public Opinion."

"Most finished orator I have heard in years. He should have been chosen to speak for the south at the Washington centennial."—Abram S. Hewitt.

"In John Temple Graves I have heard Henry Grady surpassed."—David B. Hill.

"Graves' 'Grady Memorial' oration is the finest piece of eloquence, written or spoken, within my knowledge."—Gen. John B. Gordon.

"I never heard a more remarkable oration than 'The Reign of the Demagogue,' by John Temple Graves."—Bishop John W. Beckwith.

"Graves' 'Grady Memorial' is the finest speech in the English language. It is simply a miracle of oratory."—Cassius Merrill.

"He has the finest gift of eloquence I ever heard."—Benjamin H. Hill.

Surely upon the foundation of words like these it is not too much to say that John Temple Graves was indeed the orator of his time. Better than that, history will accord him the merited title of patriot and statesman.

CHARLES N. WEST of Savannah, Ga., was born in Georgia Aug. 31, 1844.

His family were always identified with the coast of Georgia, Charles West, his great-great-grandfather, having removed from Charleston, S. C., to Liberty County, Ga., in 1754. His own father was Dr. Charles W. West of Savannah, and his mother, Eliza Whitehead, the daughter of Judge John Whitehead of Burke county. He entered Princeton college in 1859, but was called home after the election of Mr. Lincoln to the presidency. He then went to the university of Georgia for a few months until the opening of the war. He entered the Savannah volunteer guards as a private in 1861, and served with them until 1863, when he was detailed for the signal service, and remained in that service until the end of the war. He then taught school and studied law. He was admitted at Columbia county superior court in 1867. He commenced the practice of the law in Savannah in 1869, and shortly afterward married Mary C. Cheves, daughter of the late Langdon Cheves of South Carolina. He received the honorary degree of Master of Arts from Princeton college in 1874. He moved to Baltimore in the spring of 1877, where he practiced law, and became a member of the leading firm of Marshall, Fisher & West. His health requiring a milder climate he returned to Savannah, Ga., in 1883. He is the author of the sketches of Sidney Lanier and William Harris Crawford. He is a zealous and efficient member of the Georgia Historical society, and is a successful and competent attorney well fitted and endowed as a historian and jurist.

W. D. CRAWFORD, judge of the County court, Buena Vista, Marion Co., Ga., son of Samuel H. and Sarah J. (Dunham) Crawford, was born in Marion county in 1859. His paternal grandparents were members of old Georgia families. His grandfather, William Crawford, was a farmer, owned quite a number of slaves, and, late in life, removed to Alabama. He was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Crawford's father read law under Judge (ex-congressman) Hugh Buchanan, at Newnan, Ga., and entered upon the practice at Tazewell, but moved to Buena Vista when it was made the county seat, and continued his practice there. For a number of years he was clerk of the inferior court, and was at one time law partner of ex-Associate Justice of the Supreme court, Mark H. Blanford—now of Columbus, Ga. He enlisted in the late war, and died at his home from the result of a wound received at Griswoldville, Ga., near its close. His maternal grandparents were William and Elizabeth (Harris) Dunham. Mr. Dunham was born in South Carolina, was a large slave owner, came to Georgia and settled on a rice plantation in Liberty county, where he reared fourteen children to maturity. He was a descendant of one of the Pilgrims who landed at Plymouth Rock, Dec. 22, 1620. Mr. Crawford was reared in Buena Vista, where he received a good common school education. On completing that he read law under Maj. E. W. Miller, and was admitted to the bar in 1887. He gained a good practice at once, but he is now judge of the County court. He was president of the board of commissioners for a number of years, and mayor of the city three terms, conclusive evidence of his ability and popularity. In 1891 Mr. Crawford was married to Miss Callie Miller—born in Marion county in 1867—daughter of Major E. W. and Sallie (Jones) Miller. Major Miller was born in Warren county, Ga., moved to Marion county early in life and practiced law many years. He was the first ordinary of Marion county and has represented the county in the general assembly.

W. D. Crawford

He was a soldier in the Confederate army, and was by the side of Mr. Crawford's father when he was shot down at Griswoldville. Mrs. Crawford is a member of the Baptist church.

JESSE EDWARD MERCER was born in Webster county, Ga., Oct. 30, 1860, and is the son of William H. Mercer, a prominent farmer of that county. He was given a common school education, and when quite a youth took service with his uncle, Capt. Philip E. Boyd, an extensive merchant and farmer of Leary, Ga. He was editor of the "Calhoun County Courier" for several years; at the same time was county surveyor at the age of twenty-one, and also conducted a lumber mill. He then sold his newspaper and milling interests and entered the mercantile business, which he subsequently disposed of and became the agent of the Central railroad at Leary, as well as the agent of the Southern Express company, and at the same time held the office of postmaster. Mr. Mercer came very near securing an appointment at West Point Military academy, and during his career as a journalist narrowly missed a duel with H. M. McIntosh of the "Albany News and Advertiser" over the public printing of Baker county. He represented his county in the first road congress held in the state. He is now serving a term in the state senate from the Ninth district, and at the same time is deputy revenue collector, with headquarters at Brunswick. In the senate he is chairman of the public road committee, and brought himself into considerable prominence by introducing a bill for the employment of the convict force of the state on the public roads and in swamp drainage. Mr. Mercer was married Nov. 25, 1885, to Miss Dora Colley, daughter of Judge John Colley, one of the pioneers of Calhoun county. She has borne him six children, only one of which is living. Mr. Mercer is a master Mason. He is what may be correctly called a self-made man, full of energy, self-assertive, possessing a large fund of general information secured by assiduous application, which demonstrates itself in both his writings and his conversation. Being but thirty-five, with all of his energies well in hand, the public will learn to know Mr. Mercer better as he grows older. He is, indeed, a rising man.

ALEXANDER PRATT ADAMS was born in Savannah, Ga., Feb. 20, 1852. He received his academic education in the schools of Savannah, and was prepared to enter college by the late William S. Bogart. He entered the University of Georgia in the Sophomore class in September, 1866, in the class of which three other distinguished Georgians, Judge Emory Speer, William R. Hammond and Howard Van Epps, were members. In the fall of 1869 he commenced the study of the law in the office of the distinguished jurist, Thomas E. Lloyd, and was admitted to the bar of the Superior court of Chatham county on February 26, 1870, and opened an office immediately in Savannah. In the year of 1876 he and his brother, Samuel B. Adams, formed a partnership for the practice of law, which continued till the year 1882, when, on the resignation by Judge Tompkins of the judgeship of the Eastern circuit, Mr. Adams was elected, and on November 10 qualified to fill the unexpired term. He was re-elected to that office and held it until he resigned on May 1, 1889, when he at once became a member of the law firm of Denmark & Adams of this city, and so remained until his death on Sept. 25, 1892. This brief sketch epitomizes the short career of our distinguished and lamented brother. Two decades ushered him upon his active life, and two more decades brought that life of action, usefulness, honor and renown to its close. It may be safely asserted that his achievements lay within the limits of the last twelve years of his brief career. He was a youth of note. In the academy in Savannah his rank was the highest. He was classed as a fine debater at the age of fourteen, and when only sixteen years old he had acquired such a reputation as a debater that he was elected by a very large majority of the members of the Kappa society (a literary society in the University of Georgia) as its anniversarian orator. He was then in the junior class in that university. He was, no doubt, one of the many young men who, during their college course, are looking over and beyond the curriculum and campus into the broader fields of action and knowledge, where first honors are not the rewards of memory and rote and ribbon parchment. Speaking in a dead language is never received as proof of intellect or manhood. His brilliant career as lawyer and judge assures us that, when a collegian, he had chosen his field of future conflict and was then forging weapons fit for victory. Passing over the short period during which Mr. Adams practiced law before his elevation to the bench we will briefly comment upon him as a judge. Considering his age (being but thirty years old when he assumed the ermine), we can say—with the assurance, we believe, of all who practiced law in this court—that no one of his predecessors was his superior as a judge. He combined quickness of apprehension with breadth of comprehension; severity of logic with strong and helpful imagination; clearness of perception with accuracy of expression; a full vocabulary with verbal eclecticism; patience with dignity, and urbanity with discipline. Ruling in perfect mastery over all these powers and aids was a noble sense of justice, tempered by mercy and directed by judicial wisdom. If we were to name any one characteristic as the chief one of all the mental and moral powers of Judge Adams we would call it earnestness. It was the flame of his oratory, and by it he conquered. It was visible in all his actions and audible in every utterance, whether in his most impassioned eloquence, or the gentle flow of social conversation. With this quality of soul, with a round, melodious voice, a mastery of language strong and appropriate, a bold yet chastened imagination, a strength of logic which gave to a simple statement of a proposition the force of a demonstration, he ranked among the foremost orators, whether on the hustings, or in the forum as an advocate. Even his charges to the grand and petit juries were often eloquent and always models of diction. But so far we have only looked upon the moral and intellectual man. There was another and a higher and sweeter life. Judge Adams died at the age of forty years. He had about reached the crest of the hill. In his upward course he had gathered honors, reaped rich rewards, listened to the plaudits of those below, so sweet to young ambition; he had reared his head above the clouds where vaulting youth fondly dreams eternal sunshine settles to remain. Having reached the contemplative period in life, he looked down and backward, and then down and forward, and he realized that, as he advanced beyond the crest, his worldly honors could be no prop to his feet, his intellectual lamp no light for his safety. Conscious of his weakness and dependence, he asked for divine aid. About a year before he became a member of the Independent Presbyterian church of this city, he led to the altar Miss Sarah Olmstead of Savannah. And we think it not out of place to say that this judicious step changed the current of a moral into a devotedly active Christian life. That earnestness of soul which was his strong characteristic, kindled into a brighter flame in the Christian, and illuminated every step he took until his mortal became immortal. Those who knew him best after his spiritual change unanimously bear witness to his absolute submission to the divine will, and his abiding faith that death is but the gate to immortal life.

HENRY HOLCOMBE TUCKER, deceased, was a Baptist minister whose ancestors, on both the maternal and paternal sides, were of the best old Virginia stock. His paternal grandfather, Isaiah Tucker, was born in Amherst county Va., about the year 1761, but moved to Georgia in early life and settled in Warren county where he married Miss Sarah Gibson. He was a man of classical attainments and literary tastes. His eldest son, Germain Tucker, the father of Henry

REV. DR. H. H. TUCKER.

Holcombe Tucker, was born in 1794 and died when twenty-seven years of age, leaving two children, one of whom soon died. Dr. H. H. Tucker was therefore the only representative of the family. His maternal grandfather, Rev. Henry Holcombe, D. D., was also a native of Virginia. Dr. Tucker's father was the son of a wealthy planter, and dying at an early age little is known of him except that he was a man of culture and elegant address. Dr. Tucker's mother was Frances Henrietta, fifth child of Henry Holcombe, D. D. She afterward became Mrs. Hoff and spent many years of her life in Philadelphia, but died in Atlanta, Ga., on April 14, 1877. Henry Holcombe Tucker was born May 10, 1819, in Warren county, Georgia, near the place now called Camak. When he was a mere child his mother removed to Philadelphia, which was his home until he was grown. In his sixteenth year he made a profession of religion and was baptized by Dr. William T. Brantly, Sr., in the Delaware river. He received his education at an institution founded by Benjamin Franklin—the academic department of the University of Pennsylvania. Having gone through a marvelous amount of most exacting drill in Latin and Greek, he entered the university as freshman in 1834, and remained until senior half-advanced, when, desiring to spend some time in Washington city, he left the university and entered the senior class in Columbian college, District of Columbia, where he was graduated A. B. in 1838. While at this institution he spent much time in the senate chamber of the United States witnessing the contests of those giants, Clay, Calhoun, Webster and others who were at that time leaders in political life. From 1839 to 1842 he engaged in mercantile business in Charleston, S. C., and then studied law until 1846, when he was admitted to the bar in Forsyth, Monroe Co., Ga., and practiced his profession until 1848. The knowledge of the practical business of life acquired by him during that decade remained with him ever afterward. While practicing law at Forsyth, Ga., he married Miss Mary Catherine West, who died in less than one year after. This severe blow drove the heart-broken mourner to the Bible for comfort, and he became convinced that he ought to preach the gospel. He immediately decided to enter the ministry, sold his law books and, after receiving license from the Forsyth church, repaired to Mercer university to obtain private instruction from the venerable Dr. John L. Dagg, then president of that institution. It was his intention to enter at once into the work of the ministry, but Providence ordered otherwise. Great pressure was brought to bear to induce him to become an educator and, reluctantly yielding, he taught for two or three years in the Southern Female college at La Grange, Ga., where he was ordained in 1851. In 1853 he was offered the presidency of Wake Forest college in North Carolina, but declined it, having previously accepted the pastorate of the Baptist church in Alexandria, Va., on the duties of which office he entered January 1, 1854. While in Alexandria Dr. Tucker married Miss Sarah O. Stevens, his excellent and accomplished widow. In 1856 he was elected professor of belles-lettres and metaphysics in Mercer university, which position he held until 1862, when the institution was in a measure broken up by the war. He became editor of the Christian Index on Jan. 1, 1866, but in July following resigned the position to accept the presidency of Mercer university, to which he had been unanimously elected in April. It was during his administration that the university was moved from Penfield to Macon, and he was one of the chief promoters of the removal. Resigning the presidency of the university in 1871, he went with his family to Europe and was absent fourteen months. While there he assisted in the formation of the Baptist church in Rome, and baptized a man in the river Tiber, probably the first time such an event had occurred there in fourteen or fifteen centuries, or perhaps since the days of the apostles. Dr. Tucker was elected chancellor of the University of Georgia in 1874, which position he retained until the summer of 1878, when he became again the editor of the "Christian Index" in Atlanta, where he resided till his death. He never abandoned the ministry, but preached constantly as occasion offered. Being extensively acquainted, he preached many times, north and south, in many of the cities and towns on the Atlantic coast, from Maine to Georgia, and also officiated during a large part of one winter in the American chapel in Paris, France. Dr. Tucker was opposed to secession, and debated the issue publicly with some of the ablest speakers on the other side, but when the war broke out he promptly took sides with his own people and to the last co-operated heartily and zealously with the Confederates. One of the first to foresee the salt famine, which afterward so seriously affected the Confederacy, he was the first to call public attention to it, traveling over the state at his own expense and in public speeches urging the people to enter upon the manufacture of salt. For his zeal in this matter, strange to say, he was often ridiculed, yet he soon became the president of a large salt manufacturing company, which manufactured the article at the rate of two hundred barrels per day; and many of those who ridiculed his scheme were afterward glad to purchase the salt which he manufactured. Dr. Tucker was also, early in the war, the originator and founder of the Georgia Relief and Hospital association, which corresponded in its objects with the Northern Christian commission. The institution was very popular with all classes of the southern people; enormous contributions were made to its support and by its aid relief and comfort were carried to tens of thousands of sick and wounded, and dying soldiers. During the war small-pox prevailed in many portions of the country and vaccine virus was exceedingly scarce. Dr. Tucker always carried in his vest pocket a lancet and vaccine virus with which he vaccinated all—old and young, white and black—who would submit to the operation. Here again he met with ridicule, but those who appreciate the wisdom and humanity of his work will respect and admire the man who thus braved ridicule for the public good. These facts and others that might be mentioned evince that his mind was of a decidedly practical turn. Dr. Tucker though a brilliant writer, who wrote much, published but little. About 1855 he published a series of letters on "Religious Liberty," addressed to a distinguished politician of this state, controverting an assertion of his in a public speech, that Romanists were the first to establish religious liberty on this continent. Dr. Tucker denied that Romanists had ever established religious liberty, first or last, on this or on any other continent, and he affirmed that in the establishment of soul liberty Baptists were the pioneers of the world. The discussion excited much interest, was largely copied by the press all over the United States, and was finally published in pamphlet form for general circulation. He also published a number of sermons and pamphlets, one of the best of which is entitled, The Right and the Wrong Way of Raising Money for Religious and Benevolent Purposes, in which he demonstrates the mighty power of "littles." In 1868 Lippincott & Co. published for him a small volume with the unique title The Gospel in Enoch, full of interesting and original ideas forcibly expressed. The striking feature of his writing is its originality; yet his thoughts so commend themselves to the reader's judgment that one wonders why those things have not been said before. A sermon of his on baptism, published by the American Baptist Publication society in 1879, received unwonted encomiums for its novel, yet strong and incontrovertible presentation of Scripture truth. It will, in all likelihood, tincture appreciably the literature of the long future in regard to the subject of baptism. In 1884 the American Baptist Publication society published for him a volume of sermons entitled The Old Theology Restated. His style of writing is clear, cogent, convincing and vigorous, frequently brilliant, sometimes thrilling, but always so perspicuous that it cannot be misunderstood. As a preacher he was bold, original and eloquent, ever proclaiming gospel truth. He never failed to rivet attention by the earnestness of his manner, the vigor of his language, the originality of his conceptions and the conclusiveness of his logic. His aim was to convince the mind, yet he could effectively reach the heart. He was a forcible rather than a graceful speaker, and seemed more concerned about the thought which he presented than about the dress in which he arrayed it, or the manner in which he delivered it. He was like a man in battle, who may be naturally graceful, but who forgets his graces in the fight. At the same time it is true that few men possess greater oratorical ability. In college his exercises in elocution gave such extraordinary evidences of genius as to occasion the prediction that nothing but the power of religion would keep him from the stage.

As a teacher and logician Dr. Tucker was unexcelled. He was a dialectician of the first order—for with him logic was a passion. Few young men have left college better grounded in the principles of logic, or better practical dialecticians, than those tutored at Mercer during his incumbency in the chair of logic. In mental power and intellectual fertility he had no superior among the ministers of our state. With a heart naturally tender, he was nevertheless a firm, positive man; stern and unyielding when occasion required, always independent, uncompromising and fearless, possessed of the highest degree of self-respect, he yet would have been willing, if necessary, to wash the feet of the humblest saint. The soul of sincerity, he despised all pretence and dissimulation, and with as kind and true a heart as ever beat in human bosom, he had a mind that entitled him to walk as a peer among the princes of men. In conversation and in social life he was in the highest degree entertaining and cultivated. In one sense he was not much of a student, but in another sense he was a great student. He was no worshiper of books, but he was a habitual thinker and did his own thinking. Even logic, his favorite study, he cultivated not so much by books as by ways known only to himself. He denied being learned, yet he was a fine scholar and possessed a large fund of general as well as professional knowledge. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by his alma mater in 1860, and the degree of LL. D. by Mercer university in 1876.

At the time of his death he was proprietor and editor of "The Christian Index." He died in Atlanta, Sept. 9, 1889, from the effects of a fall.

DR. KINGMAN PORTER MOORE, a prominent physician of Macon, Ga., son of David H. and Susan (Calloway) Moore, was born in Monroe county, Ga., May 6, 1844. His father was a Baptist minister of much native power, and, as one of the pioneers in the early settlement of the eastern portion of Monroe county, did great work for the cause of religion and morality. His mother was Susan Calloway, daughter of Edward Calloway, also one of the early settlers of Monroe county, and a man of large influence and business capacity, who accumulated a large fortune and at one time represented his county in the general assembly. She was a woman possessed of an unusual amount of practical common sense and business qualities, and yet as gentle and amiable as it is possible to be. Dr. Moore was born near Bolingbroke, in Monroe county, but removed with his father's family to Forsyth when about ten years of age, and it was here that his preliminary education was begun. After one or two years in the common schools he entered Hilliard institute at Forsyth with the first session of this new school, under Thomas G. Scott. Some years subsequent to this his father removed to Barnesville, Ga., and it was at this school, now Gordon institute, where he was being prepared for the junior class in Mercer university, when the war came on and thwarted so many well laid plans of the south's young manhood. Full of enthusiasm and the hot southern sentiment which filled the hearts of the young men of those times, he left school when a little more than sixteen years of age and joined the Barnesville blues, the first volunteer company to enter the Confederate service from Pike county. This company went out under the command of the brave Dr. George M. McDowell, one of the foremost physicians of middle Georgia, and was assigned to duty in the Third Georgia battalion. Soon after entering the army Dr. Moore contracted measles at Lynchburg, Va., and for several months his life hung evenly in the balance, until it was decided by the physicians in attendance and his good captain that his frail constitution would not allow him to stand the vicissitudes of soldier life, and without his knowledge or consent he was honorably discharged from the army and sent home. During the early summer of 1862, having regained his health, Dr. Moore again enlisted in the Confederate service and joined the Griffin light artillery, a company then being made up at Griffin, Ga., under command of Obadiah Gibson, an old and prominent lawyer of his time. Soon after the organization of this company it was assigned to duty in the army of Tennessee and accompanied Gen. Braxton Bragg in his famous campaign through Tennessee and Kentucky during the fall and winter of 1862 and 1863. Returning from Kentucky, through Rabun Gap to Knoxville, Tenn., this portion of the army made the hard marches over the mountains to take part in the great battles around Murfreesboro and Tullahoma. Dr. Moore fought as a private in his company through the whole war, and was in many of the hottest conflicts and most noted battles of those dark days. For two long days during the terrible battle of Chickamauga the pieces of artillery of his company were kept intensely hot from constant firing. Perhaps the most prolonged and heaviest cannonading of the whole war was that of Sunday's fight of that great battle, and Dr. Moore's command was in the thickest of the conflict. Many of the men of his company bled from the ears from the atmospheric concussion due to the heavy cannonading. He was in many of the battles and the heavy skirmishing and artillery duels from Missionary Ridge, around Dalton, Resaca, Lost Mountain and around Marietta, and in two heavy engagements around Atlanta—one on the extreme right of the line, where Gen. Walker was killed, and one on the Sand Town road, to the left of the line—and he was in the hottest of these battles. In this last engagement he received his only wound, a slight cut upon the head by a fragment of shell, which killed two other men in his company. This wound was slight, and he did not leave the battlefield. While Gen. Sherman was on his famous march to the sea Dr. Moore was with his command under Gen. Hood on his memorable campaign to Nashville, and participated in the horrible battle at Jackson, Tenn.; also in the fight around Nashville, and during the memorable retreat fought at Huntsville and Stephenson. That part of the army to which he belonged came down through Mississippi to Demopolis, Ala., then to Selma, where another sharp and hard battle was fought. Retreating from Selma, the fragments of Hood's command made some slight resistance at several places, and the last battle, or heavy skirmish, in which Dr. Moore was engaged was in defense of the Girard bridge at Columbus, Ga. But the enemy succeeded later in the day in crossing over the railroad bridge higher up the river, and Columbus fell into the enemy's possession. The last battles were fought and the cause for which the south had spent so much of her means and so much of her patriotic blood sank forever. After the war Dr. Moore engaged in educational work the greater part of two years. Like many of the southern soldier boys he found himself not only without means but with an aged father and mother and single sister to look after and largely provide for; hence he had to work almost day and night to keep the wolf from the door, and to lay by sufficient funds to prosecute his chosen profession. Getting home from the army in the spring of 1865, he taught school the balance of the year near Barnesville, Ga., and began the study of medicine under Dr. George M. McDowell. The year 1866 was devoted to farming in the eastern portion of Monroe county, and reading medicine under Dr. D. B. Searcy. In 1867 he taught school near Bolingbroke, devoting his nights and spare moments from school duties to the prosecution of his studies. Leaving home and his young wife in October of that year for Baltimore, he attended medical lectures at the old Washington university, now College of Physicians and Surgeons. After returning from Baltimore he entered the Atlanta Medical college, then holding its annual sessions during the summer, and was graduated from this school in the fall of 1868. Dr. Moore was first honor man and valedictorian of his class. Immediately after his graduation he entered upon the practice of his profession at Knoxville, Crawford Co., Ga., where he did a large and successful practice. In 1879 he removed to Forsyth, Ga., the home of his early youth, and formed a partnership in the practice and drug business with the late Dr. L. B. Alexander, and for five years enjoyed a large and growing practice. While at Forsyth he delivered each winter a course of lectures on Anatomy and Hygiene to the young ladies of Monroe Female college. It was during these years that the college building and dormitories of this school were burned, and it is conceded by all that the present magnificent building owes its existence to the pluck and indefatigable efforts of Dr. Moore more than to any other one factor. For many years he was one of the most active trustees of this time-honored institution. Desiring to enlarge his field of work, Dr. Moore in 1883 removed to Macon, Ga., and was soon established in the front rank of the leading physicians of the place. He is a member and ex-president of the Macon Medical association, member and ex-president of the Medical Association of Georgia, and indeed has held every office within the gift of the State Medical association. When he was president of the association he enjoyed the distinction of being perhaps the youngest president the association had had up to that time. He is a member of the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association and the American Medical association. He was appointed by the governor in 1893 as one of the representatives from Georgia to the Pan-American Medical congress. In 1886 he took a post-graduate course at the polyclinic, New York, and also during the winter of 1886 and 1887 matriculated and attended lectures at the university, New York. Again in 1889 he took another post-graduate course at the polyclinic. In 1891 he was elected by the trustees of Mercer university to a professorship in this institution, and has up to date lectured on anatomy, physiology and hygiene to the junior and senior classes in this famous college. Dr. Moore is not unknown in the journalistic branch of his profession, having contributed a large number of valuable articles to different medical magazines, the titles of some of which are the following: Puerperal Eclampsia, its Etiology, Pathology and Treatment; Anaesthesia in Labor, with Some Suggestions as to the Rationale of its Action; the Female Urethra, a Source of Trouble often Overlooked in our Gynecological Investigations; What Shall be Done with the Uterus after Abortions? On Which Side of the Line Does the Pendulum now Swing in the Battey-Taite Operation? Report of Thirty-two Abdominal Operations with one Death; Report of a Large Vesico-Vaginal Fistula, with Complete Eversion of Bladder, Reaching to the Vulva, Pregnancy at Five Months, Operation and Complete Cure. These, with many other articles, have appeared in the various medical journals and transactions of medical organizations, and have been well received by the profession. Since 1890 Dr. Moore has operated a private sanitarium and treated a large number of patients from almost every section of Georgia and adjoining states, and has done most of the major operations in gynecological work, including removal of one spleen. In general surgery he has been very successful, having done several appendicitis and several lithotomy operations without a death. He is a Mason, member of the Macon lodge No. 5, F. A. M., was worshipful master of the lodges at Knoxville and Forsyth while residing at those places. He is also a member of Macon senate No. 117, K. A. E. O. He is a member of the Baptist church and has filled the office of deacon in his church for twenty years. In January, 1867, Dr. Moore was married to Miss Sallie M. Milner, of Pike county, Ga., whose lineage marks some of the most solid citizens of Georgia and Alabama. Of this union five children have blessed their home, the oldest, Dr. Johnson McDowell, having graduated from Mercer university in 1888, from the Atlanta Medical college in 1894 and from Bellevue Hospital Medical college, New York, in 1895; Minnie Lou, now Mrs. C. W. Steed, formerly professor in Gordon institute, now editor of "The Easy Chair;" Attie S., now music teacher in Waynesboro academy; Colquitt K., now in college at Mercer university, and Susan Marie, now at school in National Park seminary, Forest Glen, Md.

WILLIAM H. FELTON, ex-congressman and graduate in medicine, resides near Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga. He was the only child of his parents, John and Mary D. Felton, and was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., on June 19, 1823. His paternal grandfather, Job Felton, was a native of North Carolina, of Scotch-Irish extraction. He emigrated to Georgia in early manhood, settling in Wilkes county. He was a scion of the Felton family, whose descendants are found in many states of the Union—names worthily remembered in lines of intelligence and progress. He married twice, his second wife being a Miss Harrell (the family name still borne by the subject of this sketch), and she was the mother of Dr. W. H. Felton's father, Mr. John Felton, who was born and reared in Oglethorpe county, where he lived from infancy until he removed to Athens, Ga., in the year 1835. A farmer by occupation as well as choice, Mr. John Felton relinquished his fertile lands in his native county to educate his only son at the university of Georgia, and to be near him during that crucial period of his career. John Felton was also a soldier in the war of 1812, entering one of the first volunteer companies organized in that part of the state, serving as captain of his company during the most of six months' service under Gen. John Floyd. He was in the battle of Calibbee, near the site of the city of Columbus, and was distinguished alike for courage and patriotism. In the year 1847 Mr. John Felton and his wife, accompanied by Dr. Wm. H. Felton, moved to the county of Cass, now Bartow, where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred in the year 1870, at the ripe age of eighty years. His attachment to the Baptist church and his adherence to the whig party were the prominent features of his religious and political character. His wife, Mary D. Felton, departed this life in 1859 at the age of sixty-three years. William H. Felton was born in the Oglethorpe home, was reared on a farm and received his early school training in the old-field schools of that era. When twelve years old he entered the grammar school of Athens under the well-known preceptor, Mr. Ebenezer Newton. Matriculating in Franklin college in 1838, he graduated from the university of the state in 1842. He was a well-known speaker in the debates which were held weekly under the auspices of the Demosthenian and Phi Kappa societies; Dr. Felton being a member of the first-named literary organization. These debates were the distinguishing features of that period of university training, beginning on Saturday forenoons, often continuing throughout the afternoon until 10 o'clock at night. These contests in forensic skill developed many of the statesmen and orators which made Georgia great in the eyes of the nation during the years which followed. The mention of A. C. Garlington, John Vason, Henry Hull and others of Dr. Felton's class, comes in close proximity with Benj. H. Hill, J. L. M. Curry, Thos. R. R. Cobb, Joseph Le Conte, Linton Stephens, E. H. Pottle and divers other names which illustrated Georgia on field and forum. Immediately upon leaving college Dr. Felton began the study of medicine under Dr. Richard D. Moore, a famous practitioner of Athens, graduating from the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, in the year 1844, the valedictorian of a splendid class of students. Dr. Felton was married in early life to Miss Ann Carlton, daughter of Mr. J. R. Carlton of Athens. This devoted wife and Christian mother died in 1851, leaving one child, a daughter, Mrs. Ann A. Gibbons. While scarcely out of his teens he taught a class of boys at the earnest request of patrons and friends; and the roll call would now bring forward the names of a number of Georgia's eminent men who were among his pupils at that time. He joined the Methodist church in the year 1839 when only sixteen years old, and held the responsible position of Sunday school superintendent, selected by the honored pastor of the church, Rev. W. J. Parks. After removing to Cass county, locating near Cartersville, Dr. Felton entered upon the active practice of his chosen profession of medicine; but the strain upon a delicate nervous organization proved too severe and forced retirement, with only agriculture and literary studies to occupy his attention. In 1848 he received a license to become a local minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. For upwards of forty years he gave the best efforts of his mind and strength to Sabbath pulpit exercises throughout the county. Large crowds followed these appointments, whether in town pulpits or under rustic bush-arbor meeting places. For nearly half a century, Sunday after Sunday, without salary or perquisites, this faithful preacher devoted his best energies to the cause of God and religion; and it is probable that he preached more funeral sermons, and performed a greater number of marriage ceremonies than any man of his day and generation. Bishop Andrew presided at the ordination service when Dr. Felton was made a deacon, under the regulations of the Methodist church; and Bishop George F. Pierce conferred the office of elder four years later. When physical strength permits these pulpit exercises are still continued in and around his home. In October, 1853, Dr. Felton was again married—to the lady who bears his name at this writing—namely, Miss Rebecca Latimer, daughter of Maj. Charles Latimer, late of De Kalb county, Ga. Perhaps the history of the state does not present the names of any two persons whose national reputation equals that of Dr. Felton and his loyal helpmeet. With zeal, ability and perseverance, she has walked hand in hand with her husband for nearly half a century, sustaining, cheering and promoting his best efforts for good government and the benefit of the laboring classes of this county. During the heat of political campaigns in Washington and elsewhere, her intelligent counsel and general helpfulness have been his inspiration and strong support. With unceasing watchfulness she has been ever at his side, to caution, aid and defend, until she has made herself his pride and crown of rejoicing in the harvest days of age and honors. As one of Georgia's two lady managers of the World's Fair, she won encomiums of praise and appreciation from her national colleagues, and she has been also selected to further the interests of the Cotton States and International exposition from its very inception. In token of her beautiful loyalty to her husband's interests, as well as her patriotic endeavors for reform and progress in her native state, the legislature of Georgia invited her to the speaker's platform at one of its brilliant sessions, "as a woman in whom the state took pride." This auspicious union is blessed with one surviving child—Dr. Howard E. Felton—a practicing physician in his native county of Bartow. Dr. Felton's political career has been most remarkable as well as interesting to Georgians. In early manhood he attached himself to the whig party, and the imprimatur of these early whig principles has been discovered or developed under all the changes and environments of later years. His first vote was cast for Henry Clay; his first political speech was made in Watkinsville, near Athens, for the candidates of the whig party. So long as there was a whig party to support he remained loyal to its principles and candidates, representing Cass county in the legislature of 1851. After the war he united his fortunes with the democratic party, because he was in full sympathy with the southern cause, and served as a volunteer surgeon in Ocmulgee hospital, Macon, Ga., during several months of the civil war. Unlike many others, he does not regret the failure of the southern Confederacy, for while he was the owner of a large number of slaves, he is rejoiced at their emancipation, and believes the abolishment of human slavery to be the one great blessing that resulted from the war between the states. During reconstruction days and carpet-bag politics he was a loyal democrat, true to his own people and pronounced in disfavor of the greedy horde of politicians who "ran with the hare and held with the hounds" in Georgia. During the year 1874 there were unrest and great dissatisfaction with such methods and men. Complying with the urgent request of personal and political friends he announced himself as an independent candidate in the Seventh congressional district of Georgia for the Forty-fourth congress. For nearly six months this campaign went on, attended by unprecedented heat and bitterness. It was deemed rank treason to antagonize a party nomination by his political opponents, and the contest grew hotter every hour until the election, when the result hung in the balance three whole days before the vote was officially declared. Such a race, with such odds to contend against, had never been known in Georgia, or in the south, up to that time; and hundreds of people recall the vision of a heroic candidate, without newspapers, or money, or organized support to aid him, traveling constantly over fourteen large populous counties, speaking day and night; hurling defiance in the teeth of his defamers, and making the welkin ring in his defense of the rights of a free people until he won his election by a majority of eighty-two votes, despite the frantic but well-ordered opposition of the entire democratic organization of the state of Georgia. His service in the Forty-fourth congress gave him national reputation as an orator and statesman; and his merit was duly recognized by his position on the committee of commerce, with river and harbor improvements. He succeeded in placing the Coosa river in the list of government undertakings or enterprises, and from that day to this the national work has gone steadily on to completion. His patriotic mind enlisted national aid for Savannah and Brunswick harbors, and his subsequent re-elections to the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth congresses gave him enlarged opportunities to benefit the commerce of his native state and the entire south by his loyalty to their interests. Perhaps the distinguishing feature of his congressional career was his skillful diagnosis of the financial depression then afflicting the country, and his brilliant advocacy of the remonetization of the silver dollar. His speeches on this subject read like prophecy—in the light of experience and present financial disasters—which have surely followed the repeal of the law which permitted the limited coinage of silver. Hon. A. H. Stephens pronounced his famous "wrecker speech" to be the equal of the finest efforts of the early statesmen of the republic, when orators were giants in debate and marvels of eloquence. His unflinching advocacy of treasury notes and gold and silver coin to be kept equal in purchasing value with each other, each and all interchangeable at the treasury and a legal tender for all debts, public and private, constituted perhaps the clearest system of practical finance ever known to this government and gave him the confidence of his constituents and the approval of the state at large. A bill which made national quarantine effective, was also his pet and pride, and elicited strong words of approval from S. S. Cox and other national statesmen. At the opening of the Forty-sixth congress, Speaker S. J. Randall placed Dr. Felton on the first committee of the house, namely, ways and means. He had for his colleagues such names as Garfield, Kelley, Fernando Wood, Carlisle and Tucker of Virginia, the ablest men in congress. While Mr. Garfield was serving on this committee he was elected first to the senate, and afterward to the presidency of the United States, and was succeeded by Gov. McKinley on the committee. A revision of the tariff brought about the reduction of duty on many necessities of life, and placed quinine on the free list; but he has always been an advocate of a tariff for revenue raised from the luxuries of commerce, with incidental protection to American industries. For six years this faithful public servant thus devoted his best energies to the service of his constituents, until the machine politicians of the Seventh congressional district reasserted themselves and with their methods compassed his defeat in the year 1880. In 1884 Dr. Felton was elected to represent Bartow county in the general assembly of the state, and was re-elected for two succeeding terms thereafter. It is no exaggeration to affirm that no member of the general assembly was listened to more attentively, was confided in more implicitly, or who exercised a wider or more potential influence than did this member from Bartow. Largely through his instrumentality, his determined and uncompromising opposition to the sale of the Western & Atlantic railroad, this magnificent property of the state was saved to the commonwealth. The result was that under a new lease the rental was increased from $300,000 per annum to $420,000—one-half of which goes to the public school fund. During the pendency of this lease bill excitement ran high. The accustomed lobby influences were present and rampant. Every plan, policy and suggestion was presented, pressed and urged, to effect the sale of the state's property and to defeat the will of the people; but this faithful representative never faltered from the advocacy of what he was convinced were the best interests of the people of Georgia, until the lease was perfected and the bill which he wrote out in his own home became the law of the state—with valuable amendments added thereto. The general result thus accruing to his labors will be found to be at the end of twenty-nine years—when this new lease expires, that its rental will have poured into the state's treasury over $12,000,000 in clean cash, the state coming into full ownership at the expiration of the twenty-nine-year lease, with all these betterments and improvements placed thereon by the lessees. From the day that Gen. Oglethorpe landed at Yamacraw until this good year 1895, no son of Georgia can make prouder boast of his valuable services to his native state than this constant flow of money, which for twenty-nine years will sing his praises as it falls into the strong box in the capitol, month by month, as the law directs. Unborn children will reap its benefits through the educational advantages thus provided. Bronze and marble tell the story of patriotism on the battlefield and in the halls of legislation; but this man's memory will be written on the hearts of the coming generations of the children of Georgia, and honored by the taxpayers of his native state. Dr. Felton was also the pioneer in the introduction of bills into two successive state legislatures to provide reformatory institutions for juvenile convicts, and the seed which was thus sown amidst personal criticism, defamation and invective on the part of his opponents, is bound to bring a harvest of fine results under the march of progress and awakened public opinion. Already reforms have been accomplished in the convict system of the state growing out of his continual agitation of this subject. No matter what name may go upon the future records as the introducer or author of a successful reformatory measure before a willing general assembly, the father of this reform, the motor that started the effective movement, the genius which presided at the birth of reformatory legislation in the state of Georgia, will go down in history as the work of William H. Felton. His speech in the Georgia legislature when he defended his reformatory bill from the attacks of the opposition, and paid a public tribute to his honored wife for her co-operation and patriotism, will be remembered by those who heard it as one of the greatest triumphs of forensic skill and withering invective ever recorded for its brilliancy and effect upon the crowded audience which had gathered in anticipation of the event. Dr. Felton's record would be incomplete without mention of his gallant defense of the railroad commission of Georgia, when its enemies proposed to destroy or emasculate the strong features that had commended it as a measure of public good. When the fight was over, Maj. Campbell Wallace, who had been its ruling spirit from its inception up to that time, approached the doctor, saying: "Sir, you have saved the railroad commission of Georgia." During its early years there was no measure more approved by the masses—and certainly none more beneficial to the commerce and prosperity of the state—when it laid its restraining hand upon monopolies and syndicates, and regulated railroad tariffs and freights inside the limits of Georgia. Dr. Felton's devotion to the cause of education is also one of the marked features of his entire life. Acting upon his convictions that the state should place within the reach of every child of school age, without charge, the opportunity of acquiring both a common school and even higher education, he labored untiringly to accomplish this result, and while a member of the state legislature was a splendid champion of both the technological school and the normal school for girls. At this writing he is a trustee of the state university, and the institution has no warmer friend or more ardent supporter. At the close of this sketch it is proper to notice his present attitude towards the financial questions of the day, of which he remains an active factor. While a member of congress he was an effective partisan of the Bland-Allison bill, which looked to the remonetization of silver, and his views have undergone no change up to date. He believes the interests of the entire republic require the free coinage of silver and the issuance of treasury notes by the government. Last year, namely 1894, convinced that the people's party alone was committed to this policy, and that the democratic party was pledged to a single gold standard, which was destroying taxable values in Georgia at the rate of $50,000,000 per annum, he allowed his name to be placed before the populist convention, and despite the infirmities of age, he led their forces throughout a most heated campaign until the election in November, when his opponent was counted in by 1,500 majority. The methods used to defeat him were so manifestly illegal, unfair and unconstitutional in his judgment that he and his supporters have taken the matter to a higher court to be adjudged by the incoming house of representatives. If he had been willing to subordinate these abiding opinions to the exigencies of party policy he might have held the highest political positions in the state; but it is a fact, well attested, that he would without hesitation abandon any party or faction which failed to avow his own platform of political principles. He was entirely willing to enter the democratic caucus while a member of congress to secure the organization of the house; but whenever that caucus attempted to control his vote on a legislative question he repudiated the caucus, adhering to whatever he believed to be the best legislation for the country. Independence of thought and independence of action, he believes to be the prerogative of an American citizen. His opinions are convictions; and he never fails to be earnest and ardent in his efforts to give them practical effect. As a debator he is vehement and impetuous, but logical always; presenting his well-arranged facts and illustrations with extraordinary impressiveness and force.

Progressive along all lines of thought, he never fails to be aggressive. He is a dangerous opponent to attack. His power for repellent denunciation is almost unparalleled. Gathering his argumentative points from every possible direction he marshals the whole into a battery that sweeps as it desolates. His numerous newspaper controversies with brilliant minds and strong thinkers on public questions would make a volume in themselves of great value to younger men. Yet he is an exceedingly modest man in regard to himself, and makes no parade of his recognized usefulness. His public reputation is without suspicion and his private life without blemish. No man who knows his daily walk but holds him in high esteem, for honesty of purpose and probity of character, as a citizen and patriot. Perhaps he makes mistakes, but they are always honest mistakes; and those who know him best respect him most for his unswerving devotion to his well-known beliefs and opinions, which he defends at all hazards—even to his own hurt. When he dies Georgia will have buried one of her most notable and praiseworthy sons, because of these marked and peculiar traits of public and private character. He is a most loyal Georgian; the good name and prosperity of the commonwealth are his boast and pride. If loyalty to duty and motherland makes a good citizen, the subject of this sketch needs no higher encomium in these pages.

DR. JAMES CORBIN AVARY, one of Atlanta's popular physicians, was born May 9, 1856, in De Kalb county, Ga., at his father's country home. He was educated by private teachers, in the county schools, and at the old Decatur academy, taking subsequently, at the age of twenty-one, a position in Avary's drug store in Atlanta and commencing the study of that profession, for which his present success proves him so well fitted. He continued his studies at the Southern Medical college, which he entered in 1880, and at the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated as valedictorian of his class in 1882. Subsequently he pursued his medical studies still further, going for that purpose to Chicago and New York. Immediately after his graduation he began the practice of medicine in Atlanta, where he has met with marked success in his chosen specialty of surgery and gynecology. Among the professional offices which he has so satisfactorily filled may be mentioned city physician of the sixth ward, gynecologist at the Atlanta polyclinic and lecturer on gynecology at the Southern Medical college. Dr. Avary is a member of the State Medical association and of Atlanta board of health. He was one of the founders of the Atlanta Society of Medicine and the Atlanta Obstetrical and Gynecological society. He is an able and impressive writer and an occasional contributor to the medical journals. A paper on State and Municipal Hygiene, which he read before the State Medical association at Americus in 1893, was most flatteringly received and attracted widespread attention at the time of its delivery and consequent publication. His father, Dr. James Corbin Avary, a native of Clumbia county, Ga., graduated in the famous class of 1843 at the old Augusta Medical college, and practiced his much-loved profession with marked success up to the time of his death, in Decatur in 1873. He was a member of the state legislature prior to 1860, doubtless being led on to try political life for a while by the example of his father, Judge Arch. Avary, who for many years was state senator from the old Avary home, county of Columbia. Judge Avary's father was Dr. John Avary, of Mecklenburg county, N. C. The mother of the subject of this sketch was Susan Frances Carr, daughter of Col. Thomas Dabney Carr of the war of 1812, and granddaughter of Col. Thomas Carr, a gallant officer of the revolutionary war. Col. Dabney Carr was the lineal descendant of Gen. Nathaniel Bacon, who struck the first real blow against British oppression in Virginia in the trying days of the colonial period. Dr. Avary is of English colonial blood on both paternal and maternal lines and has the records of his family history in an unbroken line back to the year 1000.

MILDRED RUTHERFORD is a native of Athens, Ga., where her father, Prof. Williams Rutherford, was for many years an honored member of the faculty of the university of Georgia. Miss Rutherford at a very early age gave promise of a brilliant literary career and her friends have not been disappointed in the outcome. She received an unusually thorough education from the best teachers and devoted most of her leisure time to the study of belles lettres. Athens has always been noted for the high literary tone of its society, and Miss Rutherford's rare talents and critical judgment were soon recognized. She took pleasure in imparting her knowledge to others, and was never happier than when engaged in discussing books and authors in a congenial circle. Naturally she was attracted to the profession in which her distinguished father had been so successful. As a teacher in the Atlanta Girls' high school and as principal of the Lucy Cobb institute at Athens she placed herself in the front rank of Georgia's educators. Her well-known volume, entitled English Authors, and a more recent work, American Authors, have had a wide circulation and have won a place in public favor as valuable hand-books. In these books Miss Rutherford's wide range of reading, good taste and unerring judgment are plainly evident on every page. Few women in the south have made so notable a record, and it is safe to say that in a wider field her success would have been still more marked. It is expected that in the near future other volumes from her pen will emphasize the success which she has already achieved. Thus far her life has been calm and uneventful—her triumphs as an educator and an author being the milestones that mark her progressive pathway. That she is a woman of genius, whose patient work has been of incalculable benefit to the rising generation of her native state, is the verdict of all Georgians who know anything of her history. But her fame is by no means confined to her native state. Throughout the south and in the great literary centers of the country the name of Mildred Rutherford is a favorite one with all progressive educators and all lovers of good literature.

PROF. JOHN CHARLES WOODWARD, one of the most prominent young teachers in the state, is president of the Middle Georgia Military and Agricultural college at Milledgeville, and while he is one of the most capable educators of Georgia's youth, he is perhaps the youngest man holding so important a position with the state. He was born in Butts county, Ga., July 26, 1866. His father was a farmer of the old southern school who yet did not succumb to the misfortunes of war entirely, but with an energy born of desperation and good faith, added to his farm duties the care of a general store and also improved his opportunities for money making through his knowledge as a mechanic and practical carriage builder. Young Woodward, under the tuition of his excellent father, lived on a farm and did shop and farm work, acquiring considerable skill within the lines of his teaching. During part of the winter and the summer young Woodward attended the common schools of the country; he studied at noon and at night in not only the text books placed in his hands, but he reached out for all books that were available and eagerly read them, guided by no special thought except an insatiable thirst for reading. After a few years Mr. Woodward's father moved to the town of Griffin, Ga., to educate his children, two daughters and four sons. At eighteen years of age Charles prevailed upon his father to allow him to enter upon a college course, and being desirous of military training, he sent him to the North Georgia Agricultural college at Dahlonega, the most prominent military college of the state. Prof. Woodward's course at Dahlonega was highly creditable. He was soon recognized as a hard student, diligent in everything and capable in all the branches of study. He won the Frank P. Rice Latin medal and wore it during his junior and senior years. He was the senior captain of the cadet battalion and one of the best trained officers in that excellent body of young men. He was graduated in 1888 with first honor among a class of brilliant young men, all of whom have distinguished themselves more or less in their lines of business. Immediately after he was graduated he studied law for a few months under Col. E. W. Hammond, of Griffin, Ga. He did not apply for admission to the bar, although there was fair promise for success in this professional field for a young man of Prof. Woodward's training and capability. He did better for himself and for the state by adopting teaching as a profession. During Mr. Woodward's college course he spent the summer vacations teaching in the common schools of the state, thereby enabling him to pay a large part of his own expense while at college. In 1889 he accepted a position as teacher and commandant of cadets in Gainesville (Ga.) college; after one term, however, he resigned this place and accepted a position in Jackson institute at Jackson, Ga., in his native county. The next year he was tendered and accepted the vice-presidency of Gordon institute at Barnesville, Ga. Here, within a few months, after much effort on his own part, dealing with prejudice that was unfounded, he succeeded in organizing a military feature in the school, having secured from the school funds about $500 for this purpose. A volunteer corps of cadets was organized, which doubled its number within one year. At the second commencement exercises after the battalion was formed they turned out 120 men, rank and file, with a full cadet band of thirteen pieces. Mr. Woodward made a strong effort to secure a detail from the war department of an officer from the regular army to act as commandant. The detail was made, the benefit of his work accruing to the school being almost incalculable. After two years at Barnesville he accepted the presidency of the Middle Georgia Military and Agricultural college in 1892. This position he now holds, although he has had many tempting offers to go into various lines of business and to enjoy therein the advantages which his fine talents and searching knowledge of human nature that marked him so well as a teacher, would have a broader and perhaps a more lucrative field among men. For nearly two years, besides his presidential duties, he assumed the position of commandant of cadets. After considerable effort a detail was secured from the war department to act as commandant of cadets and in January, 1894, Lieut. A. B. Scott, United States army, was sent to Milledgeville to act in this capacity. Just when the college was entering upon a remarkable career of success a great calamity came upon them; the old capitol of Georgia, the college building, was burned. Prof. Woodward rallied the trustees, who stood mute and inactive in the presence of such a disaster; he gathered a few earnest citizens, and through the co-operation of Gov. W. J. Northen and other prominent men of the state he succeeded in having the insurance companies holding policies on the building replace it entirely. In the rebuilding of the old capitol opportunities were had to change the interior construction and arrange it better for college purposes than it had formerly been. Under Prof. Woodward's leadership the trustees and citizens of Milledgeville have built a four-story structure for the cadets' barracks, giving all modern conveniences of light, heat and sanitation. In short, the school has become one of the leading military institutions of the state, and is fondly spoken of among its friends as the West Point of the south. A large part of the growth and advancement of this noble institution is due to Prof. Woodward's personal magnetism and determined effort to bring the very best advantages to the scholars intrusted to his care. At twenty-two years of age Prof. Woodward joined the Presbyterian church, and three years later became an elder therein. His life has been exemplary from his youth and he has always stood among his fellows as a tower of strength for the right. In December, 1891, he was married to Miss Lucile Castleberry, of Dawsonville, Ga., a graduate of the college at Gainesville and of the Lucy Cobb institute at Athens. Although their first son, Charles Price, died at six months of age, their second son, Douglas Castleberry, is now one year old and is a joy in their happy household. Prof. Woodward represents the great idea of youthful success; he has not stood back on account of his years, but has unhesitatingly asserted himself according to his ability, and he has won a position which is easily accorded to him among the prominent educators of the state. Modest and retiring in his disposition, enjoying to the utmost the seclusion of his study and the quiet of his school-room, he is yet ever planning new victories among circumstances that seem insurmountable and with a pluck that knows no excuse for failure; his plans are successful. This faint outline of the few early years of a life that has been so useful to the state is but a promise that the future holds immense good in store for this fearless, quiet student, who calmly asserts that the needs of the school must be met and places his demands up to the last notch of improvement in instruction. His impress for good among the young men of his tuition is lasting, and many now rise up to speak in his honor.

HENRY H. CABANISS is one of four brothers whose sketches appear in these Memoirs, each in different localities and engaged in different vocations, yet each conspicuously successful in his preferred pursuit, and displaying unusual business and professional ability. Henry H. Cabaniss, business manager of the Atlanta "Journal," Atlanta Ga., is the son of Elbridge Gerry and Sarah (Chipman) Cabaniss, and was born in Forsyth, Monroe Co., Ga., June 21, 1848. A brief sketch of his parents will be found elsewhere in these volumes. While a boy and youth he attended the excellent schools of his native city and afterward attended and was graduated from the university of Georgia, Athens, himself earning the money to meet the expenses of his higher education. After his graduation he came to Atlanta in 1867 and was bookkeeper for the daily Atlanta "New Era," holding the position several years. In 1873 he purchased the Forsyth "Advertiser," and as editor-proprietor conducted it ably and profitably until 1882, when he sold the office and came to Atlanta to accept the position of business manager of the "Southern Cultivator," the oldest and ablest agricultural publication in the south. In this capacity he remained with the "Cultivator" five years, discharging the duties incumbent on him with his characteristic industry and fidelity—creditably to himself and with great acceptability to the publishers. In 1887 he became one of a strong company which bought the Atlanta "Journal," an evening daily, of which he was made the business manager, a position he continues to hold. Under his superb management the "Journal" has attained to a circulation equaling, if not surpassing, that of any other evening paper in this section, and to a wide and potential influence, and has been made one of the most valuable properties of its class in the south. Appreciatively recognizing his superior business and financial capabilities, moneyed institutions have called him to other important and responsible offices. He is now the able and popular president of the Georgia Press association, president of the Georgia Security and Banking company, director of the Southern Home Building & Loan association and of the Georgia Bond &

Investment company and vice-president of the Cotton States and International exposition. Mr. Cabaniss was married Dec. 13, 1870, to Miss Sarah E. Royston, of Monroe county, stepdaughter of Dr. James S. Lawson, deceased, the fruit of which union has been four children. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the masonic fraternity and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church, of which he is a deacon.

CHARLES HENRY DORSETT. One among the most active and conspicuously progressive of the young business men of Savannah is Charles Henry Dorsett, extensively engaged in the real estate business. He is a son of John and Sarah R. Dorsett, and was born in Savannah, Nov. 29, 1845. His father was a master ship carpenter and was in charge of the largest ship yard in the city, and died in 1846; but his mother is still living. Until he was sixteen years of age Mr. Dorsett attended Chatham academy; he then engaged as a clerk. During the late war, while the Federal forces were investing the city, he enlisted in Maj. Sherman's battalion, organized for its defense. Although comparatively Mr. Dorsett's life has been a very active one, that activity has been unusually beneficial to the city. Entering commercial life quite young, he has grown with the growth of his native city, and advanced gradually, yet steadily and continuously, to his present commanding commercial and social position. His earlier years were spent as bookkeeper for various leading grocery, banking and cotton houses. For ten years he was cashier for A. S. Hartridge, one of the prominent cotton factors of the day, and managed his business for ten years preceding that gentleman's death. In December he established the firm of Dorsett & Kennedy, auctioneers and real estate dealers. The business proved to be exceptionally prosperous and lucrative from the start, but in 1879 the partnership was dissolved, and since then Mr. Dorsett has conducted the business alone with marvelous success. He has disposed of most of the city and suburban property that has been sold in and about the city for the last ten years, and his judgment being apparently unerring, his counsel is daily sought by persons seeking to profitably invest in real estate. His success has been such that he is now a large holder of valuable eligibly located real estate in and around Savannah, and owns a delightful summer residence at the Isle of Hope. He organized the Savannah Real Estate company, which marked the first activity in real estate transactions, which proved to be a very profitable investment to all who were interested in it. He also organized the Savannah Investment company, which built the Belt Line railway, which has not only one of the best roads of the kind in the south, but owns nearly 500 lots in the extended city limits, now rapidly building up. He is a director in and treasurer of both companies, is vice-president and director of the Chatham Real Estate & Improvement company, which he organized; was also active in the organization of the Citizens' Loan association, which has been succeeded by the Citizens' bank, of which he is vice-president and director. He is a charter member and director of the Title Guarantee company and Dime Savings bank, and has large interests in all the real estate and financial agencies in the city. In nothing has his judgment been better exemplified than in his advocacy of the purchase, while serving on the board of county commissioners, of the Pritchard plantation for the county. This was a tide-water tract of 1,300 acres, cultivated in rice, which materially interfered with the drainage of that part of the county. The only way out of it was its purchase, which was made at his suggestion. The county was benefited incalculably from a sanitary point of view, roads have been opened and the property enhanced in value, so that the sale of two-thirds of it will more than return the purchase money to the treasury, and leave about 350 acres of fertile agricultural land to be set apart as a refuge for the poor. By his earnest endeavors a number of very important new roads were opened, providing highways which have brought into notice large outlying tracts of thousands of acres before almost inaccessible, and this important improvement was consummated without other cost to the county than the labor of the convict force. By these improvements public thought has been led up to a desire for better and more highways, and he has thus been instrumental in adding largely to the real estate values of Chatham county. Had he done nothing more it would place his name high on the roll of public benefactors. When a reapportionment was made in 1888 he declined to permit his name to be presented. The county owes largely to his influence and wisely directed efforts its new and costly jail and jailor's residence, and the recently completed magnificent court house. He has been a liberal contributor to almost every enterprise started in the city for ten years past for the advancement of the city's commercial prosperity, and in nearly all has been a leading and master spirit. He is a prominent member of the masonic fraternity, ranks high as a member of the I. O. O. F. and has held all the offices up to that of grand representative. He is now serving his sixth year as one of three representatives of Georgia to the sovereign grand lodge of the world, and is lieutenant-colonel on the staff of Gen. John C. Underwood, grand-sire and generalissimo of the order of Independent Odd Fellows throughout the world. He is a member of Wesley Monumental Methodist Episcopal church south, is chairman of its board of trustees and was chairman of the board of stewards and superintendent of its Sunday school many years. Few citizens of Savannah have been as useful in every line of progressive development—commercial, industrial, intellectual and religion, than Mr. Dorsett, and being only in the meridian of a robust and matured manhood, with ripe experience, it would be difficult to fix the bounds of his future usefulness. Mr. Dorsett married Miss Josie Gross, a daughter of Mr. Charley Gross, a merchant of Savannah, the fruit of which union has been a beautiful daughter, now in her fifteenth year, blushing into accomplished womanhood.

THOMAS BALLANTYNE. One of the most useful and deservedly popular and prosperous citizens of Savannah, Ga., is Thomas Ballantyne, who was born in Glasgow, Scotland, Aug. 5, 1831, now co-proprietor of one of the best and most extensive machine and boiler shops and foundry in the city of Savannah. His father was Thomas Ballantyne, whose sterling and strong characteristics of integrity, indomitable industry and genial characteristics he inherited. After receiving a good education at Hutchinson's academy, a celebrated school in Glasgow, Mr. Ballantyne served his apprenticeship as an iron founder. Shortly after the expiration of his term of apprenticeship he enlisted in the Scottish grays, or Second Royal dragoons, made famous in history by its celebrated charge at Balaklava. He, however, was on ship-board at the time, and although not in that charge, served with that intrepid command for two years during the Crimean war and was at the capture of Sebastopol. After two years' service he bought his discharge and returned to Glasgow, where he worked at his trade eight months, and then came to New York in 1856. Soon after his arrival his superior excellence as an iron molder secured him the foremanship of the Newark (N. J.) machine shop, one of the largest establishments of its kind in this country. In 1859 he was sent for to come to Savannah to do a piece of work no one in that city could do, and being prevailed upon to remain, was given charge of Alvin N. Miller's foundry and machine works. He was a member of the Georgia hussars—the oldest troop of cavalry in the United States—and the first year of the war went to join his company. But at Richmond he was turned back, the Confederate government considering his services more valuable in the manufacture of ordnance than in the field, and on his return to Savannah he was made superintendent and manufacturer of ordnance for the gun-boats of the Confederate navy, and during the last two years of the war was superintendent of the Confederate states foundry. When the Federal army gained possession of Savannah the government confiscated the Miller machine works, and Mr. Ballantyne was put in charge to do such repair and other work as the steamships and gunboats and other government property might require. In 1866 Mr. Ballantyne and Mr. John McDonough established a foundry under the firm name of McDonough & Ballantyne, and a year later moved to other quarters, where more space and better facilities could be had, and built extensive machine and boiler shops and foundry, the largest and best of the kind in the city, where they employ fifty hands and turn out boilers, engines and machinery of all descriptions, and which for many years has made and is still making all the iron castings for the Central railway. The firm still bears the name of McDonough & Ballantyne, J. J. McDonough having succeeded to the partnership after the death of his father. During the war Mr. Ballantyne commanded a company recruited from the machine shops for home defense, and he is now an honorary member of the Georgia hussars. He is a member of the board of jury commissioners; has served many years on the board of aldermen; when he was chairman of the committee on markets, and also of the sanitary and health committee during the epidemic of 1876, during which period he labored zealously and earnestly until the close of the epidemic, when he was himself stricken down. He is connected with many enterprises of a public character, and is always among the foremost in promoting every industry calculated to promote the growth and prosperity of the city of his adoption, contributing to them liberally of his time, counsel and means. He is conspicuous for his work and proficiency and consequent usefulness as a member of the masonic fraternity, and is highly valued for his knowledge of its rituals and impressive exemplification of its work. He is a Knight Templar and has had conferred on him every office in the gift of the fraternity up to and including those of the commandery. He was worshipful master of Zerubabel lodge six years, high priest of the R. A. chapter twelve years, thrice illustrious master of the council of royal and select masters the same period, and is now and for seven years past has been eminent commander of Palestine commandery. In addition to these honors conferred by his Savannah brethren, he has been deputy grand master of royal and select masters, and for years grand commander of the Knights Templar for Georgia, and is now deputy grand high priest of the Grand Royal Arch chapter of Georgia. Mr. Ballantyne is a member of the Independent Presbyterian church, has served on its board of trustees, and has also been the president of St. Andrew's society, of which he is one of the most pleasant and genial members. He is unmarried and has one brother, William Ballantyne, who is employed at the foundry, and one sister, Mrs. Margaret Hunter, residing in Glasgow, Scotland.

COL. PETER REILLY was born in Hampshire, England, in 1839, and went with his parents to Ireland when an infant. Here the family remained until he was twelve years of age. His father having died in the meantime, he and his widowed mother set sail for America, landing first at New Orleans, and coming from there directly to Savannah, Ga. Here young Reilly soon found work clerking in a grocery store until the breaking out of the war. He enlisted at once, joining the Irish Jasper Greens, and the same night of his identification with it was elected junior lieutenant. He went into the service with this company, which belonged to the First Volunteer regiment of Georgia, and served as its junior lieutenant until the summer of 1863. By the order of the war department he was then promoted from the rank of junior second lieutenant, over the head of the senior second lieutenant, to the first lieutenantcy. In December of 1864 he was made acting adjutant of the First Volunteer regiment of Georgia, in which capacity he served until the first battle of Bentonville, N. C., when his brigade was consolidated into one regiment, still known as the First Volunteer regiment of Georgia (consolidated), Col. C. H. Olmstead commanding. By this gentleman he was made the permanent adjutant of the regiment, serving in this capacity until the close of the war, when he was paroled at Greensboro, N. C. After the war Col. Reilly returned to Savannah, Ga., on foot. Later he served as purser on a steamer running between Savannah and Augusta, and afterward engaged in the commission business. Thereafter he was connected with a grocery until 1874, when he entered upon his present occupation, that of a real estate agent. In 1884 Mr. Reilly was elected to the legislature, and twice re-elected. His constituents hoped he would be able to secure the passage of a bill appropriating money for the militia, etc., and in this he was successful. This bill, which became a law in 1885, has been of great advantage in bringing the militia into organized form and under proper command. Col. Reilly has twice been placed upon the committee upon education, and has always warmly urged and voted for every measure tending to the advancement of the great cause. The colonel's war record, also, is one of which he may well be proud. He not only served with gallantry and distinction in every office which he filled, but he also won the love and respect of his compatriots, as is witnessed by the fact that in 1882 he was unanimously elected to the office which he now holds—lieutenant-colonel of the First Volunteer regiment of Georgia. As further evidence of this may be noted the fact that in each of the three last sessions of the general assembly of Georgia, in which he has consecutively served, he has always been made chairman of the committee on military affairs. Col. Reilly, notwithstanding the short schooling of his childhood, has, by his inherent merits of brain and heart, won high position for himself not only as a most reliable citizen, but as a strong thinker, a forcible, clear writer and eloquent speaker. Georgia, as well as Chatham county, has reason to be proud of this true man and able legislator, who has proved himself to be in the best and fullest sense of the term one of nature's noblemen. Col. Reilly was married first in 1865 to Mrs. M. A. O'Connor, nee Price. One son was born to them, Charles K., who died in 1886. The mother died in 1871, and in 1880 Col. Reilly again married. This second wife was a Miss Mary O'Donovan, of New York. Their only child, a daughter, Margaret, is now living. The second Mrs. Reilly died a year after her marriage. Col. Reilly is the president of the Female Orphan Benevolent society, a member of the Catholic Library association, and of the Ancient Order of Hibernians. He belongs to the Catholic church.

WILKES COUNTY.

GABRIEL TOOMBS ANTHONY, merchant, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Edwin M. and Clara J. (Pope) Anthony, both parents natives of Wilkes county, and his mother a daughter of Henry F. Pope, was born in Taliaferro county, Ga., June 9, 1868, the sixth of thirteen children. When he was four years old his parents moved to Washington, and until he was eighteen years old he had to work on the farm, his only schooling being that obtained at such intervals as he could be spared. At the age of eighteen he entered the store of Mr. J. A. Benson in Washington as a clerk, and remained with him as such until January, 1894, when he and his fellow-clerk, Kimble A. Wilheit, bought their employer out, and are now doing the largest general merchandise business in the city. He made his money by hard work, and knowing how he made it he saved it. Mothers point to him as a model for their sons, and legions of friends in and out of the county are proud of him and his partner as representative young men and merchants of Washington. Avoiding the associations and contaminating influences of the fast young people of modern society, they are free from the expensive habits and vices consequent upon such associations, and have honorably won the esteem they enjoy, the prosperity secured, and that promised. That Mr. Anthony will take a front rank in commercial circles and exert a commanding influence in the future cannot be doubted.

EDWARD A. BARNETT, farmer-merchant, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Stone) Barnett, was born in Washington, Wilkes Co., Feb. 23, 1855, the fifth of seven children, four boys and three girls. Both parents were natives of Wilkes county. Mr. Barnett was educated in the schools in Washington, and at the age of nineteen years went on the plantation of W. A. Pope as superintendent, where he remained four years. He then for one year superintended the farm of M. M. Sims. These gentlemen were two large Wilkes county planters. He then bought a farm and began farming for himself, which he has since continued, enjoying a full measure of success and prosperity. In addition to his farm he has conducted with profit a general merchandise store for seven years. Mr. Barnett was married March 11, 1885, to Miss Mary, daughter of W. P. Hill, of Wilkes county, by whom he has had four children, all of whom are living.

SIMPSON BOOKER, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Richerson and Esther (Simpson) Booker, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., April 9, 1831, the third of four children, all boys. He worked on the farm, and went to school as he had opportunity, until he reached manhood. He then took charge of his father's farm, and has had the management of it from then until now. In 1861 he enlisted in the Irwin guards, which afterward was known as Company C, Cult's artillery battalion. As a member of this command Mr. Booker was in some of the most important battles of the war, among them: The seven days' fight around Richmond, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Appomattox Court House, etc. At the time of the surrender he was at Red Oak Church. After the disbandment he returned to the old homestead satisfied with whatever tribute it may bring to his comfort and pleasure. Mr. Booker was married Dec. 20, 1855, to Miss Amanda, daughter of Basil Neal, of Columbia county, Ga., who bore him one child, a daughter, and died Dec. 14, 1858. On June 27, 1865, he married Miss Georgia, daughter of John M. Lazenby, of what is now McDuffie county, Ga. Six children, four sons and two daughters, have blessed this union, of whom two sons and one daughter are dead. Mr. Booker is a master Mason, and a member of the Methodist church.

RICHARD D. CALLAWAY, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Aristides and Martha T. (Doughty) Callaway, was born in Wilkes county July 1, 1858. His father was of Wilkes county, and his mother a daughter of Richard Doughty, of Oglethorpe county. Mr. Callaway was the first-born of eleven children, of whom eight were boys. He attended schools convenient to his home until 1874, when he entered the university of Georgia, Athens, and graduated in 1878 with the degree of A. B. After he came from college he engaged in the saw-mill business for three years. Abandoning that he has since devoted his entire time and attention to his extensive farming interests, and has been satisfactorily prosperous. He is a lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth Georgia infantry, and a member of the board of county commissioners.

MARSHAL S. CALLAWAY, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Seaborn and Mildred (Jordan) Callaway, daughter of Jordan, of Oglethorpe county, Ga., was born in Wilkes county, Aug. 2, 1847, the fourth of eight children, five sons and three daughters, one of each being dead. He was reared on the farm and attended the country schools until he was fourteen years old, when his father died and he had to work on the farm and help keep it up. In 1863 he joined a company of state, or reserve, militia, under Capt. Bowers, and was ordered to Atlanta. He was in Savannah with his command at the time of the evacuation. He was in no regular engagement while in the service. After his discharge he returned home and went to farming in good earnest, and rejoices in the prosperity he has been blessed with. Upright and honorable in all his dealings, a true man and Christian, he stands high in the community. Mr. Callaway was married Dec. 7, 1865, to Miss Mary, daughter of James Spratlin, of Wilkes county, who has borne him eight children, five sons and three daughters; of these, a son and daughter have died. Mr. Callaway is a consistent and influential member of the Baptist church, which he joined in 1861.

SAMUEL J. CARTLEDGE, Presbyterian minister, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Rev. Groves H. and Annie M. (Lane) Cartledge, was born at Bold Spring, Franklin Co., Ga., May 9, 1864. His father was a clergyman, born in Madison county, Ga., and his mother a daughter of Joseph Lane, Portland, Me. Mr. Cartledge's schooling until he was nine years of age was obtained at the ordinary neighborhood schools. When nine years old he was entered at Martin institute, Prof John W. Glenn, principal, Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., where he remained three years, and then went back to the family farm. He next entered the school of Prof. A. M. Scudder, at Athens, Ga., where, after six months' close application, he was prepared to enter the sophomore class at the university of Georgia, Athens, which he did. At the end of a year he was obliged to stop for want of money. He taught school until he accomplished his object, when he went to Dahlonega, Ga., where he took an elective course, finishing in one year. He next went to the theological seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he remained a year, when his funds becoming exhausted he had to leave to replenish. He preached at Danielsville and New Hope churches, Madison Co., studying meanwhile, and as soon as he felt able went to the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., where he remained two years, and completing his theological course, graduated May 9, 1889. Rev. Cartledge immediately took charge of a church in Gainsville, Hall Co., Ga., and supplied its pulpit acceptably five years. Since then he has been pastor of the Presbyterian church at Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., giving entire satisfaction to a congregation whose pulpit has been filled by some of the most eminent clergymen of the denomination. Rev. Cartledge was married Nov. 27, 1889, to Miss Laura, daughter of James H. Burns, Apple Valley, Jackson Co., Ga., who has borne him two children, both boys. A useful life for such a man is not difficult to forecast.

THEODORICK M. GREEN, merchant-banker, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of John B. and Elizabeth (Leonard) Green, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., May 19, 1846, the seventh of eleven children. Mr. Green's father was a native of Prince George county, Va., and his mother a daughter of Edwin Leonard, of Wilkes county. He attended the common schools of the county until he was fourteen years old, when he entered the store of A. A. Cleveland, Washington, as a clerk. Two years later he entered the Confederate service as lieutenant of Company E, Twenty-seventh Georgia battalion, organized at Augusta, Ga. The command was first ordered to Savannah, and thence to Lovejoy's station, about thirty miles south of Atlanta on the Central railway, to aid in obstructing Gen. Sherman's march southward. Falling back before the Union army, the command bore its full part in the siege of Savannah, and afterward participated in engagements at Monteith, Ga., Pocotaligo, S. C., and Bentonville and Smithfield, N. C. At the last-named place the command was reorganized, and became a part of Elliott's brigade, when it was ordered to Greensboro, N. C., where it surrendered May 2, 1865. Returning to Washington, Mr. Green entered into a business venture, in which in five weeks he made $400. After this he engaged with R. H. Vickers & Co. as a clerk, with whom he remained until 1868, when, in company with his brother, the firm of Green Bros. was formed for conducting a general merchandising business. After a profitable existence of ten years the firm dissolved by the withdrawal of his brother, Mr. Green continuing until now as sole proprietor and manager, and is still doing a large and profitable business. He is also president of the Washington Exchange bank. Mr. Green was married June 27, 1877, to Miss Willametta, daughter of Judge Garnett Andrews, by whom he has had one child, a son. Mr. Green is held in high esteem. He is a master Mason.

THOMAS W. HILL, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Lodowick M. and Nancy (Johnson) Hill, was born in Wilkes county June 17 (the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill), 1839. His boyhood and youth were spent on the plantation, meanwhile attending the best schools the county afforded. When nineteen years of age he went to Furman university, Greenville, S. C., which he attended two years, and then returned home and busied himself on the plantation until the war between the states was precipitated. Going to Coweta county, Ga., he enlisted in a company under command of Capt. John Hill, which was assigned to Phillips' legion and ordered to Virginia, reaching there just after the seven days' fight. He participated in the battles of Culpeper Court House, Appomattox Court House, Fredericksburg, and Gettysburg. Having been with Gens. Stuart, Hampton and Butler, he was engaged in many minor battles and scores of skirmishes. During his service he was so conspicuous for his daring and courage that he was many times specially complimented. On one occasion Col. Rich, Mr. Hill's regimental commander, presented him and one of his comrades with a very fine pistol as a mark of his appreciation of their bravery. On another occasion—after the war—at a supper given by Judge (ex-congressman) Hugh Buchanan to Mr. Hill's daughter, the judge referred to Mr. Hill as a second Marshal Ney—certainly a very high compliment from such a source. About the time of the surrender he was in North Carolina, and managed to get home without surrendering. His intention was to join the western army, but just as he was ready to start he heard it had surrendered. He remained awhile on his father's plantation, superintending that, then went to his own, where he has since remained. Mr. Hill is a member of one of the wealthiest and most influential families in his section of the state, and worthily shares the distinction. Mr. Hill was married in 1869, and to him have been born ten children, eight of whom are living.

WILLIAM W. HILL, planter, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Lodowick M. and Nancy (Johnson) Hill, was born in Wilkes county, March 31, 1826, the first-born of thirteen children, twelve sons and one daughter. Of the sons five are dead. Until he was nineteen years old he worked on the plantation and went to school. He then entered the university of Georgia, Athens, and graduated in 1849 with the degree of A. B. Returning from college, after a few years he purchased his present home plantation, and has continued in charge of it until the present time. The family has been distinguished for strict integrity, wealth, extraordinary financial ability, a numerous membership, and influence. Mr. Hill possesses its marked characteristics, and enjoys merited prosperity. During the civil war he was a justice of the peace and remained at home, excepting that at one time he was a member of the state militia or reserve. Mr. Hill was married in 1851 to Miss Emma E., daughter of Micajah Anthony, of Wilkes county, who has borne him seven children, three sons and four daughters, all of whom are living. Since 1846 he has been connected with the Methodist church, of which he is a valued and influential member.

THOMAS OTIS HOLLIDAY, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., is a son of Allen T. and Elizabeth (Zellars) Holliday. Her father, John Zellars, of Lincoln county, Ga., was born Nov. 27, 1853, the third of eight children, six sons and two daughters. Of the sons two died in infancy. He assisted on the farm and attended school until 1873, when he took charge of the farm and has had it under his supervision since. He has managed it with success, quite realizing his expectations. Mr. Holliday was married Dec. 4, 1874, to Miss Kittie A., daughter of T. P. Burdette, of Wilkes county, who has borne him six children, four boys and two girls, all of whom are living. He is a consistent member of the Baptist church, and an estimable member of the community in which he lives.

LUTHER W. LATTIMER, farmer, Wilkes county, Ga., son of John T. and Martha (Taylor) Lattimer, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Feb. 5, 1839, the eighth of ten children, seven boys and three girls, six of the boys being dead. His mother was the daughter of Col. Clarke Taylor of Oglethorpe county. He was reared and worked on his father's farm during his boyhood, and was educated at the country schools. His father's rule was to work his boys two years and send them to school one. This was done until he reached the age of sixteen years, when he entered Meson academy, Lexington, Ga., and attended there three years. He then worked on the farm a year, after which he attended the academy another year. After leaving school and teaching five months he enlisted in the Gilmer Blues, Capt. (afterward Col.) John T. Lofton. The company went to Atlanta, became a part of the Sixth Georgia regiment, Col. Alfred H. Colquitt, and was ordered to Yorktown, Va. The command participated in the battles of Williamsburg, Seven Pines, Mechanicsville and Cold Harbor. At the last-named battle he was wounded in the neck, and the wound being pronounced mortal he was sent home to die. But he rapidly recovered, and was required to report every sixty days. In January, 1864, he reported at James Island, S. C., for duty, but the examining board adjudged him unfit for regular service, and he was sent to Fort Gaines, Ga., where a hospital was being organized, and was made clerk of the examining board, remaining there until after the surrender. Returning home he resumed farming, and has followed it ever since. He was elected in 1892 to represent Wilkes county in the general assembly, which he did to the entire satisfaction of his intelligent constituency. He is now a member of the board of jury commissioners. Mr. Lattimer was married Dec. 18, 1862, to Miss Euphrasia, daughter of Moses Wright, of Oglethorpe county, who has borne him six children, three sons and three daughters, all living. Mr. Lattimer is a master Mason, and a member of the Methodist church. A useful and public-spirited citizen, he is influential and popular.

JAMES S. RHODES, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of William W. and Frances E. (Hackney) Rhodes, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., Nov. 7, 1856. Until twenty years of age he lived and worked on the home farm and attended the common schools of the county at such intervals as his services could be dispensed with. Himself and one brother were the only children—both are living. In 1876 he commenced the battle of life, and so far he has been successful, and placed himself in comfortable circumstances, gaining and retaining the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Rhodes was married Jan. 9, 1879, to Miss Nora, daughter of Jonathan Smith, of Wilkes county, who has borne him ten children, four sons and six daughters, of whom one son is dead. He has been a consistent member of the Baptist church since 1886.

ROBERT A. SIMPSON, physician and surgeon, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of William W. and Jane (Powell) Simpson, both parents of Wilkes county, and the mother a daughter of Nelson Powell, of Wilkes county, was born in Sparta, Hancock Co., Feb. 1, 1859. His early education was conducted at home under a private tutor, his father and Hon. Linton Stephens having employed a tutor for their children. At the end of two years his mother died, and he was sent to live with his sister, Mrs. John A. Stephens, in Atlanta. He attended school there one year, and then, at the age of fifteen, entered the university of Georgia, Athens, as a sophomore, half advanced, and graduated in 1877 among the "first ten"—a particular distinction at that time—with the degree of A. B. From the university he went to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and took a one year's course at Eastman's Business college. He next went to the university of Virginia, devoting two years to a plain academic course and the third to the study of medicine. He then went to New York city, took a course in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and graduated in 1883, winning the honor of being stationed in the Bellevue hospital eighteen months, the allotted term of service. Dr. Simpson then practiced his profession in New York city a year, after which he went to Europe and spent two years between Berlin, Vienna and Heidelberg, studying his profession. Returning to New York he practiced there again about a year, when the illness of his father called him home to Washington, which has been his home and the theater of his professional service. Dr. Simpson is one of the most highly educated members of his profession, as well as one of the most practical and skillful; and, being young, if he does not attain to exceptional eminence it will be for lack of ambition on his part. He is a man of cultivated musical taste, and this, with the courteousness of a cultured, refined gentleman, makes him a welcome guest in all social and literary circles. His home is of the old-time massive southern mansion type, handsomely finished and tastefully furnished, and surrounded by acres of garden-grounds, flower and vegetable, exciting admiration, and giving assurance in advance of the hearty welcome and generous hospitality which await the guest. Dr. Simpson is (in 1895) unmarried.

REDDING SIMS, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of John M. and Nancy (Wynn) Sims, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Oct. 13, 1817, the seventh born of ten children, six boys and four girls. His father was of Oglethorpe county, and his mother was a daughter of George Wynn, of Wilkes county. He worked on the farm until he was twenty-one years of age, going to school at intervals as farm work permitted and school opportunities offered. Mr. Sims was married in Oglethorpe county, Oct. 25, 1838, to Miss Sarah, daughter of Jesse Spratlin of that county. After his marriage he moved to Mississippi and farmed there a year; he then went to Louisiana, where he cut cane to provide shelter until he could build a log house. Returning to Georgia he permanently settled in Wilkes county, where he has made farming his life pursuit. During the unpleasantness he was in the service of the state, and was assigned to the duty of furnishing provisions and looking after the prisoners, remaining in the county. Mr. Sims is a prominent member of the Baptist church, with which he has been connected since 1841.

FRANK B. SIMS, farmer, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of Redding and Sarah (Spratlin) Sims, was born in Wilkes county, the youngest of a family of eleven children, Aug. 5, 1863. His grandfather, Jesse Spratlin, was a prominent farmer of Wilkes county. Mr. Sims was educated at the common schools of the county, and has always remained on the farm with his parents, as a companion and protector. He is a consistent member of the Baptist church, which he joined in 1886. To be a good farmer, a good citizen, and a consistent Christian fill the measure of his ambition.

HENRY T. SLATON, farmer-merchant, Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., son of William Slaton and Miss Frances, daughter of John Wright, all of Wilkes county, was born in Wilkes county March 18, 1835, the seventh of ten children. He worked on the farm when growing up, and received only such education as he could obtain when he could be spared. In 1856 he attended Richard's high school, at Thomson, Ga., and then returned home and worked on the farm until the war began. He enlisted in the Irvin guards (Capt. John T. Wingfield), Washington, and proceeded to Richmond, Va., where his company became Company A, Ninth Georgia regiment. With his command he participated in all the principal battles in northern Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania, and was included in the surrender at Appomattox. After the war he came back to his farm and set to work to recuperate. His labor has been rewarded fully up to his expectations. In connection with his farm he has carried on a general merchandise store, materially augmenting his resources. In 1870 Mr. Slaton was elected to represent Wilkes county in the general assembly—the first democrat elected after the war. He is a prominent and influential member of the Baptist church.

FRANK P. SLATON, farmer, Wilkes county, Ga., son of William and Frances (Wright) Slaton, was born in Wilkes county, the ninth of ten children, Sept. 12, 1841. He acquired what education he could, attending school at such intervals as he could be spared from farm work until he was eighteen years old. Then, in 1859, he attended the high school in Tuskegee, Ala., and the following year he returned home. About the same time, or soon afterward, his brother left home and enlisted in the Confederate army. His father being blind, and Frank the youngest, he was left at home to care for his father. Notwithstanding this, however, when, in 1863, the state called for more troops, he joined the army at Kennesaw Mountain, was with the forces in front of Sherman when he was "marching through Georgia," was in Savannah during the siege, afterward in South Carolina, and at the time of the surrender was in Augusta, Ga. He returned to the farm as soon as he was discharged, where he has since pursued the quiet life of a farmer, enjoying the comforts of domestic life and the cheering companionship of a family of promising children. Mr. Slaton was married in September, 1864, to Miss Cornelia, daughter of David Fouché, of Wilkes county, by whom he had four children, three boys and one girl. Their mother having died, he, in 1875, married Miss Victoria, daughter of Frank C. Armstrong, of Wilkes county, who has borne him five children, two boys and three girls, of whom two girls have died. Mr. Slaton is an active and useful member of the Baptist church.

BRYAN COUNTY.

JAMES H. BLITCH, farmer and merchant (Bryan Postoffice), Eden, Effingham Co., Ga., son of William and Eliza Blitch, was born in Effingham county, May 21, 1841. His father was a large and prosperous farmer, and for many years was a justice of the inferior court of Effingham county. To him nine children were born: Emeline, wife of A. H. Smith, Valdosta, Ga.; Julia, deceased; John Gideon, ex-Confederate soldier, merchant and farmer, Odd Fellow and master Mason, married first Miss Georgia Ann Slater, and after her death married Miss Eliza Brantley; Willis M. L., ex-Confederate soldier, farmer and stock-dealer, and a member of the Baptist church, married Miss Ellen Kennedy; Henrietta P., wife of Isham M. Rinses of Bulloch county; Howard W., ex-Confederate soldier and a member of the Baptist church, married Miss America Cobb; William H., master Mason and member of the Baptist church, married Miss May Young; Laura M., deceased wife of John Rodgers of Tattnall county; James Henry, the subject of this sketch. Mr. Blitch was reared on the farm, and received his education mostly at the schools in Bryan county. In August, 1861, he enlisted under Capt. A. H. Smith, Twenty-fifth Georgia regiment, Col. Claude Wilson of Savannah, and was assigned to Gen. Stephens' (of South Carolina) command in Georgia. He was in the exciting and hard-fought campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and in the battle of July 22, 1864, was captured and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he was detained until March 4, 1865, when he was sent to Richmond, where he was furloughed for thirty days, but never returned to the army. That year he took charge of his father's farm, but the year following he went to Savannah, where he served some time on the police force. Retiring from that he engaged in speculation in stock and made considerable money. In 1869 he began a general merchandise business at Canoochee (now Belknap), Bryan county; and in January, 1875, removed thence to the place he now lives on in Bryan county. After farming five years he established a general merchandise store in connection with his farm, and since then has devoted his time and attention entirely to his farming and mercantile interests. He has been exceptionally successful in everything he has undertaken, has built up the largest business in the county, and has made a fortune. He has an elegant home, where he dispenses open-handed hospitality, and is preparing for an old age of ease and tranquillity. He has been on the board of jury commissioners, and was county commissioner until the office was abolished. Mr. Blitch was married Sept. 27, 1870, to Miss Sarah E. Groover—born May 6, 1849—of Bulloch county. They have had eleven children born to them: John Gordon, born Oct. 8, 1871, merchant, Statesboro, Ga., married Miss Jennie, daughter of John G. and Georgia Ann Blitch; James Daniel, born March 7, 1873, of the firm of J. H. Blitch & Son; Samuel E., born April 2, 1875; Charles and Eliza, born Dec. 25, 1877; Thomas Norwood, born Oct. 6, 1880; William H., born Aug. 25, 1882, died Sept. 4, 1884; Brooks, born Aug. 25, 1885; Bessie, born April 13, 1888; Brantley Denmark, born Sept. 30, 1890, and James Hudson, born March 13, 1893. Mr. Blitch is a master Mason and a member of the Baptist church, of which he has been deacon for many years.

MARTIN E. CARTER, merchant, Pembroke, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Samuel M. and Emeline Carter, was born near Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., Sept. 21, 1867. Mr. Carter's father was engaged nearly all his life in railroading, was a very active member of the masonic fraternity, and prominent in the local lodge at Thomson, and a member of the Baptist church. His mother, who was a devoted and working member of the Baptist church, died Nov. 7, 1892. They were the parents of seven children: Joseph Bradford, Martin Edwin, William Thomas, deceased; Alice Eugenia, Charles Clifford, Minnie Lee, and Milford Pitts, deceased. Mr. Carter received only a primary education at the country schools, attending but one term at the high school in Thomson. He began as a farm laborer when fourteen years old, and followed this vocation for some time. He next accepted a situation at Gibson, Glascock Co., Ga., in the employ of the Augusta, Gibson & Sandersville, now the Augusta Southern railway. After remaining at Gibson for two years he went to Hephzibah, in Richmond county, in the employ of the same company, as section master. He remained there something over a year, and then accepted a situation on the Dover & Statesboro railway, engaged in grading and construction of the same. Having finished this he entered the employ of the Central railroad and worked on lines belonging to that system in Georgia and South Carolina. He was next engaged in the construction of the Savannah & Western (S. A. M.) division of the Central railroad from Meldrim westward to Lyons, and afterward took charge as section master of the section at Pembroke, and held the position three and a half years. In the meantime he had opened a general merchandise business at Pembroke, which he conducted for about a year, and owing to the general increase and growth of this business he was compelled to resign his railroad position. For two years past he has managed the store himself, and is now doing as large, if not the largest, business of any store in Pembroke. He has succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations. For one of his age he has had a long and varied practical experience, which evidently has been of great value to him. His business capabilities have been developed and bid fair to place him well to the front in the near future. Mr. Carter was married in 1890 to Miss Jennie, daughter of William and Elizabeth Williams, of Jefferson county, Ga. Her father, now deceased, was a well-to-do and prominent farmer. Two children have blessed this union: Percy Roy, born Dec. 23, 1891, and an infant, which died. Mrs. Carter is a devoted and working member of the Baptist church, of which she has been a member since she was a twelve-year-old girl.

JAMES N. DUGGAR, farmer, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Nathaniel J. and Sarah Duggar, was born in Bryan county, Dec. 24, 1850. His father was born in 1813, and his mother in 1818, and both were consistent and devoted members of the Primitive Baptist church, of which for many years he was a deacon. He served the county as tax receiver, as tax collector, and also as a justice of the inferior court. To this worthy couple eleven children were born: Joseph J., farmer, married Miss Martha, daughter of Jefferson Butler; Wesley W., died in the Confederate service; Annie (deceased); Robert E., died soon after having served through the civil war; Martha E., wife of Leonard F. Cox, Bryan county; John (deceased); James Newton; Charles M., farmer, Bryan county; Harmon, dentist (deceased); Sarah Frances, wife of Pembroke W. Williams, lawyer, ex-senator of the First senatorial district; and Herschel, died soon after his graduation from the university of Georgia. Mr. Duggar was reared a farmer and received a very good country school education. At the age of eighteen years he began farming for himself, and farmed for two years, and then for two years followed the profession of a photographer. He then returned to farming, which he has since followed with much pleasure, good success and better profit. He has a splendid, productive farm, well improved, with substantial buildings. He was county surveyor for many years, and is now a member of the county board of education, of which he is chairman. Unambitious, not desiring office, he has been content with being considered one of the best of farmers, and a much appreciated neighbor and model citizen. Mr. Duggar was married Jan. 30, 1877, to Miss Elizabeth C.—born May 14, 1851—daughter of Dr. James H. and Catharine C. Johnson, of Liberty county, Ga., and to them eight children have been born: Charles Habersham, Annie E., James Harmon, Dawse Bradwell, Lena Marie, Maggie Estelle, and two which died in infancy. Mr. Duggar is a very ardent and enthusiastic master Mason, having been exalted to the royal arch degree. After having been made a master Mason in one lodge he left it so as to become a charter member of another, and thus aid in establishing it at the county seat; and is now an active member of a lodge near to where he lives.

ISRAEL HENRY HARN, stock-raiser, Clyde, Bryan Co., Ga., son of William and Elizabeth C. Harn, was born in Bryan county, July 13, 1836. His father was very popular and prominent, and was elected successively a justice of the peace, receiver of tax returns, and justice of the inferior court. He was a very ardent and enthusiastic supporter of the Confederate cause, and although fifty-two years old when the civil war began he enlisted and served gallantly until his death, which occurred Dec. 26, 1861. In early manhood he united with the Methodist church, but later in life changed his belief and became a member of the Missionary Baptist church. This worthy couple raised a family of eight children: Israel Henry, Eliza Abigail, Sarah Emeline, Mary Elizabeth, Henrietta, William John David, Georgia Ann Rebecca and James Money. Mr. Harn was raised and educated in Bryan county. In May, 1862, he enlisted under Capt. Albert Smith, whose company belonged to a regiment commanded by Col. Claude Wilson, and of which Rufus E. Lester, now representative from the First congressional district of Georgia in congress was adjutant-general. He was a participant in all the battles in which his command was engaged, was in the battles of Chickamauga and Missionary ridge, and in the many fought between these sanguinary fields and Atlanta and around that city—notably at Peachtree creek and that of July 22, 1864. During his service he was three times wounded—but not seriously and the latter part of the war was detailed as cook for his company. His brother William J. D. was also a soldier in the Confederate service, and the two brothers may be said to have fought side by side in support of the “lost cause.” After the war Mr. Harn returned to Bryan county, which he reached in May, 1865, walking from Camden, S. C., and engaged in stock-raising; and has about 350 sheep and a herd of sixty cattle, besides hogs for the Savannah market. He was county commissioner, but after holding the office two years resigned. He has been on the board of education two years, of which he is still a member. Mr. Harn was married Feb. 4, 1858, to Miss Martha Ann—born March 28, 1840—daughter of Seth and Amelia Stokes of Chatham county, Ga., by whom he has had nine children: Elizabeth Christiana, born July 7, 1861, wife of Newton Wise, Bryan county; Laura Vandalia, born April 30, 1866, died Jan. 7, 1873; Israel Sylvester, born Aug. 5, 1868, married Miss Mamie G. Ellaby; Sarah Jane, born April 6, 1871, married J. S. Hamons, Bryan county; Martha A., born Jan. 24, 1873, died Dec. 9, 1893; Stephen David, born Feb. 16, 1875; Dollie, born Sept. 24, 1877; Glenn, born Dec. 4, 1880; and one (the first born) who died in infancy. Mr. Harn is a working member of the Methodist church, of which he is a district steward and recording secretary.

JOSEPH J. HUSKE, merchant-farmer, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Leonidas H. and Adaline Huske, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., Aug. 2, 1861. His father was a manufacturer of naval stores in both the Carolinas. He was a Knight of Pythias and a member of the Lutheran church, and a man of excellent business qualities and methods. He was twice married; by his first wife he had one child, Joseph J., and by his second marriage five children: William, James, Robert, and Lizzie, all in South Carolina; and Clarke (deceased). Mr. Huske was educated in the public and private schools of Fayetteville and Wilmington, and then entered the office of the Richmond & Danville railway, where he remained two years. From there he went to Leesville, S. C., where he kept books for his father for four years. He then came to Bryan county, Ga., and kept books for four years for K. A. Smith, a gentleman from Virginia engaged in the manufacture of naval stores. He then embarked in a general merchandise business on his own account at Ellabell, and for the time he has been in business—something over three years—he has done remarkably well, exceeding his most sanguine expectations. He is also engaged in farming, and to these two interests gives his entire time and attention. The enterprise he has displayed, and the energy and judgment with which he conducts his affairs gives promise of splendid business success. Mr. Huske was married in November, 1884, to Miss Emma, daughter of James M. and Amanda Brannon of Bryan county, who died less than four years after, leaving two children—Meta and Leonidas Brannon. Subsequently he married Miss Ellen Brannon, a sister of his first wife. He is a master Mason, and a member at Eastover, Richland Co., S. C., of the Protestant Episcopal church.

WARREN C. JACKSON, naval stores manufacturer, Pembroke, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Allen and Catharine Jackson, was born in Robeson county, N. C., June 7, 1862. His father is a well-to-do farmer, and himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church. Of seven children born to them six are living: Mary, wife of Murdock McInnis, Robeson county, N. C.; Duncan, farmer, same county, married Miss Amanda Parker; Warren C.; John, farmer, same county, married Miss Mary Harralson; Emily, wife of Irwin Agerton, farmer, South Carolina; Cora, makes her home with Warren C. Mr. Jackson was raised and educated at the common schools of the county of his birth. When eighteen years old he went to South Carolina and was employed in a store two years, then came to Screven county, Ga., and for thirteen years engaged in the manufacture of naval stores. Thence he went to Irwin county, and afterward to Bulloch, engaging in both counties in the same business as before. In 1889 he came to Bryan county, and under the firm name of McMillan, Jackson & Co. continued the manufacture of naval stores near where Pembroke stands. Their output the first year was eleven hundred barrels of spirits of turpentine and forty-five hundred barrels of rosin. Their average annual product has been 1,000 barrels of spirits and 4,500 barrels of rosin, and they give employment to seventy-five hands. Mr. Jackson is a very energetic and enterprising man, has been successful in all his business undertakings and has established an enviable reputation for integrity and financial ability. Mr. Jackson was married in November, 1890, to Miss Sallie, daughter of Archy L. and Catharine McMillan of Robeson county, N. C., by whom he has had two children: Thomas Lawrence, born April, 1892, and Neill Spurgeon, born August, 1893. WILLIAM LETFORD, manufacturer of naval stores, Pembroke, Bryan Co., Ga., son of William and Margaret Letford, was born in New Orleans, La., in 1839. Mr. Letford's father was killed while in the army during the war with Mexico, and his mother died when he was quite small. They were the parents of three children: William, John, now in Mobile, and James. Mr. Letford was educated in the common schools of Florida, and in 1862 enlisted in the Marion dragoons, Capt. William Owens. This company was afterward consolidated with others and organized as the Second Florida cavalry, under the command of Capt. William E. Chambers. Under the reorganization he was made second lieutenant of the company, was acting adjutant from the date of organization, and the latter part of the war was adjutant of the regiment. He participated in every battle in which his command bore a part except that of Natural Bridge, in Walton county, Fla., and surrendered to the United States forces at Baldwin, Fla. A part of the time he was under command of Gen. Joseph Finnegan, and a part of it under Peter Turney, the present governor of Tennessee. Soon after the war he went to Savannah, where for eight years he ran forty drays. He then left Savannah and established himself in the manufacture of naval stores in Bryan county, with headquarters at Pembroke. His average annual output was 3,000 barrels of spirits and rosin, and he gave employment to fifty hands. Mr. Letford was energetic and enthusiastic, a first-class business man, and took great interest in everything calculated to advance the material interests and promote the welfare of the county. He took great interest in the southern cause, and in everything that tended to keep alive the memory and perpetuate the story of the valor and hardships of his comrades. In 1889 he organized the Confederate Veterans' association of Bryan county, of which he was elected president and has continued to be since. Mr. Letford was married Sept. 6, 1862, to Miss Sarah, daughter of John Stewart, of Columbus, Ga., who died soon afterward, leaving no issue. In October, 1874, he was married to Mrs. Sarah E. (nee MacLeod) King, daughter of William H. and Martha A. McLeod. Mrs. Letford's first husband enlisted as a private in the Confederate service, but was promoted to a colonelcy. Of the ninety-nine uniforms contributed to the Roswell troopers by the citizens of Roswell she furnished thirty-three, and did everything she possibly could to promote the success of the Confederacy. Mr. and Mrs. Letford have had three children born to them: Sarah Stewart, William Donald and Mary B. Mr. Letford was a master Mason, and his wife and all his family are members of the Presbyterian church, of which he was an elder. Mr. Letford died at his home, Bushey Park, Aug. 8, 1895, after an illness of many months, during which time he exhibited all the courage and fortitude of the brave soldier, and all the patience and graces of his exalted Christian character.

DNIEL H. M'MILLAN, naval stores, Pembroke, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Archy L. and Catharine McMillan, was born in Robeson county, N. C., July 12, 1865. His father was a farmer, and also "kept store," and himself and wife are consistent members of the Baptist church. His mother, when his father married her, was a widow Crawford with three children: Mary, Effie and Ella, and after their marriage she bore him nine children: Archy L., Dugan, John, Robert, Lizzie, Sallie, Neill, Daniel Hector and Spurgeon. Mr. McMillan was reared on the farm and was educated at the common country schools. At the early age of seventeen (in 1882) he left his home and came to Georgia and engaged in work on a turpentine farm in Screven county. A year afterward he went to Effingham county, where he worked a year, and then went to Worth county, Ga., where he continued his work manufacturing naval stores. From Worth he moved to Bulloch county, formed a partnership and engaged in the manufacture of naval stores under the firm name of McMillan, Jackson & Co. Two years afterward he went to Liberty county, Ga., where under the firm name of McMillan, Smith & Co. he continued the same business. In 1892 he came thence to Bryan county, which has since been his home and the field of his labor and his business success. Mr. McMillan was married Dec. 21, 1888, to Miss Mary Eliza—born July 29, 1868—daughter of Charles and Sallie Roach, of Bulloch county, by whom he has had three children: Robert Hector, born in Liberty county, Dec. 4, 1890; Beulah, born in Bryan county, June 11, 1892, and John Dew, born in Bryan county, April 7, 1894. Himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church, and he is a master Mason.

JOHN D. MORGAN, farmer, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Matthew M. and Mary C. (Caster) Morgan, was born in Bryan county, Sept. 6, 1856. His father was born in Effingham Co., Ga., July 15, 1814, and his mother was born Feb. 17, 1819, they were married Feb. 8, 1838, and moved to Bryan county about 1845. The mother, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died Oct. 6, 1878, and the father died, a devout member of the Baptist church, Nov. 1, 1880. Although exempt by age, he volunteered and served some time in the army during the civil war. They were the parents of thirteen children: Fannin Asbury, born April 5, 1839; Joseph A., born Sept. 10, 1840; Thomas Carter, born Nov. 22, 1842; Irene Elizabeth, born Sept. 20, 1844, died Dec. 10, 1870; Ahoilda Caroline, born Aug. 15, 1846; Mary Lucretia, born June 9, 1848; James Walstein, born April 23, 1850; Williford Goldin, born Aug. 5, 1852; Ellen Sarah, born Oct. 23, 1854, died April 5, 1872; John D., the subject of this sketch; Ida Davenport, born Nov. 16, 1858; Eliza Adeline, born Nov. 15, 1860, died Feb. 6, 1876, and Albert Matthew, born Oct. 23, 1863. The three eldest sons, Fannin, Joseph and Thomas, served in the Confederate army during the war between the states, and Joseph was wounded in both legs at the battle of Chickamauga. Mr. Morgan's boyhood and early youth were passed prior to and during the troublous times of war and reconstruction, so that his educational advantages were unusually limited. On attaining to manhood he started out in life without means, but by his industry, economy and good management he has accumulated a large property. He has a handsomely improved property in Ellabell, to which he moved that he might give his children better educational advantages than he enjoyed. In 1887 he was elected sheriff of the county, and re-elected in 1889, serving two terms of two years each. In 1891 he was appointed county commissioner and held the office until it was abolished. Mr. Morgan was married Jan. 22, 1882, to Miss Martha—born Aug. 12, 1864—daughter of Thomas and Emily Alexander of Bryan county. Of six children born to them two only are living: Eddie Ida, born March 10, 1884, and Emma Carrie, born July 12, 1885; four died in infancy. Mr. Morgan and his wife are active members of the Methodist church.

JOHN MORRISON, manufacturer of naval stores, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Dr. Malcolm R. and Melissa Morrison, was born in Columbus county, N. C., June 25, 1849. His father was born in Richmond county, N. C., in 1818, studied medicine and after his graduation settled in Whiteville, Columbus Co., N. C., where he established himself in his profession and is still actively pursuing it. He served as a surgeon in the civil war, is a member of the I. O. O. F. and a devout and revered member of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Morrison's mother was born in Columbus county in 1830, was an exemplary member of the Presbyterian church and died Dec. 31, 1889. They reared a large family of children: John, the subject of this sketch; Charles K., superintendent of his brother's business in Morrison, Bryan county; Fannie, deceased wife of H. H. McEachern; Amelia, wife of W. E. Thigpen, Edgecombe county, N. C.; Mollie, wife of Sam Lumsden, Fayetteville, N. C.; Norman A., Whiteville, N. C.; Flora, wife of H. A.

McEachern, Quitman, Ga.; Maggie, with her father; Sallie, wife of George Morton, Waycross, Ga. Mr. Morrison was raised and principally educated in Whiteville, and started in life by clerking in a dry-goods store, going to school a year and then clerking a year alternately until he obtained a very good academic education, and taught one year in the Whiteville academy. He then went to Horry county, S. C., where he engaged as bookkeeper two years, and went thence to Fairfield county, S. C., and embarked in the manufacture of naval stores and followed the business there with fair success for six years. In 1881 he came to Georgia and established himself in Bryan county in the same business, in which he is still engaged. He owns a turpentine still at Ellabell, and one of larger capacity at Morrison, Bryan county, which is in charge of his brother Charles. His output annually is from 1,000 to 1,200 barrels of spirits, and about 4,000 barrels of resin, giving employment to about seventy-five hands. He also conducts a general merchandise store at Ellabell, is doing the largest business on the Savannah & Western railway and is the largest taxpayer in Bryan county. He is an ardent friend and substantial supporter of education, and although not a member of any church is a liberal contributor to all religious objects, building churches, etc. Broad-minded, big-hearted and open-handed, mindful and generous to the poor, he is a valuable citizen and a potential power for good. He is a staunch democrat, was a long time chairman of the county democratic committee, and chairman of the executive committee when Gov. Atkinson was chairman of the state executive committee. He is a stockholder in the Middle Georgia & Atlantic railway, of which he has been a director, and is a stockholder in the Noel flouring mills at Estill Springs, Tenn. He is vice-president of the Union Land company of Ellabell, which is composed of some of the wealthiest people of Savannah. Ellabell is about twenty-four miles from Savannah, and about sixty feet above tide water, is a flourishing place and was named in honor of his daughter Ellabell, and the town of Morrison was named for Mr. Morrison himself. He has in Ellabell an elegant and delightful residence, said to be the most complete and the handsomest between Savannah and Americus, and leaves nothing undone calculated to aid to the city's prosperity and promote its advancement socially, educationally and religiously. He serves the people and the government as postmaster. Mr. Morrison was happily married in Brooklyn, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1877, to Miss Lola Bell, daughter of Samuel and Adaline Bell, of Conway, S. C. Three children have blessed this union: Ellabell, born July 20, 1878, who attended the college at Roanoke, Va., a year, also Lucy Cobb institute, Athens, Ga., one year, and is now attending Agnes Scott institute, Decatur, Ga.; Robert Malcolm, born March 29, 1891, in Savannah, Ga.; Montague Boyd, born Aug. 13, 1887. Mr. Morrison is confessedly the most successful citizen of Bryan county.

JOHN H. POWELL, manufacturer of naval stores, Malden Branch, Bryan Co., Ga., son of John Giles and Louisa Powell, was born in Columbus county, N. C., June 18, 1863. His father and mother were natives of North Carolina, and both were devout members of the Missionary Baptist church. His father was a good and prosperous farmer, also had a general merchandise store, and was a master Mason. Nine children were born to them: Susan, deceased; Luther Clarendon, married Miss Martha Tison, of South Carolina; James Irwin, deceased; Sarah, deceased wife of D. C. Newton, Pooler, Chatham Co., Ga.; Leonora J., wife of Stephen H. Collins, Pooler, Ga.; Estelle E., deceased wife of Ralph Tison, of South Carolina; James A., naval stores, Hampton county, S. C.; John Henry, and Louisa Giles, deceased. Mr. Powell was educated in the common schools of Columbus county, and when seventeen years old commenced farming for himself on the home place. He was quite successful, and at the end of two years he migrated to South Carolina and engaged in the manufacture of naval stores, remaining there four years with satisfactory profitable results. In 1886 he came to Georgia and settled in Bryan county, where he has continued his business with wonderful success. At Malden Branch he individually owns a plant whose output is from 3,500 to 4,000 barrels of spirits and resin per annum. He also owns an interest in two other plants, one in Bryan and one in Montgomery county, whose combined product is about 6,000 barrels annually of spirits and resin. In addition to these large and profitable enterprises Mr. Powell conducts a large farming interest, and has a general merchandise store at Malden Branch. The remarkably successful and profitable management of these several large and varied interests show that he is an energetic and careful business man and possessed of rare financial ability. He also discharges the duties of postmaster at Malden Branch. He has always been a democrat, and cast his first vote for Grover Cleveland in 1884. By appointment of the grand jury he examined the books of the Bryan county officials. He is a master Mason, and has filled various offices in the local lodge. Georgia has need of men of his superior characteristics, and it is hoped he will be patriotic enough to not longer neglect their transmission.

JAMES M. SMITH, railway contractor, Pembroke, Bryan Co., Ga., son of James Franklin and Amelia Smith, was born in Sandersville, Washington Co., Ga., Aug. 19, 1856. The life occupation of Mr. Smith's father was farming, and he was one of the most successful and largest farmers in the county, cultivating 600 acres of land, running twenty plows, and making all kinds of farm products. He was very public-spirited and popular, and took great interest in the cause of education generally, and did all he could to increase and improve the schools. For many years he was sheriff of Washington county; was a master Mason, and held various offices in the local lodge, and was a strict member of the Baptist church, of which he was a deacon. Twelve children were born to him: Asa F., deceased; Elmira Elizabeth, deceased wife of William T. Jordan, Washington county; Isaac A., who married Mamie E., daughter of Col. William Irwin, one of the largest and richest planters in Washington county, which he has several times represented in the general assembly; James Madison, the subject of this sketch; George Benton, deceased; Mamie, deceased; William Tullie, contractor, Bryan county; Lee Jefferson, who married Miss Annie Roach, and operates a sawmill and ginnery; Sallie A., wife of William Devereaux, Hancock county; Susan F., wife of Harvey T. Jordan, of Washington county; Eugenia, deceased; Carrie E., wife of Robert J. Zittrower, merchant, Pembroke. Mr. Smith grew to manhood and received a very good education in the common schools. On arriving at maturity he commenced farming, but after following it some years became interested in railroad construction. His first contract was with the Columbus & Western, and his next was with the Georgia Southern & Florida. On the completion of that he contracted to furnish the ties for the Savannah & Western railway, since which he has made a large contract with the Central of Georgia and the R. & D. to furnish ties and all kinds of railway material, to which he is at present giving his attention. Mr. Smith has a splendid farm near Pembroke, and one of the finest residences in the town and vicinity. He is a warm and substantial supporter of the schools, of which he is a trustee. He is mayor of the town and dispenses justice to all cases without fear or favor. He is well read and well posted on current events, and exercises a wide and beneficial influence. Mr. Smith has been married twice. He was first married Dec. 21, 1876, to Miss Teuella Inez, born Feb. 14, 1862, daughter of William M. and Caroline E. Snell, of Washington county, by whom he had four children: Byron, born Aug. 21, and died Sept. 8, 1878; Vivien S., born July 21, 1879, assistant agent at Lyons on the Sav. & W. railway; Fleta Inez, born Aug. 31, 1881, at school; Wallace Kyle, born Sept. 14, 1883, at school. Mrs. Smith, who was a devout and exemplary member of the Christian church for nine years, died Sept. 20, 1889. Subsequently Mr. Smith contracted a second marriage with Mrs. Ida G. (nee Williams) Duggar, daughter of James T. and Susan Williams. Mr. Williams served many years as county judge; was at one time sheriff of the county, and for a number of years represented Bryan county in the general assembly. He was also a soldier in the Confederate army during the late war, during which service he was severely wounded. Three children have blessed this last union: Annie Esler, born Oct. 25, 1891; Carrie Amelia, born April 8, 1893, and James Hinton, born July 9, 1894. Mrs. Smith is an active member of the Methodist church, and he is an influential member of the Christian church, of the Sunday school of which he has been superintendent for many years. He is also a master Mason, a member of Pembroke lodge, No. 362, in which he has always held some official position.

ALFRED PEYTON SMITH, lawyer, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Albert Glenn and Elizabeth Caroline Smith, was born in Bryan county Nov. 28, 1863. (For particulars as to the antecedents of the family connections see sketch of Wilbur Bird Smith in these Memoirs.) Mr. Smith received his primary education in the common schools of the county, then attended the boys' high school department of Chatham academy three years, and at intervals has taught school in Bryan county eight years. He read law in Savannah under the preceptorship of Lester & Ravenal (whose senior partner now represents the First congressional district of Georgia in congress), and was admitted to the bar at Chatham superior court June 2, 1882, Judge Henry B. Tompkins presiding. He immediately established an office in Bryan county, which has since been his home and the field of his professional successes. In 1888 he was elected county school commissioner, has since been re-elected, and is now serving a second term, making a painstaking and efficient officer. Mr. Smith was married March 17, 1886, to Miss Irene Ophelia, born Jan. 4, 1863, daughter of Joshua, Jr., and Sarah Elizabeth Smith. He is a working and prominent member of the Methodist church, has been secretary and steward of the local church a number of years, and recording steward of the quarterly conference of Bryan district.

WILBUR BIRD SMITH, clerk superior court, Ellabell, Bryan Co., Ga., son of Albert Glenn and Elizabeth (Van Brocken) Smith was born in Bryan county, April 5, 1859. With the exception of two years, members of this family have held the office of clerk of the superior court from 1819 until the present time. Mr. Smith's grandfather, Joshua Smith, held the office from 1819 to 1854; Henry E. Smith (cousin of incumbent), 1854 to 1871; Albert G. (incumbent's father), 1873 to 1886; and incumbent from 1886 to the present time. Mr. Smith's father was born in Bryan county, May 26, 1827, was a prosperous farmer, was elected clerk of the superior court in 1873, and held it until his death in 1886. In early life he was an "old-line whig," but after the war acted with the democrats. His widow, born Aug. 26, 1835, married May 26, 1858, is still living. This worthy couple had eleven children born to them: Wilbur Bird and Walter Scott, the last-named a carpenter; Isabel V., born Nov. 7, 1861; Alfred Peyton, born Nov. 28, 1863, lawyer; Albert Glenn, born Jan. 30, 1866, manufacturer of naval stores; Charles Joshua, born April 19, 1867, druggist, Ridgeway, S. C.; Leroy W., born Sept. 23, 1869, has been teaching, now attending school at Cuthbert, Ga.; Mary E.; Lizzie Clyde; and Ophelia Ruth—and one which died in infancy. Mr. Smith received a fairly good education at the near-by country schools, and then engaged in farming and made it his life-pursuit. In 1883-4 he was county surveyor to fill the unexpired term of his deceased father. He was elected the January following, and at three succeeding elections for full terms was elected over some of the most popular citizens of Bryan county after hotly contested elections, and at the last election was elected without opposition. The family record is an excellent one, and the fact of the superior court clerkship being held continuously so long speaks well for the recognized and appreciated faithfulness, capability and efficiency of the family.

BULLOCH COUNTY.

SOLOMON AKINS was born in Bulloch county, Dec. 11, 1838, and is the son of Lewis and Mary Akins. His father was a native of South Carolina, but located in Bulloch county when a young man and lived there the balance of his life. He was an extensive farmer and very successful in business affairs. He had a family of thirteen children, nine sons and four daughters, all of whom lived to be grown, and all of whom are now dead except three sons and one daughter. Solomon Akins was the twelfth child. He was brought up on the farm, and given a common-school education. At the age of twenty he commenced farming for himself. When the war broke out, he enlisted in the Confederate ranks, June 10, 1861. He was in Company I, Ninth Georgia regiment. The regiment was organized at Atlanta and the company commanded by Lloyd C. Belt. Mr. Akins was at the battle of Yorktown, in the Second battle of Manassas, fought all day at Seven Pines, was at Spottsylvania court house, the Wilderness, Gettysburg, Chancellorsville and Knoxville, and the battle of Sharpsburg, not mentioning various small engagements. This record is not surpassed by any soldier in the war. He was wounded at Gettysburg by a piece of shell, and when near Richmond he received a wound in the head, caused by a spent ball. It ploughed a hole through his jaw and knocked out several teeth. His injuries were such that he came home May 5, 1865. He then resumed farming, which he has since continued. He married Miss Lavinia Oliff, daughter of Matthew and Elizabeth Oliff of Bulloch county, on July 31, 1864. They have living children as follows: Mollie Pruella, James F., Matthew W., William Harrison, Julia, Maxie, Maud Roach and Ruth. Mr. Akins has belonged to the masonic order for twenty years. He has always been a democrat in politics, and has served as magistrate ten years, and as jury commissioner twelve years. He was census enumerator in 1880 and again in 1890. He owns a fine farm near Statesboro and is one of the leading farmers of the county.

JAMES FERSHEY AKINS, farmer, Jimps, was born Jan. 15, 1869, in Bulloch county. He is the third child born to Solomon and Lavinia Akins. His father is a prosperous farmer of Bulloch county, a man with a wide reputation for honesty, integrity and knowledge on agricultural matters; and is high in the degrees of masonry. James attended the schools of the county until he was nineteen years old, and obtained a good common-school education. He then began farming for himself, and continued at this for two years, when he engaged in the mercantile business at Jimps, at the same time attending to his farming interests. About two years ago he retired from the store, and since then has devoted all his attention to farming. He has in cultivation 110 acres, and the lands being very fertile, and his farming conducted scientifically, Mr. Akins derives a good revenue from it. He was married September 17, 1893, to Miss Jincy A. Oliff, a daughter of John and Lucy Oliff of Bulloch county. A year later Mr. Akins built a fine home on his farm. Besides the acres in cultivation Mr. Akins has 400 acres of timber land. He is industrious, frugal and is one of the rising young farmers of the county.

MALICHI AKINS, farmer, Statesboro, was born Dec. 21, 1840, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Louis and Mary Akins. He is the youngest child of a family of thirteen and until sixteen years old attended the schools in the neighborhood of where he now lives. He was married to Miss Rhoda Parish, a daughter of Chester and Rebecca Parish, of Bulloch county. They were married September, 1869, and have had five children born to them, viz.: Mary Ann Rebecca, married to Claudius Brannen, a well-known farmer of Bulloch county; Alice, James J., William McDaniel and one who died in infancy. Both parents were devout members of the Missionary Baptist church and were highly respected citizens in the community in which they lived. The wife is still living. David P. was the oldest child. In 1882 he concluded to try to better his fortunes by moving to Georgia, and located in Effingham county. He worked at his trade for five years and then engaged in the mill business. In 1893 he moved to Bulloch county and built a large saw and planing mill which he is now operating. Inheriting the business instincts of his father, Mr. Averett has been very successful in all his investments. He was married April 4, 1877, to Miss Melissa J. Bland, daughter of Milton Bland, of Sampson county, N. C. They have seven children: Rosa J., Lillian Daisy, David Percy, Nellie Gertrude, Mary Estelle, Leola Susan and George Sweat. Mr. and Mrs. Averett are members of the Baptist church, the former having united with the church when thirteen years old. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias fraternity and an ex-chancellor commander of the lodge at Guyton, Ga. Mr. Averett is what is called in common parlance a self-made man, a trite term which implies a native indomitable energy, will power and ambition, which evolves success from fierce conflicts with adverse circumstances.

GEORGE ROSS BEASLEY, farmer, Statesboro, was born Jan. 6, 1842, in Bulloch county, near where he now resides, and is the son of David and Rebecca (Mickell) Beasley. David Beasley is prominently identified with the history of Bulloch county, and in his day was a political leader of state fame. He was born in 1801 and raised in the county where he has long lived. He was tax collector, clerk and ordinary, and during the war represented Bulloch county in the legislature. After his disabilities were removed following the civil conflict, he was again elected tax collector. He died in 1883. David Beasley was a man who enjoyed the esteem of everybody and was one of the most popular men in the county. He was honorable in every detail of life, charitable, kind, patient and a friend of all. He read law under Co. J. A. Brannen, his first cousin, in 1890, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1890 by Judge Hines. He has practiced since that date, at the same time attending to the cultivation of his big farm near Statesboro. He was a member of the state senate in 1886-87 from the seventeenth senatorial district, composed of the counties of Bulloch, Screven and Burke, and served with distinction. He was recommended by the grand jury and appointed to his present position by Gov. Atkinson in the fall of 1894. He has always been identified with the democratic party, has been a member of the district committee and is prominent in the counsels of the party in the county and state. He united with the Primitive Baptist church in 1887, and was for a while clerk of the church. Mrs. Brannen is a member of the Missionary Baptist church. The administration of Judge Brannen has been excellent and he has proven one of the best judges that ever occupied this bench.

JAMES ALONZO BRANNEN, of Statesboro, was born in Bryan county, Ga., Sept. 29, 1858, and is the son of James M. and Amanda F. Brannen. His father was a successful farmer and merchant, and represented Bryan county in the house of representatives in 1878-79. The family is an old Bulloch county one, Mr. Brannen's great-grandfather, William, having settled there in the last century. His grandfather John lived and died there. James A. Brannen was educated at the Bradwell institute in Liberty county, under S. D. Bradwell, late state school commissioner. In 1878 he was graduated from the law department of Mercer university. He located in Statesboro in 1879, and began the practice of his profession, and with the exception of five years' residence in Emanuel county, where he practiced, he has since been a resident of Bulloch. He is active in the development of the resources of Bulloch county and takes much interest in upbuilding his town. Mr. Brannen's abilities as a lawyer are recognized by his brother practitioners as well as by the public in general, and he commands a large share of the legal patronage of the county.

JAMES AUSTIN BRANNEN, merchant and farmer, Laston, Ga., was born March 13, 1856, in Bulloch county, and is the son of John T. and Lavinia Lee Brannen. His father was an extensive farmer and a brave soldier in the Confederate army. He spent a year in a northern prison and when the war closed walked the most of the way to Augusta, Ga., from Elmira, N. Y., and there his wife met him. He was in the army of Virginia and under Gen. Joseph McAlister. When he returned home he found nothing left but his house and the bare farm, all the improvements being destroyed. He set to work with a will, however, and, as good a farmer as he was a soldier, he soon had his place in shape again. To John T. Brannen and wife were born four children, as follows: Wiley, James Austin, Janie, married to Bedford Everett of Bulloch county, and Edmond. The parents of James A. Brannen are both living. He attended the common schools, but very irregularly, for his service was required to help the family when the father was fighting in defense of his country, and to help his father when he returned to find his farm a desolate tract of land. He was married March 18, 1880, to Miss Carrie Durden of Emanuel county, daughter of Albert Durden. They have three children: Ethel Brannen, born Feb. 20, 1881; Lula Belle, born Oct. 18, 1885; Rollin, born June 30, 1887. James Austin Brannen worked for his father until twenty years old and then started out for himself. He spent six months in Florida, but on his return his father gave him a small farm, where he has been residing ever since, adding to it, and making improvements every year. Soon after his marriage he engaged in the mercantile business, which he has since followed with success. He has a farm now embracing about 800 acres of good land. In connection with his property it may be mentioned that he lost several thousand dollars' worth of property by fire a few years ago. He has now 175 acres of land in cultivation. He is a wide-awake, pushing citizen and one of the county's most progressive agriculturists.

JOSEPH SMITH CONE, one of Bulloch county's distinguished citizens, was born in that county April 14, 1843. His father was James Cone, a large planter and for years a justice of the inferior court of Bulloch county. He was a brother of Gen. Peter Cone, who for thirty years represented Bulloch county in the state senate. James Cone was a leading man in his day, and was a moving spirit in the Missionary Baptist church. He married Annie Smith, and to them were born eleven children, of whom Joseph was the eighth. His childhood days were spent on the farm, and after mastering the elementary branches of learning he was sent to the military institute at Marietta. Here he developed a strong and active mind, and entered into his studies and instruction with a zeal that augured well for his future. In the midst of his studies the war broke out and a call for volunteers was made. He left school in 1861 and enlisted as first lieutenant in one of the first Georgia companies, and thus began his remarkable army career. He first went to the coast and was stationed on James island, where he commanded the detachment that drew the first blood in South Carolina. There he was wounded in the leg, but he refused to go to the hospital and continued on active duty, going into North Carolina in 1862. From that point his command was ordered to Vicksburg, Miss., to join Gen. Johnston, and he was at Jackson, in which battle his regiment captured three flags. They then reported to Gen. Bragg at Chattanooga. Capt. Cone was in command of his regiment at the battle of Chickamauga, soon after which he was promoted to major. He was at the siege of Chattanooga and the battle of Missionary Ridge; and was with the army in the retreat to Dalton, and down to the Chattahoochee river. He was then sent to reinforce Gen. Sam Jones. He was in the fight on John's island and led his men with success against the Federal breastworks. His bravery here was reported to, and attracted the attention of, the Confederate government, and he was recommended for promotion, and was placed in command of the fort at Secessionville. He left Secessionville in November with his command to reinforce the army at Honey Hill, S. C., and there led the line of sharpshooters. In this terrible engagement he was three times shot, and badly wounded. He returned home, but as soon as able reported for duty at Augusta, where he was placed in charge of the reorganization of the troops at Hamburg. After Gen. Lee's surrender his command disbanded in South Carolina. Major Cone returned home and was engaged in teaching for several years. In 1870 he was elected to the state senate, and re-elected in 1872. He served on important committees with distinction, and was regarded as one of the ablest and most useful members of the bodies with which he was connected. When his term expired he returned home and retired from politics; and though frequently urged to be a candidate for other honors, he has always declined. On April 13, 1870, he was married to Miss Ella Goodman, daughter of John Goodman, Esq., formerly a representative in the legislature from Bulloch county. This marriage has been blessed with three children, viz.: Sidney Johnston, Ella and Rufus. The wife died in 1880, and Maj. Cone has never again married. Maj. Cone is commander of the Confederate Veterans' association of his county, and takes much interest in the annual reunions held by the organization. He is a consistent member of the Methodist church, and belongs to the S. A. E. college fraternity. He resides on his handsome estate near Nellwood.

WILLIAM DANIEL DAVIS, inventor and manufacturer, Statesboro, was born in Bulloch county, May 6, 1857, and is the son of John Clark and Sarah Davis. He comes from families of mechanics, and it is not a surprise that his earliest predilection for work was in that line. His father and all his family were mechanics; likewise the same on the mother's side. William was the fourth child in a family of nine. He attended the schools in the neighborhood until he was sixteen years old, when he broke away from his books, and much to his delight entered the shop as a workman. He left his father's employ in 1878, when twenty-one years old, to go into business for himself, and opened a manufacturing and general repair establishment. He built and repaired buggies, wagons and agricultural implements. In 1881 he transferred his business to Statesboro, and added to it a plant for the manufacture of gins, mills, etc. All this time his mind was active as well as his body, and directed toward invention. The first result was a plow which was a success and found large sale. Then next came the famous Davis gin, which is so extensively used to gin the sea island cotton. It was a success from the start, and the improvements he has added to it have only bettered it. It is rapidly taking the place of other gins used for ginning that staple. It has more than doubled the facilities of any other gin used for the same purpose, and has reduced the cost to less than half what it was formerly. Mr. Davis is now operating a planing-mill, and also manufactures and repairs all classes of machinery, gins, etc. He was married Sept. 30, 1880, to Miss Etta Brannen, daughter of U. M. Brannen, of Bulloch county. Three interesting children are the result of this union: Beulah, Wilmer and Lemuel. The wife died June 14, 1887, and Mr. Davis was the second time married on March 26, 1891, to Lula Preetorius, daughter of Charles Preetorius, of Bulloch county. They have two children—Alma and William Diedrick. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are members of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. Davis is another of those successful business men who have had to rely on their own exertions to achieve prosperity. When he started in life he had not money enough to buy tools. Industry and energy and a determination to succeed, however, soon made him independent. He is the owner of a fine property in Statesboro.

ROBERT WILLIAMS De LOOCH, a well-known agriculturist and a leader in the democracy of Bulloch county, lives on his fine farm near Bloys. He was born March 25, 1843, and comes from an old and highly respected Bulloch county family. His father was John De Looch, a big farmer and for many years judge of the inferior court. John De Looch and Ardelia, his wife, were the parents of eleven children: James Hoyt, John Calvin, William H., Joshua D., George Washington, Robert Williams, Zachariah Taylor, Julia, Sarah Jane, Emma and Amanda. All are living but Joshua and Washington. Robert Williams is the tenth child. He went to the neighborhood schools, where he had secured a good education when he enlisted in the Confederate army. He was eighteen years old at the time he became a member of Company E, known as the Bulloch troop of the First Georgia cavalry. He entered the service in October, 1861, and served until the war closed. He was in several bloody engagements, and was at Noonday church, Stone mountain and at Atlanta, July 22, 1864. He was with the troops when Gen. Johnston surrendered in 1865, and returning home he went to work on the farm. Always active in the interests of his party, his friends determined to honor him, and he was elected in 1873 on the democratic ticket to represent Bulloch county in the general assembly. So well did he discharge his duties, and so satisfactory was his vote and course on all public questions, that he was returned in 1875 and again in 1877. He was a member when Ben Hill was elected to the United States senate and again when Thomas E. Norwood was elected that honorable body. He served on the most important committees and established a record for faithful service, industry, and close attention to business that distinguished him in the lower house. He was on the enrolling committee with Gov. Northen, and they became fast friends. After his retirement from the house Mr. De Looch has held no public office, but has served his party on committees, and takes much interest in its success. In connection with his farming Mr. De Looch has taken many large contracts for public works. He is now devoting his entire time to his farm interests. His estate comprises 360 acres, with a large and comfortable home, pleasantly situated near Bloys. He was married in December, 1866, to Miss Rebecca Frances Hodges, daughter of Joshua and Louisa Hodges, of Bulloch county.

To this union have been born eight children, all of whom are living: Horace W.; Emma O., married to John A. Grovestein, of Savannah; James T.; Selima Estelle; Lorena R.; Robert Bloys; Lloyd Preston, and Yuba Olive. Mr. De Looch is a self-made man. He began life with very little means, but by industry and close application to business he has made himself comfortable for life, and surrounded by his interesting family he can spend his remaining days in the enjoyment of domestic bliss and contentment. He is postmaster at Bloys.

They had born to them eleven children. Warren J. was the youngest child, and was reared on the farm. He prepared for college at Hearn institute, and in the fall term of 1887 he entered Mercer university, graduating in 1891 in the theological and literary courses. He was first engaged in teaching and assisting other pastors in their work, but in March, 1892, accepted a call to Statesboro, and took charge of Statesboro Baptist church and Fellowship church, and has had charge of those churches ever since. He is also pastor of the Baptist church at Pembroke. When he first came to Statesboro he served the Baptist church at Sylvania, in Screven county, and Island Creek church in Hancock county, but was obliged to give them up on account of the multitudinous duties his position places upon him. He united and was baptized into the Baptist church the fourth Sunday in August, 1876. He was made a master Mason in 1887, and is now worshipful master of Ogeechee lodge, No. 213. He became a royal arch Mason in 1893, and is king of the Statesboro chapter. Rev. Durham was married in 1881 to Emma, daughter of T. C. and Mary Hampton, of Floyd county. They have two children living: Beulah and Edward Ryals, and one dead, Otelia. In college Rev. Durham was distinguished for his oratorical and debating powers, and in his junior year was champion debater from his college literary society, and in his senior year was anniversarian from same society. He was a member of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity, and held the position of eminent archon in this fraternity. He is moderator of the Millen Baptist association, and is secretary and treasurer of the South Georgia Baptist convention and a member of the mission board of the same. He was elected by the board of education to act as expert of the teachers' institute of Bulloch county in 1894. Mr. Durham is a hard and faithful worker. The parents were faithful members of the Primitive Baptist church and reared a family of ten children. Bedford Everett was brought up on the farm, and attended the common schools where he picked up the elements of an education. When twenty years old his labor on the farm was allowed him by his father and he began business for himself. Four years later he had done so well that he found he was able to take care of a wife, and was married to Miss Sarah Jane Brannen, a daughter of John and Lavinia Brannen, neighbors of Mr. Everett. The wedding took place Dec. 16, 1880. This union was followed by five interesting children, all of whom are living: Joshua, John, Talulah, Penelope and Bernard. Mr. Everett is an enterprising modern farmer, and as such is reaping the benefits of progressive farming. He is a popular citizen and a man of wide acquaintance and many friends. Mr. and Mrs. Everett and family belong to the Primitive Baptist church. He lives on his fine farm near Excelsior, where they possess a neat home. JASON FRANKLIN, farmer, Excelsior, was born Dec. 26, 1845, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Pernel and Susan Franklin of Bulloch county. The father was an old planter of this county and both parents were active church members and respected citizens. There were born to these good people nine children, viz.: Wealthy Ann, wife of Henry Parrish; Mitchell, who enlisted in the Sixty-first Georgia regiment, Confederate army, and was under Gen. Lee in the Virginia army, and who died while in service, leaving a family; Alderman Franklin, a soldier in the Fifth Georgia regiment cavalry, married and engaged in farming in Bulloch county; Hiram, a lieutenant in the Sixty-first Georgia regiment, who was wounded while in service, and is now a farmer, married and living in Bulloch county; Remer was a member of the Sixty-first regiment, and was in the army of Virginia, and is now farming in Bulloch county; Hardy was a member of the Sixty-first regiment, and died in service; Jason, Emily Jane, married to Capt. It will be seen that Pernel furnished six sons and a son-in-law to the cause of the Confederacy, and two of these sons gave up their lives in defense of their home and country. Three of these sons were officers. Jason enlisted in the Twenty-second battalion, and served one year in the field near Savannah. He was then seventeen years old. His education had been confined to the common schools, but he had been a quick learner, close observer and a tireless reader; when the war closed he was competent to teach, and spent a couple of years as a pedagogue. His record in the senate was a most creditable one, and he took a prominent part in the important debates of the session and in the work of the chief committees, of which he was a member. After his term of office expired he formed a partnership with Col. D. R. Groover in the practice of law, and this firm still exists. Mr. Johnston was elected mayor of Statesboro in 1891, but declined re-election. On Dec. 23, 1880, he was married to Miss Nannie Outland, daughter of B. T. and Parmelia Outland. They have living four children: Marguerite, Greene S., Jr., Jessie Outland and Annie Taylor. Mr. Johnston has been a member of the Methodist church since 1877 and is now steward of the church at Statesboro. He is a member of the order of the Golden Chain, and himself and wife are valued members of society. Mr. Johnston is an able and accomplished lawyer, a highly successful practitioner, a polished gentleman and an eminent citizen.

DANIEL LEONARD KENNEDY, physician, Metter, was born Jan. 21, 1836, in Bulloch county, and was the son of Stephen and Mary (Holland) Kennedy. Stephen Kennedy was an extensive farmer in his day and lived to be over one hundred years old. He was twice married. By his first wife he had nine children, of whom Daniel was the youngest. He was educated in the common schools of Bulloch county, and at twenty years old commenced to farm for himself. He served in the Seminole Indian war of 1856-58 and in 1861 enlisted in the Confederate army. He was captain of Company G, Forty-seventh Georgia regiment, in Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army. He was in the battle of Chickamauga, Kennesaw Mountain, Missionary Ridge and at Atlanta, July 22, 1862. He was at Jackson, Miss., and reached Vicksburg the night before the surrender. He was at Bentonville and Averysboro, N. C., and at James Island, S. C. He was at Greensborough, N. C., when Gen. Lee surrendered, and walked home, it taking him fifteen days. On Sept. 14, 1865, Dr. Kennedy was married to Miss Abcillo Parrish, daughter of Benjamin Ellis. They have two children—Florida A., born Jan. 5, 1867, and married to Dr. L. J. McLean of Statesboro, and Wallace Daniel, born June 14, 1872, who is a graduate of the medical department of the university of Georgia, Augusta, class of 1891. Dr. Kennedy first read medicine under a preceptor before the war and entered the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, in 1858. He had no chance to practice his profession until he came home from the war. Dr. Kennedy and wife are members of the Primitive Baptist church and Dr. Kennedy is a strong democrat and has served Bulloch county in the legislature in 1871-73-75-76 and again in 1892-93. He has been elected every time by handsome majorities, and in 1892 defeated the populist candidate by 500 majority. As a member of the legislature Dr. Kennedy was on important committees and was considered one of the best legislators of the general assembly. He enjoys a large and lucrative practice and ranks among the foremost in his profession in the state. Dr. Kennedy is a member of the state medical association. He lives on a fine farm of 225 acres near Metter. He has a mind well stored with medical knowledge and scholarly attainments. He is energetic and progressive, a close student, and keeps fully abreast of all the latest improvements and advancements in the medical science. Blending mental with social and moral culture, he is deservedly popular and eminently useful.

EDMOND KENNEDY, farmer, Jimps, was born March 24, 1824, and was the son of Stephen and Mary Kennedy of Tattnall county. They were early settlers of this section of the state and lived a life-time in the county in which they took up their home. Stephen and Mary Kennedy were hardy pioneers and when Edmond was born lived on their large farm in a block house, surrounded by a dense forest in which wild game was almost as plentiful as the blackberries. He toiled at the forest and tilled the soil and the wife spun and reared a family. Thus was a home built for the nine children born to the parents. Edmond was the fifth child. His schooling was very meager. His aid was needed on the farm, at the plow or with the ax, and he does not think he got seven months of schooling all together. But this did not keep him from reading extensively and storing his mind with much useful knowledge. He was taught early, by the parents and by their example, high ideas of morality and religious duties and for thirty years has been a member of the Missionary Baptist church. He enlisted in the Fifth Georgia cavalry under Capt. Waltower, in February, 1862, and served till the war closed, being in many skirmishes, but no regular battles. He has been engaged in farming and milling all his life and has been fortunate in accumulating a good property. Mr. Kennedy has been married twice. His first wife was Elizabeth Bird, a daughter of Wiley Bird. She died in October, 1894, and he was married the second time to Miss Sarah Alderman on Sept. 14, 1895. His children are as follows: Mary, Daniel, Andrew J., Edmond, Eliza, Elisha and James. Mr.

Kennedy is still active and looks after his extensive farming and milling interests and shows a bright intellect and vigorous constitution, which still promises many years for him.

CHARLIE ALGERNON LANIER, merchant, Statesboro, was born in Effingham county, Ga., April 24, 1868, and is the son of T. W. and Clara A. (Smith) Lanier. His father is a minister of the Baptist church and a native of Effingham county. His mother, a woman of high intellectual attainments and culture, is a sister of Prof. Cosby W. Smith, who for a long time was a professor in the Wesleyan Female college at Macon; of Prof. O. L. Smith, president of Emory college, and also of Rufus W. Smith, president of La Grange Female college. The parents had six children, three boys and three girls, of whom Charlie A was the next to the eldest. His father moved to Screven county when he was quite small, and he attended for several years the schools of that county. His health failed and he was prevented from completing his education in a college, but was instructed and taught by his talented mother, whose capabilities in that way were equal to those of his illustrious brothers. When fifteen years old Charlie entered the store of his uncle in Waynesboro and remained there five years. He went from there to Millen, where he remained with another uncle a short time, then going to Statesboro in 1889. Here he entered in business for himself. He had formed habits and established traits of character, which with his mercantile training, assured his success. From the first his business prospered and increased in volume daily, and in 1891 he was the owner of two big stores. This year he met with misfortune, the largest of his stores, consisting of an immense stock, representing the great part of the accumulation of his business career, was destroyed by fire. He was not discouraged, however, but continued his trade at the remaining store, with his former success. He now has one of the largest mercantile houses in Statesboro. Mr. Lanier is an active member of the Baptist church, joining that denomination fourteen years ago. He belongs to the order of the Golden Chain. He wedded Miss Stella F. Wilson, daughter of George G. and Mary Wilson, in 1890. Mrs. Lanier is a graduate of Andrew Female college of Cuthbert, Ga. They have three children: Marie Clare, Thomas Fleetwood and George Wilson.

MORGAN R. LEE, one of the prosperous farmers of Bulloch county, was born near where he now lives, Oct. 6, 1851. He is the son of Gen. George W. and Lavinia Lee. The father was a well-known planter and active in the affairs of the Primitive Baptist church. Morgan was the second of nine children. From a boy he was fond of the farm, and at an early age did the work of a man. He attended the country schools near his home and there obtained his education. When about twenty-one years old, on Nov. 27, 1872, he married Miss Mary Anderson, a daughter of William Anderson of Bulloch county. Their wedded life has been a happy one, and also a fruitful one, for they have been favored with nine children, all of whom are living. They are: Erastus Theodore, who is married; Letitia L. Monico, Wayley, Clayton R., Mary D., Maud Irene, William Clem, Russell, and a babe unnamed. Mr. Lee has passed his life on the farm, and when one surveys his possessions, he cannot think other than that when he selected his avocation, he exercised wise judgment. He began farming on his own account with a capital of only $500 and now owns one of the nicest farms in the county, besides other property. He is a man who enjoys the confidence and respect of all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance. Mr. Lee and wife are members of the Primitive Baptist church. He resides in a comfortable home on his estate near Statesboro.

ROBERT FRANKLIN LESTER, one of the best known farmers of Bulloch county, was born June 22, 1853, in Bryan county, and was the son of Malcomb B. and Mary Lester. The parents moved to Bulloch county when Robert was about one year old and lived there until this son was eight years old, when they removed to Bryan county, where they resided until he was twenty-three years old. In 1876 they concluded to try their fortune in Statesboro. The father was an extensive farmer and good business man, a true Christian, and a brave and patriotic citizen. He was among the first to enlist in behalf of the Confederacy and gave up his life for his country. He died in October, 1864, and the mother, a noble, self-sacrificing woman, survived him till May, 1883. Both were active members of the Baptist church. There were born to them seven children, and Robert Franklin was the third child. He was educated in the country schools and at the Bradwell institute, in Hinesville, Liberty county. This institution was then under the management of Capt. S. D. Bradwell, ex-state school commissioner. Mr. Lester left school when twenty-one years of age, and as he had expended what money he had on his last year's schooling, he practically began life without a dollar. He taught school one year and then went to Statesboro and embarked in the mercantile business. He also conducted a hotel in that place and was one of its substantial and enterprising citizens. In 1891 he gave up his business interests there and retired to his big farm near by, where he has since lived, giving his entire time to farming. When Mr. Lester located in Statesboro, the biggest part of that now thriving town was in woods, with bunches of rabbits running about. He was one of the first residents of the place, and there is to-day not a citizen in Statesboro who was living there when Mr. Lester took up his abode, and there is only one house in the present town that was there then. He has seen the small place of a few souls develop into a town of 1,500 people, from an obscure inland town to a thriving railroad town. During his residence there he saw real estate increase in value from $8 an acre to $25 an acre and farm land, $1.50 per acre to $20 per acre. Mr. Lester takes much interest and has a just pride in the development of the town. He was made a Mason in 1878. He was married in 1880 to Ida T. Everett, a daughter of Jehu Everett and Penelope Everett of Bulloch county. They have seven children, viz.: Leah, Eunice, Hampton P., Daniel B., Hugh Everett, Malcomb B. and Ruth. The eldest four are in school at Statesboro. Mr. Lester lives on a highly cultured farm of 175 acres, which he manages with great success. He raises chiefly sea island cotton and home supplies.

LOGAN JUDSON M'LEAN, dentist, Statesboro, was born May 24, 1858, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Thomas L. and Ellen McLean. His father was a farmer and a brave soldier in the Confederate army, and died from the effects of a wound received in battle. There were two sons: John L., who is a physician practicing in Tattnall county, and Logan, the youngest. Dr. McLean entered Vanderbilt university in 1884, and graduated from the literary department, and in 1887 was graduated from the dental department. He soon after located in Metter, in Bulloch county, where he practiced his profession until Feb. 21, 1891, when he settled in Statesboro, and has practiced since that time in that place. He was married to Miss Eliza F. Kennedy, a daughter of Dr. D. L. Kennedy, of Metter, who represented Bulloch county in the legislature in 1892-3, and has served three terms. They were married Feb. 8, 1882, and to this union have been born the following children: John D., Ellis Judson, Carl Grady and Abbie. Dr. McLean is a member of the order of the Golden Chain. He enjoys a large practice, and it extends throughout the whole county.

JAMES SIMON MIKELL, farmer, Statesboro, Ga., was born Oct. 18, 1855, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Thomas and Sarah Mikell. Thomas Mikell served in the Confederate army, and is a farmer living in Bulloch county. He was the father of nine children, all of whom are living, as follows: James S., William, Henry, Marguerite, Emeline, Catharine, Jack, Julia, Luddie. James S. is the eldest child. His education was meager, having no other opportunity than the few days' schooling picked up at intervals each year at the country school. And this only till he was seventeen years old, when all of his time was given in help of his father on the farm. When nineteen years old he began life on his own account. His father gave him a few acres and a home, and this was the basis of the fine farm he now owns. On Oct. 3, 1877, he married Miss Julia Wilson, a daughter of Benjamin Wilson, of Bulloch county. They have been blessed with five children: Thomas Virgil, born August, 1880; Ramer Coleman, born March 30, 1882; Sallie Lee, born March 30, 1885; Brooks, born Feb. 25, 1889; and Allen, born Sept. 25, 1893. James S. Mikell has devoted his entire time to farming, and has been reasonably successful in securing a share of this world's goods, and happy in securing an excellent, loving wife, and rearing an interesting family of children. He lives in a neat home situated about two miles from Statesboro.

IVY SIMMONS LANE MILLER, physician, Mill Ray, was born Jan. 1, 1849, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Rev. John R. Miller and Nancy A. Miller. His father was a farmer and Baptist minister and a distinguished Mason. To John R. Miller were born seven children, viz.: Sarah A., married first to Thomas G. Hotchkiss, and the second time to Henry Murphy; Lanie, married to B. W. Darsey; Lewis L.; Francis Marion and Wealthy J. (twins); America A.; Ivy S. L. Dr. Miller was the youngest child. He was educated in the common schools of Bulloch county. Too young to go to the war, he saw two brothers enlist, one of whom was killed in battle. After he left school he taught school several terms, and in 1869 he located in Savannah, where he entered the medical college. He was graduated in 1872, and for two years was engaged in the drug business in that city. Then he located at his father's home and began the practice of his profession. His success was immediate, and he has built up a big practice. He married Miss Mary Jane Harn, daughter of William and Mary Ann Harn, on May 17, 1877. They only have one child living, Ada E. Miller; Florence Gordon, another daughter, being deceased. Dr. Miller has been a member of the Missionary Baptist church for thirty years. Mrs. Miller also belongs to that church. He belongs to Mill Ray lodge, No. 389, Masons, and was made a Mason in 1881, joining Ogeechee lodge, No. 213. He was made a royal arch Mason in 1892. Dr. Miller is a physician and surgeon of acknowledged abilities, and through intellectual and moral merit has acquired a large practice. He is a thorough scholar, close student, brilliant conversationalist, genial and urbane in all his business relations and popular with all classes. The doctor loves his profession, which, properly understood and practiced, is the most vitally important and honorable among men—the true doctor being the truest philanthropist, and in his hands measurably hangs life and death. Thus in whatever will promote the advancement of his profession and the interests of humanity, Dr. Miller will always be found in the front rank. In social and benevolent affairs the doctor always takes a lively interest.

DANIEL N. NICHOLS, farmer and physician, Portal, was born Feb. 4, 1852, where he now resides, and was the son of Theophilus and Rebecca Nichols. His father was a large farmer, honored and esteemed by the community, and though possessed of only a limited education, was successful in the management of his many acres, and previous to the war accumulated valuable property. The war left him like thousands of other brave and patriotic southerners—stripped of everything save the naked lands. There were born to Theophilus and Rebecca Nichols the large family of ten children, viz.: Absalom Jackson, John Thomas, George Washington, James M., Mary Jane, married to J. M. Baxley, Sarah Elizabeth, wife of John K. Hendrix, Dr. Daniel N., Levina Ann, wife of E. H. Hendrix, Emeline Rebecca, wife of J. C. Deal, Dr. Loven M., physician, of Belleville. Dr. Daniel N. Nichols is the seventh child born, and spent his boyhood days on the farm and at the country schools. When twenty years old he commenced farming for himself, and it is this vocation that has always attracted him, even when devoting himself to a profession. He entered the Kentucky school of medicine at Louisville, Ky., in 1885, and was graduated in 1886. He began practicing at home, and for nearly ten years has continued with great professional success. Dr. Nichols was first married to Miss Ann Jane Brannen, a daughter of Alexander and Sarah Ann Brannen, of Bulloch county, on Dec. 24, 1873. By this union two boys and three girls were born, viz.: Debbie, Jincy, Lemuel T., Hardey A., and Lula. The wife died Oct. 13, 1884. Dr. Nichols was married the second time July 1, 1885, to Miss Sallie Groover, daughter of Charles and Annie Groover. By this union four children were born, viz.: Annie, deceased; Berta, Ed Lane, and Joshua Noel. The second wife died Sept. 29, 1892, and Dr. Nichols married the third time Aug. 12, 1894, Miss Fannie D. Jones, a daughter of Thomas and Mary J. Jones, of Lowndes county. She died May 16, 1895. Dr. Nichols is a member of the Primitive Baptist church, as were his wives, and he has officiated for ten years as clerk of Bethlehem church. Dr. Nichols has been successful in life, and it all has been achieved through his own efforts. He started without any material means, and the few acres of patrimony have developed into a large estate. Though he always from a child had a partiality for medicine among the professions, he would probably never have devoted himself to it but for the loss of his first wife. His grief was so intense that his health was threatened, and to divert his mind and give him something to occupy his thoughts away from his great sorrow he entered the medical school. He must have had a natural genius for medicine, for it only took him a year to get through, and the facility and success with which he has entered into practice was remarkable. Two daughters of Dr. Nichols teach in the public schools of Bulloch county. He has in cultivation about two hundred and seventy-five acres, and has thirteen hundred acres of land in one body. His comfortable home, located upon the fine farm, is the shelter of an interesting family. Dr. Nichols is chairman of the populist party of Bulloch county, and has been identified with that party ever since its organization. He is quite a potent factor in political affairs and is well and favorably known throughout the county.

HARRISON OLIFF, clerk of the superior court of Bulloch county, was born May 6, 1851, in the county he now serves, and is the son of Matthew and Elizabeth (Brannen) Oliff. The father was a successful farmer and a much-honored Christian gentleman, being a devout member of the Primitive Baptist church. The mother was a member of the same church and a woman whose noble character and example had a potent influence upon the lives of the children. To these parents were born six children, three boys and three girls. Harrison Oliff was the eldest son. He grew up on the farm, laboring hard to help the father in the support of the family, and attending the public schools of the neighborhood, where he was educated. When twenty years old he engaged in farming on his own account, and soon after took unto himself a wife. She was Miss Clifford Womack, daughter of William and Amelia Womack, of Bulloch county. Mrs. Oliff was born Jan. 5, 1858, and they were married Dec. 4, 1874. Mr. Oliff has spent the greater part of his life on the farm, and is at present engaged in farming a large tract of land, upon which his home is located, near Statesboro. While always a democrat in politics, Mr. Oliff has never been an officeseeker, and it was not the result of his personal efforts that he was nominated on the democratic ticket in the winter of 1892 for the position of clerk of the superior court of Bulloch county. His friends, and they are many, knew his capabilities, his integrity and his fitness for the position, and they drafted him. He was elected, and his administration of the office being so eminently satisfactory to the people, he was re-elected in 1894, and by a big increase, even over the handsome majority he had over his first opponent. He is an efficient officer, and one whose popularity is acknowledged by all. Mr. Oliff has held one other office—that of councilman of Statesboro. His domestic life is a most happy one. Mrs. Oliff is a lady of rare amiability, talent and culture, with a just motherly pride in her two bright daughters—Kittie, born Feb. 12, 1880, and Lillie, born Feb. 17, 1885.

WILLIAM WESTLEY OLLIFF, deceased, a farmer and trader of Excelsior, was born on a farm Nov. 30, 1848, in Bulloch county, and was the son of John and Lucy Olliff. He died March 13, 1893. John Olliff was an old resident of the county, a merchant and extensive farmer, and was treasurer of the county for a number of years. He died in 1887, about sixty years of age, leaving his wife, who still survives him. They had born to them seventeen children, of whom fourteen grew to maturity. They were William W., Sarah, Hattie, Louisa, John M., James F., Eliza, Rebecca, America, Henry I., Matthew T., Benjamin H., Jinsie A. and Julia. William W. Olliff was a hard worker and of industrious habits from the time he was a boy. He always displayed a character marked for its energy, truthfulness and frugality. He only had about one year's schooling, but he made every hour count, and learned more in these stray opportunities at the common schools than many a scholar could in going through college. He got a lift from his father when he started in life to farm for himself, but it was a small one, no more than enough to buy him a little stock to put on his rented farm. He was a worker, a saver and a good manager and soon he was firmly established on his feet. Then everything he turned to made him money, and within twenty years' time he had made the sum of $200,000, and was the richest man in Bulloch county at the time of his death. He owned over 30,000 acres of land. He married in 1868 Miss America A. Kennedy, a daughter of Jimperson Kennedy, of Bulloch county. By this marriage nine children were born, who are now living as follows: John W., Maxie P., James L., Jimps B., Janie, Lucy, Allie, Gordon and Annie May. There are three children dead. Mr. William Olliff was a member of the Missionary Baptist church, and the surviving widow is a member of the same church. She lives at the old homestead in Bulloch county. Mr. W. W. Olliff was too young to serve in the war, but was out with the militia the closing year of the life of the Confederacy. Upon his death his large estate was divided among the heirs. William Olliff was in some respects a remarkable man. Beginning just at the time the south was in the depth of despair, and Georgia was under the heel of the victorious northern armies, he pushed himself forward, and when the wave of prosperity came after the financial depression of 1873, he was already on the road to large wealth. He was a shrewd business man, but always fair and liberal. He had a rare judgment and a quick discernment that seemed an intuition. He appeared a generation ahead of the time in the dashing way in which he made investments and entered into business enterprise. There were risks to take, of course, but Mr. Olliff seemed always to have measured and conducted everything, and so he went along successfully until he became very wealthy. He has two sons now in the mercantile business—Messrs. J. W. and J. L. Olliff.

BENJAMIN PARISH, farmer, Metter, was born March 28, 1847, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Hezekiah and Mary Parish. His father was a prosperous farmer and his mother a woman of strong religious views. There were born to those good people nine children, of whom Benjamin was the sixth. He attended school until fifteen years old, when he left to enlist in the Confederate army. On account of his age he was rejected, but a year later was able to enroll himself, and became a member of Capt. Bess' company. He served throughout the war and was in several engagements. When he threw aside the gun to take hold of the plow it was to work for his father on the old farm. Three years after this he determined to go it alone, and so engaged in the mercantile business. After a few years he bought a plantation near Metter and returned to his first love—the farm. He has continued at this vocation since, with gratifying results. His lands are in a high state of cultivation, and he grows cotton as a money crop. His industry and good management have been productive of large pecuniary benefits. Mr. Parish is possessed of much property, and is one of the substantial farmers of Bulloch county. In addition to his farming interests, Mr. Parish does a private brokerage business, loaning money, discounting, etc. About twenty years ago he took a life companion in Miss Dora Dekle, daughter of Littleton Dekle, of Emanuel county. They have six children: Walter, Leah, Maxie, Lester, Cora and Benjamin. The children are all at home and attending school. Mr. Parish is a great advocate of higher education and proposes to give all his children a thorough collegiate education.

FRANKLIN PIERCE REGISTER, merchant and manufacturer, Statesboro, was born Jan. 29, 1853, in Balden county, N. C., and is the son of William and Nancy Ann Register. His father was a big farmer and both parents belonged to the Missionary Baptist church. There were born to William and Nancy Register twelve children—six sons and six daughters, as follows: Owen; Miles Corton; William James; Lucy Ann; Daniel B.; Hannah Jane; George W.; Franklin Pierce; Mary Elizabeth; Narcissus; Laura L.; and Sarah Ellen. Of these nine are living. Four of the sons were in the Confederate army and two served throughout the war. Franklin Pierce Register was the eighth child and the youngest son. He attended the common schools, but this opportunity of education was lost by the war and the following years in farm improving, when the lad's services were of great use. When twenty-two years old he was an employe on a turpentine farm, and moved to Georgia in 1887 to engage in the manufacture of naval stores for himself. He was seven years in Effingham county, and then moved to Bulloch county, where he is now located. He runs fourteen crops, and manufactures 700 barrels of spirits and 3,000 barrels of resin per annum. In doing this he employs sixty-five hands. He also carries on a general merchandise store. He was married first, Dec. 21, 1884, to Miss Amanda H. Mallory, daughter of Augustus H. and Sophronia Mallory of Effingham county. To them were born two children: Frankie Inez and William Augustus (deceased). The wife died July 27, 1892, and Mr. Register was married the second time to Miss Janie Joseph Evans of Cumberland county, N. C., a daughter of James Evans. Their marriage occurred Feb. 21, 1894. Mr. Franklin Register is a member of the Missionary Baptist church. His first wife belonged to the Lutheran church and his second wife is a member of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Register began life working for wages, but now is worth over $15,000. This all has been earned by no market fluctuations, or the buying or selling of stocks, but by the sweat of the brow, and perseverance and close application to business. He is a citizen, well liked and his business success is gratifying to many friends he commands all over the county.

Of a strict business integrity, and excellent judgment, Mr. Register ranks high among the commercial representatives of Bulloch county. He has a comfortable home near Statesboro.

WILLIAM AUGUSTUS SMITH, a large manufacturer of naval stores at Nellwood, is a native of North Carolina, and was born Dec. 16, 1854, in Cumberland county. He was the son of John Henry and Eugenia Smith, the father being one of the biggest producers of turpentine in the "tar heel" state. William was the eldest of four children. He attended the schools of Cumberland county until he was seventeen years old, when he commenced farming for himself. In 1879 he moved to Camden county, Ga., to engage in the manufacture of naval stores. After a prosperous business of four years he moved to Worth county, where he operated for two years and then went to Effingham county. From there he went to Liberty county, and to Bulloch county in 1892. His business has developed rapidly since his advent in this county, and he now manufactures 1,200 barrels of spirits and 3,500 barrels of resin per annum. He employs 100 hands and operates thirty-four crops. Mr. Smith gives the work his personal attention, and possessing all the qualifications of a thorough business man, his great success is easily understood. He was married to Miss Mittie Wornell, daughter of J. S. Wornell, a prominent planter of Liberty county, April 5, 1894. They have one child, W. A. Mr. Smith and wife are members of the Methodist church. They reside in a handsome home near the works. When Mr. Smith came to Georgia he had a capital of $12, but any amount of pluck. By his energy and industry he has amassed much property and is regarded as a wealthy man.

BENJAMIN E. TURNER, real estate dealer, Statesboro, was born Aug. 22, 1849, in Bulloch county, and is the son of Isaac and Loveday Turner. The father was a prosperous farmer, and both parents were zealous members of the Primitive Baptist church, the father being a deacon in the church for years. They reared eleven children, of whom Benjamin was the tenth child born. He attended the schools of Bulloch and Emanuel counties and when twenty-three years old commenced farming for himself and has been engaged in that vocation all his life. He was first married on Feb. 22, 1885, to Miss Georgia R. Rogers, daughter of Thomas L. Rogers, of Marion county. She died fourteen months after her marriage, and Mr. Turner was wedded the second time on Jan. 22, 1888, to Miss Maggie C. Hall, daughter of Capt. W. N. Hall of Bulloch county. They have three children: Henry Grady, Georgia Rebecca, Mattie Luro. Benjamin Turner is a steward and trustee in the Statesboro Methodist church. He was for thirteen years postmaster of that town, and has served on the town council. He moved there in 1880 and has been an active spirit in building up the town. He donated a part of the fund raised for building the new $18,000 court house, and was on the building committee which had charge of its construction. Mr. Turner is in the real estate business, but most of his time is taken up in directing the working of his fine farm. He is at this time perhaps the largest planter in Bulloch county. He has been very active in the cause of temperance and is an untiring worker in the Sunday school field. He was co-editor and one of the publishers of a music book entitled, The Olive Leaf. This publication was issued May 22, 1874, and became very popular. Mr. Turner traveled for several years in pushing its sale, which finally ran up into the tens of thousands, bringing big financial returns to the authors. Mrs. Turner is an amiable and talented woman, and a consistent member of the Methodist church. There is perhaps no one who has contributed more to the growth and prosperity of Statesboro, or who takes more interest in the town's development and improvement than Mr. Turner, who enjoys the respect and esteem of everyone.

JOHN GARRETT WILLIAMS, farmer, Jimps, was born in Bulloch county and is the son of William W. Williams, a farmer, honored citizen and brave soldier. The father was one of the first in the county to respond to the call of the Confederacy and enlisted in the army in the early part of the war. He was captain in the Forty-seventh Georgia regiment, and was killed in the battle of James Island, S. C., in June, 1862, in his first regular engagement. The mother, Roxa Annie Williams, was left with eight children, of whom John was the eldest, but with the aid of that noble boy she was able to take hold of the farm and successfully rear the little ones. Hardly sixteen years of age he took the place of the father, and grandly did he discharge the responsibilities placed upon him. He was too busy to get such an education as he desired, but by snatching a few months of schooling at the country seats of learning, and reading after the day's work was done, he was able to acquire much learning and profitable information. He has been engaged in farming all his life, and now in addition to that pursuit operates a big saw mill. He was elected treasurer of the county in 1878, and re-elected successively till 1886. His administration of the office and handling of the people's money were first class, and he retired from the office with the good wishes of everybody, irrespective of party. Mr. Williams was married Jan. 2, 1873, to Miss Macy Ann Kennedy, daughter of Edmund Kennedy of Bulloch county. There were born to them two children, one of whom, William Wiley, is living. The wife died Aug. 30, 1875, and Mr. Williams was married the second time on Feb. 15, 1877, to Miss Sarah E. Lee, daughter of William Lee. The result of this marriage is four living children: Oscar, Lonnie, Charlie and Sallie. Sarah E. Williams died Nov. 13, 1885, and the husband was the last time wedded to Miss Florence E. Bird, daughter of W. J. Bird of Bulloch county. This event occurred Aug. 12, 1889. They have two children, Charlotte and Rupert. Mr. Williams by hard work and good management has accumulated a fine property. He owns several good farms and his home is a substantial dwelling near Jimps. He is one of the best farmers in Bulloch county, and is a man of strict integrity, whose word is as good as his bond. He has always been a democrat in politics and has done valuable work for his party in Bulloch county. Mr. Williams had four brothers and three sisters, all living except the youngest. They were as follows: America, married Z. T. De Gooch of Bulloch county; Sarah E., married to A. J. Bird of Bulloch county; James J., married Mary Lee; Georgia Ann, married to Dr. D. E. Gay of Emanuel county; Rodolphus; A. T.; and William Wiley, who married Laura Dekle of Emanuel county and lives at Excelsior.

BURKE COUNTY.

S. H. BUXTON. One of the oldest native residents of Burke county is S. H. Buxton. It was in 1813 when he first saw the light of day, and more than four-score years have now passed over his head as a citizen of the county and state. His father was William Buxton, and his mother Rebecca Heath. William Buxton was born in 1791 and was a large farmer, living all his life and dying in Burke county. His wife was a daughter of Jordan and Christiana (Wimberly) Heath. The father was a native of South Carolina and came to Georgia at an early day. He was a revolutionary soldier and was wounded at Charleston.

Samuel Buxton, grandfather of Mr. S. H. Buxton, was a Virginian and came to Georgia just after the revolutionary war, when he married Nancy Plummer. Mr. S. H. Buxton attended the old log cabin schools, and received instruction from private tutors, and for several years after reaching manhood taught school. In 1841 he married Elizabeth Godbee, daughter of James and Martha (Mulkey) Godbee. Mr. Godbee was a native of Burke county and a highly esteemed citizen. To this union three children were born, now living: Lenora, Samuel D., and Green C. The mother was born in Burke county in 1817 and died in 1858. She was an honored Christian lady, belonging to the Methodist church. In 1862 Mr. Buxton married Josephine Dixon, a daughter of Robert J. and Rosanna (Hurst) Dixon. Mr. Dixon was an old resident of Burke county and a well known citizen. By the second marriage Mr. Buxton has eight children living: William R., Glover B., Charles W., Joseph J., Preston B., Edna, Thomas P., and Judith P. B. The mother was born in Burke county in 1842. Husband and wife are members of the Methodist church. Mr. Buxton has always been a farmer, and had the accumulation of the first half century of his life swept away by the war. But with "never-say-die" pluck he jumped into active life again and has builded up his fortune. In 1869 he engaged in the mercantile business with his brother and the same was continued until 1895. He owns about 1,600 acres of land near Girard, and is one of the most highly respected citizens of the county.

NEEDHAM A. BUXTON, merchant and farmer, Girard, Ga., was born in Burke county in 1835, and is the son of William and Mary (Wimberly) Buxton, and the grandson of Samuel Buxton. His mother was a daughter of Needham Wimberly, a successful farmer and native of Burke county, but a man who did not own any slaves, though operating a large estate. Receiving a good common-school education, the subject of this sketch studied assiduously and fitted himself for teaching, a vocation he followed for ten years. In 1864 he enlisted in the state militia and was engaged in the battles of Atlanta and Griswoldville. In 1875 he married Anna E. Oliver, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth (Mims) Oliver. Mr. Oliver now lives in Screven county and is a leading citizen there. This union was blessed by the birth of two children now living: William O. and Julian A. The mother was born in Screven county in 1848, and died in 1878. She was a member of the Methodist church south, as is her husband now. He belongs to the masonic order and in 1889 represented Burke county in the legislature, serving with credit to himself on the following committees: Banks, manufacturing, lunatic asylum and agriculture. Upon his return from the war Mr. Buxton began teaching school, but in a few years he engaged in a mercantile business and farming. For twenty-five years he was in partnership with his brother, Samuel H. Buxton. He is at present in business for himself. Mr. Buxton is a man of strict integrity, and his word is as good as his bond. His business career has been as honorable as it has been fortunate.

E. H. CALLAWAY. In 1784 John Callaway, of North Carolina, moved to Georgia, and selecting a farm in Wilkes county, began his new life amidst the rugged surroundings of the sparsely settled country. He was from old Virginia stock, whose blood is found in the pioneers of every old state. His youngest son, Enoch, was born soon after the father came to Georgia, in 1792. He was a self-educated man and distinguished as a Baptist minister, preaching in the churches of Wilkes county. He was a large land-owner and a thrifty farmer, and married Martha Reeves, who came from South Carolina. Their youngest son is Rev. Brantley M. Callaway, D. D., a Baptist minister, who is still living and is now preaching in Wilkes county to some of the same churches where he commenced his ministerial career. He early decided upon the ministry as his profession and was given a good education. He went through the junior class at Mercer university, and after teaching school at Gainesville for a year, entered the pulpit and has since preached the gospel of the Baptist faith. He is also a large farmer and a trustee of Mercer university for the past fifteen years. He married Lucy B., daughter of Robert and Mary (Glenn) Howard, Robert Howard being a farmer of Oglethorpe county. Mr. E. H. Callaway, judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit, was born in Wilkes county in 1862, and is the son of Rev. Brantley M. and Lucy B. Callaway. He attended the country schools in his youth and was graduated from the state university in 1881. He taught school in Waynesboro, Wilkes Co., and in Washington from 1881 to 1884. He entered the law office of W. M. and M. P. Reese in January, 1885, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of the same year. He then moved to Waynesboro, Burke Co., and began the practice of his profession. In 1888 he was married to Mary E. Jones, daughter of Maj. George and Kate (Calhoun) Jones. Maj. Jones was born in Twiggs county and moved to Houston when a boy, from thence to Macon, where he was educated. In 1861 he enlisted in the civil war from Alabama, where he had taken up his residence in 1858. He attended the inauguration of President Davis in the carriage containing the president, Hon. Alex. Stephens and Dr. Manly, and is now the only surviving one of the four. He was in the regular service for twelve months, when he was taken to the war department and made adjutant of the department. He entered the army as lieutenant of Company F, Twelfth Alabama regiment. After the war closed he returned to Alabama and lived there until 1870. His wife, Kate Calhoun, was a native of South Carolina and a niece of John C. Calhoun. Maj. Jones was a son of John Jones, a prominent farmer of Burke county, and his mother, Sarah Wimberly, was a daughter of Ezekiah Wimberly, who was a native of Twiggs county, Ga. Mr. Wimberly was a colonel in the war of 1812 and his father was a North Carolina revolutionary soldier. To Mr. and Mrs. Judge Callaway were born two children, both of whom are living: Catherine and Brantley. The mother was born in Alabama. He served one term, and though a youthful legislator, was placed on the following important committees: Special judiciary, general judiciary, joint committee on railroad and penitentiary. In 1894 he was elected judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit. Judge Callaway is the youngest circuit judge in the state, and his brilliant career at the bar promises to be more distinguished on the bench.

W. J. HERRINGTON. The Herrington family furnishes many a prominent figure in the state's history, and many good citizens to Burke county. About 1790 Richard Herrington, a native of North Carolina, moved to Georgia and took up a farm in Screven county. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, of thrifty and industrious habits, and became very wealthy. He was a son of Martin, who received the bulk of his estate on the father's death, and with the same wise management increased the wealth to $500,000. He was born in Screven county, but moved to Burke county, where he died. He married Nancy Miller, and a son, Archibald M., was born to them. He too was a large slave-owner and extensive planter of Burke county. He was married to Martha, daughter of Seaborn and Eliza Ann (Lane) Johnston, natives of Emanuel county, and the father was a wealthy planter. To Archibald Herrington and wife were born, among other children, W. J. Herrington, a farmer living near Hillis. He was just sixteen years old in 1861, when he left the farm and country school to enlist in the war. He joined Company D, Fifth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Joseph Showmate, and later Frank Godbee. He fought in a number of sharp engagements and severe battles. He was in the front of Sherman's army on the road to Savannah, at Rivers bridge, Ablesboro and Bentonville, and remained in the army until the close of the war. In 1869, after he had taken up the farmer life again, he married Emily Lovett, daughter of J. C. and Amelia (Oliver) Lovett. The father was a native of Screven county and was a government agent during the late war, now being a resident of Burke county. Mrs. Herrington was born in Screven county in 1845, and died in 1875, leaving one child, a son, Archibald. In 1876 Mr. Herrington married Jennie Lovett, a sister of his first wife. She was born in 1861. They have two children living—Hattie and Atticus. They are both members of the Methodist church, and Mr. Herrington belongs to the Masonic order. In 1890 Mr. Herrington was elected to the legislature and served one term, being placed on the railroad, general agriculture, special judiciary and banking committees. C. W. HURST, sheriff of Burke county, was born in the county he now so efficiently serves in 1851. He descended from a North Carolina family, represented by John Hurst, a native of that state, who when a young man married Elizabeth Blich and came to Georgia. He was in active service from the first to the last, and was in many hard-fought battles, including the seven-days' fight about Richmond. In 1861 he married B. J., a daughter of John and Mary A. (McBride) Rollins. Mr. Rollins was born and reared in Burke county, and one of its leading planters. He was the son of William Rollins, a native of North Carolina, and grandson of Raleigh Rollins, of Scotch-Irish parentage. Raleigh Rollins came to America with Sir Walter Raleigh when a boy and settled near where Raleigh, N. C., now stands. Thomas A. McBride, the grandfather of Mrs. Johnson, was a native of Scotland and moved to America and settled in Georgia. Mrs. Johnson's great maternal grandfather, William Pugh, was in the revolutionary army and was captain of scouts, and was descended from a very old family in Wales. One child, Martin, has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. Both husband and wife are members of the Presbyterian church. In 1857 Mr. Johnson began to read medicine under Dr. W. L. M. Harris, and then attended lectures at the Augusta Medical college, where he was graduated in 1859. He located in Burke county, and has attained a very large practice. He ranks high in his profession, and his skill and great learning are recognized by his fellow physicians as well as the public. Dr. Johnson lives on a fine farm of 3,000 acres located near Oatts.

JONES. The Jones family, well represented in the early civil and military history of Burke county, still has representatives in J. B. Jones and H. W. Jones, farmers, near Herndon, Ga., natives of the county, born respectively in 1817 and 1824. They are the only surviving sons of Henry P. Jones, a popular, leading citizen of his day, who by wonderful industry and judicious energy accumulated and left to four sons and three daughters an estate of $350,000, embracing 75,000 acres of land in different sections of the state. H. P. Jones was a native also of Burke county, born in 1788, was an only son of Philip Jones, and was a colonel in the war of 1812. Philip Jones was born in 1759, and with his three older brothers, Frank, John and James, were soldiers in the American army in the war of independence. He owned and resided on the farm given him by his father, embracing the land which in the hands of his son, H. P. Jones, became the noted Birdsville estate, still in the ownership and possession of his great-grandsons. Even in that early day Burke county, with its immense agricultural resources, was a county of considerable wealth, and therefore an inviting booty-land to the Tories, who with squads of soldiers from the British forces, then in possession of Savannah and adjacent sections, often formed raiding parties for plundering the counties above Savannah. They went up as far as Burke, which became the meeting-point and battleground, where these raiders were met by the "liberty" men, as they were called, or rebels, from the counties and sections above, who, hastily organizing, would drive the raiders back. On one of such occasions Philip Jones was on a scout with one of his slaves, named Caesar, near his mill, when suddenly he was surprised by three British soldiers and captured. The soldiers disarmed him and bound his arms, giving his rifle and their own to Caesar to carry, and, with their prisoners, began their march along the mill-dam, which yet stands. Two soldiers in advance, Caesar following, and his master next, and the third soldier in the rear as guard. Faithful Caesar was quick to see the opportunity to release his master and himself, and as quickly aiming with his rifle at the back seam of the coat of the soldier ahead of him, shot him through, and wheeling instantly, with his knife cut the cords from his master's arms, and gave him his rifle. Thus suddenly was changed the fortunes of war, and Philip Jones and his slave became the captors, and promptly began their march with their prisoners to the headquarters of the American forces at Augusta. For this daring, successful feat, Caesar was granted his freedom by his master, and for the remainder of his life was honored with the title of "Rebel Caesar." The three elder brothers of Philip Jones, before named, were citizens and residents of Screven county, from which they joined the American army. The ancestral head of the family, Frank Jones, immigrated from Wales in the early part of the eighteenth century to the Carolinas, where he resided a good many years, the head of a large family. In the latter part of his life, impelled by the same spirit of adventure which brought him from his native country, and realizing the necessity of larger advantages for his growing household than he possessed, he moved, with his four sons, Frank, who bore the ancestral name, John, James and Philip, some years before the revolution, to Screven county, locating in the southern portion of it, near where is now the line of the Central railroad, and not far from the point called Cameron, which near three-quarters of a century afterward became the home of one of his great-granddaughters. The opening of the war found the progenitor of a vast colony of descendants failing under the weight of many years and heavy hardships, which had not abated the ardor of his love for his country, and surrounded with sons full of the fire of patriotism and spirit of resistance to the oppression of the British crown, they were quick to espouse the cause of their country, for liberty, life and home. Tradition in the family testifies to the faithful service of those brothers, especially as to John, how that with emaciated person and otherwise unlike himself, he was slow to be recognized by the home folks on his return from the war. They lived many years to enjoy the rights of liberty which they aided to secure; accumulated considerable estates and reared large families, except Frank, who had none. The descendants of John and James are very numerous and are to be found in several counties in southeast Georgia, especially Thomas and counties adjoining, with a few in Savannah.

R. T. JONES, retired farmer, Waynesboro, was born in Burke county in 1825, and was the son of J. M. and Sarah E. (Thomas) Jones. The union has been blessed with three children, now living—Lindsey E., Bessie and Lula. The mother was born in 1827 and died in 1874. Mr. Jones was married the second time to Aurelia Cox, formerly a Miss Holcomb, daughter of William Holcomb, a native of Connecticut, who came to Georgia in 1838. Mr. Holcomb served in the late war and died in prison. The fruits of the second marriage are: Robert P. and Thomas D. Jones. The mother was born in Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., in 1840. Both Mr. Jones and his wife are firm members of the church, the wife being of the Methodist belief and he of the Baptist faith. During the war Mr. Jones was elected justice of the inferior court. The mother, Mary Flournoy, was a daughter of Josiah Flournoy. To Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Jones were born children, of whom only Seaborn H. and Mary T. are living. Mrs. Jones was born in Putnam county in 1829. They are both members of the Methodist church. In 1859 Mr. Jones was elected to congress, and served one term, returning home, as Georgia seceded from the Union. He served a short time as captain of Jones' hussars, mounted infantry. Howell Cobb was the major-general, and Henry R. Jackson was brigadier-general. He was also made colonel of Gov. Brown's staff, and was on the staff at the close of the war. Mr. Jones is one of the leading lawyers of eastern Georgia and enjoys a large practice in Burke and adjoining counties. He is also interested in farming, owning a fine estate of 3,000 acres. Of all the Georgia members of congress who were in congress with Mr. Jones, he is the lone survivor. The deceased embrace noted figures in Georgia history, viz.: Robert Toombs, Alfred Iverson, senators; James Jackson, M. J. Crawford, John W. H. Underwood, Lucius J. Gartrell, Joshua Hill, Thomas Hardeman and Peter Love, congressmen.

He is a Mason of many years. When the war closed Mr. McElmurray found himself without any means and started out in life with only his energy and push for capital. He now owns about 2,000 acres of good farming land and valuable town property.

JOHN F. McELMURRAY, member of the legislature and farmer, was born in Burke county, in 1842, and is the son of Minis H. and Emily (Leslie) McElmurray. The father was born in South Carolina and moved to Georgia in 1834. He was the son of Andrew and Mary (Hankinson) McElmurray. Mr. McElmurray's mother was a daughter of William L. and Sarah (Hankinson) Leslie. Mr. J. F. McElmurray was educated at Mercer university and in 1861 he enlisted in the late war with Company K, Thirty-second Georgia regiment. He served as captain in the company and fought at Fort Sumter; John's Island; Rivers Bridge; Ocean Pond, Fla.; Averbosboro and Bentonville, and served to the close of hostilities. In 1865 he married Anna Shewmake, daughter of Judge Joseph A. and Caroline (Hankinson) Shewmake. Judge Shewmake was a native of Burke county and occupied a seat on the bench of the inferior court, and was a member of the legislature from Burke county for years. He was a first sergeant in the Indian war, and in politics and as a citizen was one of the most prominent men ever born in Burke county. Mr. and Mrs. McElmurray have six living children: Leslie, Caroline, Lorraine, Thomas J., John F., Jr., Sarah. The mother was born in 1842 and died in 1881. She was a member of the Methodist church, while her husband's faith is that of a Baptist. Mr. McElmurray was a justice of the peace for several years, and is a member of the county school board. In 1894 he was elected to the legislature and served on the committees on temperance, special, agriculture and manufactures, education and school for the deaf. Mr. McElmurray owns a nice farm of 2,000 acres near Alexander, and is a citizen highly esteemed not only for his public usefulness, but private character.

DR. A. G. WHITEHEAD. One of the most elegant gentlemen in Georgia is Dr. A. G. Whitehead of Waynesboro, and he is one of the most accomplished physicians as well. Having everything in the way of family prestige to sustain him, he was fitted by birth and education to occupy a prominent position among the most cultured. The doctor is a member of a family of Scotch Presbyterians, who refuged to north Ireland in the seventeenth century on account of religious troubles. Of this family, William Whitehead emigrated to America in 1700, settling in Virginia—three of his grandsons moving to Burke county in 1764. These bought largely of lands and ranked among the wealthy, solid people of that day. The names of these early settlers were John, Amos and Caleb. John owned a place widely known as "Spread Oak Plantation." In the old family mansion that stood upon this place were born three generations of children. A. Grattan Whitehead was born Feb. 14, 1841; reared on this plantation, sent to the state university at the age of thirteen, graduating at nineteen. His mother, Mary Ann Dent, being the daughter of Dr. John Dent, founder of the Georgia Medical college, possibly furnished the doctor with a desire for medical prominence, and accordingly he read medicine under Dr. H. F. Campbell, of Augusta, took one course of lectures at that place, when the war began, he enlisting with the Clinch rifles, Company A, Fifth Georgia, serving one year, after which he was appointed aid-de-camp to Gen. Montgomery Gardner, and at the close of the war was commanding a battery of artillery. After the war he completed his medical course, going to Waynesboro in 1866, where he has since lived, enjoying prominence in his profession, and gaining decided reputation as a careful and competent business man. He still manifests a great interest in agricultural pursuits, while pursuing a lucrative practice, owning 1,000 acres of land in Burke county, besides his large local interests, consisting of choice building lots and residences. Dr. Whitehead is not only one of the most prominent members of his profession in Georgia, having been president of the State Medical association, but is one of the most cultured and hospitable gentlemen. He takes a great interest in fraternal orders, being prominently identified with the Masons, Knights of Honor, American Legion of Honor, Home Circle, Royal Arcanum and Golden Chain.

CHATHAM COUNTY.

MR. D. C. BACON, president of the Atlanta Lumber company, is a native of Liberty county, Ga., being born in 1845, and passed the first five years of his life in this vicinity, removing thereafter to Savannah, Ga. At the age of fifteen he entered the Confederate army, enlisting in Company B of the Eighth Georgia regiment as a private soldier, and served as such until wounded in the battle of Gettysburg. By reason of this accident he was captured and held a prisoner in the custody of the enemy for six weeks, and finally exchanged during a cartel. After recovering from the effects of his injuries he became a member of the secret service of the Confederate government as a telegrapher and signal officer. Mr. Bacon participated in the following engagements: Yorktown, Va.; seven days' fight around Richmond, Thoroughfare Gap, Second Manassas, Chantilly, South Mountain, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg and Gettysburg. His record was that of a brave, chivalric soldier and his gallant deeds are not unknown. After the close of the war Mr. Bacon went to Savannah and entered the lumber business, with which he is now so prominently identified. Though his life has been devoted to and absorbed in the lumber traffic, nevertheless he has found time to serve his state as wisely in peace as he defended her bravely in war. During 1880-81 he represented the county of Chatham in the state legislature, and in 1884 was appointed commissioner to the New Orleans exposition. There he made a superb exhibit of Georgia woods that attracted great attention and received much merited praise. It was a magnificent display of the piney woods products. Mr. Bacon has an interesting family about him—a household of boys who give promise of future eminence. He was first married in 1868 to Miss Minna Holcomb, who died, leaving two sons: De Witt and Holcomb. He was again married in 1878 to a half-sister of his first wife, a Miss Holcomb. She has borne one child, Milton. Mr. Bacon, besides filling the presidency of the Atlanta Lumber company is also president of the Piedmont Investment company of Atlanta and president of the De Witt Farming company of Mitchell county, Ga. The last is an immense industry, comprising about 5,000 acres of land, on which are planted 20,000 peach trees, 1,500 pecan trees and 3,000 pear trees. This does not include the enormous growth of cotton and the raising of hogs and vegetables. These facts plainly indicate that Mr. Bacon inherits the tastes and inclinations of the ante-bellum southern planter, a generous, open-hearted race. He is a member of the Capital City club of Atlanta and enjoys an evening where friendship and mirth join hands to lighten the tedium of the day's anxieties. Mr. Bacon is a citizen of Savannah, but feels a deep interest in Atlanta and strives unceasingly for her advancement.

WILLIAM STARR BASINGER, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Thomas E. and Jane (Starr) Basinger, was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., in 1827. His father was born and educated in Savannah, became one of the city's most prominent merchants, and died in 1836. Mr. Basinger's mother—born in Savannah in 1804—yet survives, and makes her home with him. They were the parents of two children: William Starr and Elizabeth, unmarried. Maj. Basinger grew up and received his primary and preparatory education in Savannah, after which he entered the university of Georgia, from which he graduated in 1846 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and later received the degree of arts master. Returning to Savannah, he studied law under the distinguished John E. Ward, who was afterward minister to China during President Buchanan's administration, and who is now a practicing lawyer in New York city. In 1849 he was admitted to the bar, and rose rapidly in his profession. About 1855 he entered into a partnership with Gen. A. R. Lawton, which continued until January, 1861. He was with the troops which captured Fort Pulaski soon after the passage of the ordinance of secession. Years before he had become an active member of the Savannah Volunteer guards, of which in 1861 he was a lieutenant. In 1861, when it entered the Confederate service, it was so large that it had to be organized into a battalion and he was promoted into a captaincy. In 1863 he was commissioned major of the battalion, and commanded it until the close of the war. He saw much arduous and hazardous service, and gallantly participated in many battles. At Battery Wagner, in 1863, he was ordered to Sullivan's Island, of which he was in command in May, 1864. He was then ordered to join the army of northern Virginia, and was placed in command of all troops along the line of the Richmond & Danville railway from Richmond to Staunton river, where he did faithful and effective service. In October, 1864, he was sent to Chapin's Bluff, Va., where he was on the line facing the enemy. From there he was on the retreat and participated in the battle of Sailor's Creek, where he was captured and sent first to Old Capitol prison and afterward to Johnson's Island, where he was held until July 25, 1865. Accepting transportation furnished by the government, he returned to Savannah, where he and Gen. Lawton resumed the practice of law, receiving Gen. Henry R. Jackson as a partner, under the firm name of Jackson, Lawton & Basinger. This firm was continued from 1866 to 1881, since which time Maj. Basinger has practiced alone. In 1885 his wife's health necessitated his removal to Dahlonaga, Ga., and the following year (1886) in compliance with the request of the trustees of the university, he accepted the presidency of the North Georgia Agricultural college, a branch of the university of Georgia. He held this position seven years, not, however, relinquishing his law practice. In May, 1894, he removed to Athens for the purpose of placing his sons in the university, where he still ardently pursues his profession. Of conspicuous ability, of scholarly attainments, and learned in the law, he stands high with the profession, and has the confidence of the people. During his residence in Savannah he served several times as a member of the city council and in 1881 represented Chatham county in the general assembly. While in that body he served with special efficiency as chairman of the committee on banks, vice-chairman of the committee on military affairs, and as a member of the committees on general judiciary and corporations. He did not occupy the floor much as a speech-maker, but when he addressed the house he was dignified, and what he said was to the point and practical. In 1882 he was a candidate for associate justice of the supreme court of Georgia, but was defeated. Maj. Basinger was married in Prince Edward county, Va., in 1866, to Miss Margaret R., daughter of James M. Garnett, and of the children born to them six are living: Margaret A., wife of Prof. Charles M. Strahan, Athens, Ga.; James Garnett, New York; William S., Jr., Kansas City, Mo.; Mary Leslie, wife of Lieut. Edward P. Lawton, Nineteenth United States infantry, and Thomas and Walter G., who are students of the university of Georgia at Athens. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

THOMAS BARROW was born in England about the year 1640, and migrated to Virginia before he was twenty years of age. He first settled in what was then known as the northern neck of Virginia, and went to work on a tobacco plantation. He married, and subsequently moved to what is now Southampton county, Va., where he bought a place on the Nottaway river, upon which he spent the remainder of his life. He lived to be ninety-five years of age. His son, Thomas Barrow, was born at this place, in Southampton county, Va. He married Elizabeth Atkinson. He subsequently removed to Edgecombe county, N. C., where he lived until his death. James Barrow, his youngest son, was born Jan. 31, 1757, upon his father's place in Edgecombe county, N. C. Upon the breaking out of the revolutionary war James Barrow, although not fully grown, enlisted in the continental army. He served at Savannah, Ga., in New York, and in Pennsylvania, and in other parts of the country. He was one of those who remained through the winter at Valley Forge. He was in the battles of Germantown and Brandywine, and many other conflicts during that war. When the war was over he moved to Georgia, bought a place, and settled on Bark Camp creek, in what was then Burke, now Screven, county. He subsequently removed to Hancock county, and finally settled in Baldwin county, Ga., where he spent the remainder of his days. He married late in life Patience Crenshaw, whose parents came from Virginia to Georgia. As was evidenced by his conduct during the war of the revolution, he was a man of great determination of character. He died in his seventy-third year at his home in Milledgeville, Ga. David Crenshaw Barrow, only son of James Barrow, was born on his father's plantation, near Milledgeville, July 26, 1815. He married Sarah Eliza Pope. Her father was Middleton Pope, and her grandfather Henry Augustine Pope, both of Oglethorpe county, Ga. Her mother was Lucy Hopson Lumpkin, who was a daughter of Gov. Wilson Lumpkin of Georgia. David Crenshaw Barrow was educated at Harvard university, Mass., and almost immediately after his return home from college volunteered as a private in the Macon volunteers in the Seminole Indian war. He represented the county of Oglethorpe in the legislature of Georgia, and was for many years one of the trustees of the university of Georgia. Pope Barrow, eldest son of David Crenshaw Barrow, was born Aug. 1, 1839, in Oglethorpe county, Ga., on the plantation of his grandfather, Middleton Pope. He was prepared for college there under tutors, and was graduated from the university of Georgia, receiving his final diploma from the law department in 1860. In April, 1861, he entered the Confederate army as second lieutenant in the Troup artillery, and served as such one year at Savannah, in northwestern Virginia, and on the peninsula, and during McClellan's advance on Richmond in 1862. He was then appointed aid-de-camp on the staff of Maj.-Gen. Howell Cobb, in which capacity he served until he was taken a prisoner in the spring of 1865. Upon being paroled, after a short residence in Oglethorpe county, he entered upon the practice of his profession of law at Athens, Ga., where he remained until 1892, when he removed to Savannah, where he now lives. He is engaged in the active practice of his profession of the law. He was elected a member of the constitutional convention of the state of Georgia, of 1877, of the general assembly of Georgia of 1880 and 1881, and was elected by the legislature of Georgia in 1882 to the United States senate to fill the unexpired term of Hon. Benjamin H. Hill, deceased. He was a delegate from the state at large and chairman of the Georgia delegation in the national democratic convention at St. Louis in 1888. He was president of the state democratic convention of Georgia in 1892. He has served two terms as trustee of the university of Georgia, and was president of the Northeastern railroad of Georgia from 1884 to 1891. He has been twice married, first to Sarah Church Craig, daughter of Lieut.-Col. Lewis Stevenson Craig, of the United States army. Her mother was Elizabeth Church, daughter of Dr. Alonzo Church, president of the university of Georgia. She died Dec. 28, 1881, leaving six children, Pope, Elizabeth, Church, James, David Crenshaw and Craig. June 24, 1884, he was married to Cornelia Augusta Jackson, only daughter of Mr. Henry R. Jackson, of Savannah, Ga. Her mother was Cornelia Davenport. Of this marriage there are four daughters, Florence Barclay, Lucy Lumpkin, Patience Crenshaw and Sarah Pope.

BISHOP JOHN W. BECKWITH, D. D. In the vigor of his massive intellect, the strength and beauty of his fervid diction, the power of his matchless oratory, the vastness of his theological attainments, the dignity of his commanding presence and the purity of his exalted life, the late lamented Bishop John W. Beckwith, of the diocese of Georgia, has never been surpassed, and in many of these respects has never had an equal. Bishop Beckwith was a prince of orators. He possessed every qualification that was needed to sway the hearts of men. His voice could assume at will the majestic cadence of the ocean and the tender melody of a maiden's song. Back of this the machinery of a great mind operated with lightning rapidity, and gave to his words a mental, as well as a physical, grandeur of utterance. Fashioned in the prodigality of nature, with a massive head surmounting a pair of broad shoulders that might have carried the weight of four score years without bending, had Providence seen fit to grant him that patriarchal limit, it seemed that Bishop Beckwith would survive his contemporaries in the ministry and that many years of brilliant service lay before him. In an unexpected hour, however, the brilliant sun of his career was darkened, and this radiant luminary of the church was blotted from the intellectual heavens in the full-orbed splendor of its meridian. As the successor of Bishop Elliot, one of the grandest and saintliest men who ever donned the priestly robes, Bishop Beckwith assumed the mantle of this holy man with a consecrated spirit of devotion to the church, looking to a higher source than himself and to a stronger arm than his own for wisdom and guidance. Under the administration of Bishop Beckwith, the Episcopal church continued to prosper, in both temporal and spiritual measures, as under his predecessor, and no diocese in the land was better illustrated in its governing councils than the one over which Bishop Beckwith presided, with the grace and dignity peculiar to that noble man of God. Bishop John Watrous Beckwith, the subject of this sketch, was born in the state of North Carolina on Feb. 9, 1831. His father, Dr. John Beckwith, was a physician of great usefulness and one of the most distinguished members of his profession in North Carolina. His mother, whose maiden name was Margaret Stanley, of Newberne, N. C., was a lady of marked personal beauty and sweet amiability of spirit. Bishop Beckwith's father came to North Carolina from Poughkeepsie, N. Y. On his father's side he was a lineal descendant of Robert Bruce, of Scotland; on his mother's, of the Earl Derby. His ancestors were mostly all of Scotch nativity, and the vigorous characteristics of the stock asserted themselves constantly in his own rugged and fearless character. Both his own family and the one into which he married ranked high among the influential households of North Carolina, distinguished alike for their intellectual members, and for their social refinement and purity. Gov. Stanley, of North Carolina, was a brother of Bishop Beckwith's mother; and Hon. George E. Badger, one of the most distinguished citizens of the state, her nephew. Until twelve years of age the boyhood of the subject of this sketch was spent in the neighborhood of Raleigh, N. C., under the jealous guardianship of his watchful parents. He then moved with the family to Petersburg, Va. Here he received his early training and by diligent application to his books gave hint of those brilliant gifts that were destined to lead him into the Christian ministry, and characterize him as bishop of the diocese of Georgia. After receiving his primary education from the schools of Petersburg, he entered Trinity college, located in Hartford, Conn. Graduating from this institution and also from the school of divinity, he was ordained as a deacon on May 24, 1854, and was subsequently admitted to the priesthood in the spring of the following year. The young minister assumed charge of his first parish at Wadesboro, N. C., in his native state. From this place he next went to Maryland to accept the call of a parish in Anne Arundel county in that state. Here he made the acquaintance of his future wife, Miss Ella Brockenbrough, the daughter of John Fauntleroy Brockenbrough, of Westmoreland county, Va., whose wife was Miss Frances Carter. Espousing the heart of this beautiful lady, the suit of the young minister was accepted and they were shortly afterward married. Their first child was born to them during their residence in this parish. At the breaking out of the war the subject of this sketch, who was intensely southern in his feelings and convictions, entered the Confederate army as chaplain on the staff of Gen. Hardee, and subsequently on the staff of Gen. Polk, bishop of Louisiana. For a short while during the war he served the parish at Demopolis, Ala. After the war he settled in New Orleans, La., having been made rector of Trinity church in the spring of 1865. Having no clerical garb to wear, on account of the poverty to which the parish was rendered by the depredations of the war, the young clergyman appeared before his congregation for several months in his military attire. It was not inappropriate to wear, even in the pulpit, the uniform in which he had served God on the battlefield and ministered to the spiritual needs of the wounded and the dying. The church to which the future bishop was called was one of the largest Episcopal churches south of Baltimore. He served the parish for three years, preaching with marvelous eloquence to large congregations that flocked to hear him. In 1868 he accepted the call of the Georgia diocese and became a citizen of the state. He was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Georgia on April 2, 1868, succeeding Bishop Stephen Elliot, of whom mention has already been made. During the first two years of his service Bishop Beckwith resided in Macon. He thence moved to Savannah, Ga., residing in that city for four years. In the fall of 1876, after a brief residence in Marietta, the bishop made his home in Atlanta, and continued to live in that city until the time of his death, which occurred on Nov. 23, 1890. Shortly after his removal to Atlanta, on April 26, 1877, the bishop lost his beloved wife. Three children were born to Bishop and Mrs. Beckwith: J. F. B. Beckwith of Savannah, Daisy, wife of A. R. Lawton, Jr., of Savannah, and Miss Bessie Beckwith. The cause of Bishop Beckwith's death was an abscess on the face. Several operations were performed and the best of surgical skill was employed, but all effort to save the life of the bishop failed, and after weeks of painful suffering, the great and useful man of God breathed his last. The funeral services were held in St. Luke's cathedral, and the occasion was one of the most impressive and solemn ever witnessed in Georgia. Nearly all the church dignitaries of the south were present, Bishop Quintard of Tennessee, Howe of South Carolina, Weed of Florida, and Dr. Stringfellow of Alabama, and T. F. Gaylor of the university of the South, being among the number. The remains of the bishop were respectfully interred among the blossoms of Oakland cemetery. In summing up the lessons of Bishop Beckwith's life for the closing paragraph of this short biographical sketch, it may not be inappropriate to quote from the beautiful resolutions adopted by the board of curators of St. Luke's cathedral: "Duty was the watchword of his life; duty done for duty's sake. How grandly he preached on that theme! And when he walked through the fiery furnace of trial, thanks be to God, he never wavered—the fire did not scorch his garments. He was equal to his duty. He sustained the dignity of the episcopate. He rebuked the world. He upheld the born of the church, the bride of Christ."

DR. W. F. BRUNNER. In the year 1888, says "Harper's Weekly," the health officer of Savannah, a young doctor named Brunner, announced that yellow fever had appeared at Jacksonville. Florida authorities denied it, but Dr. Brunner called for a cordon of police to stop the Florida train before it should reach Savannah. The health board voted him down after a bitter debate. The railroad people were indignant. The train came in, and that night the fever was officially proclaimed epidemic in Jacksonville. Another evidence of his prescience and pluck was given in 1893, when Dr. Brunner called sharp attention to the laxity of the quarantine at Brunswick, Ga. That town broke out in clamor against Dr. Brunner, and when Surgeon Branham was sent to Brunswick and died, many people there declared Dr. Brunner was personally responsible for the yellow fever epidemic. When there was a lull in the fever in September following the sanitary board of Savannah raised the quarantine. Dr. Brunner protested. He maintained that fever had prevailed in Brunswick all the summer, that cases had been sequestered and not reported, and the event proved the truth of the position. The fever flamed up in a week and the quarantine had to be established more rigidly than before. Dr. W. F. Brunner is thirty-eight years of age. He is a native of Savannah, Ga., and attended medical lectures in that city in 1876. While still a student he encountered the yellow fever epidemic of 1878 in Savannah, and suffered from a serious illness himself. He managed, however, to visit the different hospitals, and turned up at the autopsies, where he obtained a good idea of post-mortem lesions. Such experience was more to him than lectures or diplomas. In the winter of 1876-77 he continued his studies at the medical department of the university of Georgia at Augusta, and in 1878 completed his course at the medical school of the university of the City of New York. He was just twenty-one years of age when he was engaged by the Howard association to fight the epidemic of 1878 in the Mississippi Valley. Equipped with nurses and commissariat, he started out for Vicksburg. The authorities there doubted whether a youth like Dr. Brunner could really be the yellow fever expert from Savannah. They passed him on to Meridian, where the people and nurses shook their heads. He was assigned to Lake, Miss., with his retinue. There were no critics at this place to doubt, for practically the whole population had been stricken or scattered. At Lake he began very vigorous work. At such time a physician had to be doctor, sexton and clergyman. Unshaken by the terrible scenes that met him on every hand, Dr. Brunner organized his force and concentrated his work. He impressed a church building for an orphan asylum, and opened a soup house and dispensary in the town. He worked without resting. The young physician was sorely tried. On one occasion he visited a place where the desperate head of the family had established a shot-gun quarantine at his front gate. Seizing a little child just taken with the fever, Dr. Brunner wrapped it in a buggy blanket and took it to his hospital. Once or twice he was brought into collision with the town authorities. He found one morning that his best nurse, a colored woman, had been arrested for a petty theft. He demanded her release. The mayor replied that the woman had taken a pair of scissors. Dr. Brunner retorted that if she had taken a case of scissors the people could not repay her for what she had done. The mayor was obdurate, but Dr. Brunner was determined. "Unless she is restored right away," he said, "I shall call off my nurses and close up my commissary." The woman was released. It was in 1882 that Dr. Brunner entered the service of the national board of health, and was ordered to the South Atlantic station at Sapelo Island. Afterward he became acting assistant surgeon of the Marine hospital service, continuing in this capacity until 1887. It was here that he first turned his attention to marine sanitation. He made a sanitary inspection of Florida under a commission from the State Health Protective association. In April, 1888, he was elected health officer of Savannah. His promptness, intelligence and pluck have subjected him at times to severe censure; at other times have won for him high admiration. Public estimate, regardless of abuse or eulogy, has settled down into complete confidence. As a man who guarded Savannah successfully when the epidemic had fastened upon her near neighbors, whose quarantine has been rigid, and who is as fearless and determined as a soldier, Dr. Brunner has taken front rank among sanitary officers. He is a member of the advisory council of the American Public Health association.

GEORGE TURNER CANN was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., July 22, 1866, and received his earlier education in the schools of that city. In 1882 he entered the Pennsylvania Military college at Chester and was graduated therefrom three years later with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He was the first honor man of his college, making a record of 997-10, was captain of the college base ball club, president of the athletic association, first cadet captain and president of the Y. M. law office of Denmark & Adams, and was admitted to the bar the following December. He remained with that law firm until February, 1887, then began the practice alone, which was continued until his brother, Mr. J. F. Cann, whose sketch follows, was admitted to partnership. This firm now occupies a very desirable rank among the legal fraternity of Savannah. George Turner Cann was married on Feb. 12, 1890, to Annie Stubbs (nee Goodwin), daughter of the late Theodore A. Goodwin, of Savannah. On Feb. 12, 1892, he was awarded the degree Master of Arts by the Pennsylvania military college. Mr. Cann takes a very active interest in political matters. He is also very prominently identified with the military organizations of the city of Savannah and is captain of Company C of the Savannah volunteer guards, First Battalion infantry, Georgia volunteers. He is also a member and secretary of the board of curators of Telfair Academy of Arts and Sciences, is a vestryman of St. John's Episcopal church, a member of the board of governors of the Guards' club, and of the Georgia Historical society. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the I. O. O. F., and Oglethorpe club.

JAMES FERRIS CANN, attorney, of Savannah, Ga., was born in that city on Dec. 11, 1868. His father, James F. Cann, was a native of Delaware and came to Georgia in early manhood, settled at Savannah and married Anna Sophia, daughter of Thomas M. Turner. To that marriage were born five children, three of whom survive, viz.: William G., George T. and James F. The father was not in the war between the states on account of physical disability. He was a school teacher and departed this life in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., in 1872. James Ferris Cann was reared and received his primary education in Savannah, graduating from the old Georgia Military academy of Savannah with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1886. The following year he entered the summer law school of the university of Virginia, remained one term and returned to Savannah. He was employed in the office of Denmark & Adams for the succeeding fifteen months. Mr. Cann was admitted to the bar in Savannah in January, 1889, and the following October formed a partnership with his brother, George T. Cann, which continues at this time. Mr. Cann takes no part in politics, though fully discharging his duties as a citizen. He is a member of St. John's Episcopal church, a member of the local branch of the Y. M. C. A., St. Andrew's society, the Savannah Bar Association Yacht club, the Oglethorpe club, Guards' club, Knights of Pythias and I. O. O. F. He is also secretary and attorney of the local branch of the National Railway Building and Loan association, secretary and attorney for the local branch of the Atlanta National Building and Loan association and the Southern Building and Loan association; also secretary of the Pineora Investment company, secretary and attorney of the Georgia Investment company and of the Twelfth Street Land company. He is captain of Savannah division No. 15, uniform rank, Knights of Pythias; first lieutenant Company C of Savannah Volunteer guards, First Battalion infantry, Georgia volunteers, and takes very active interest in military matters.

WALTER GLASCO CHARLTON, attorney-at-law of Savannah, Ga., is a native of that city, and was born June 5, 1851. His paternal grandfather, Thomas U. P. Charlton, was a native of the state of South Carolina, and represented the county of Chatham in the legislature of Georgia, was mayor of Savannah, judge of the superior court of the Savannah circuit, and attorney-general of Georgia. His son, Robert Milledge Charlton, the father of Walter Glasco Charlton, was born in Savannah, Ga., Jan. 19, 1807. He received a liberal education, took up law as a profession, and was admitted to the bar in 1827. In 1829 he was married to Margaret, daughter of Peter Shick, a capitalist of Savannah. At twenty-one years of age he represented the county of Chatham in the legislature of Georgia, at twenty-three was made district attorney for Georgia, was several times mayor of Savannah, and in 1835, at the age of twenty-seven, was appointed judge of the superior court for the eastern circuit of Georgia. In 1852, at the age of forty-four, he was appointed to the United States senate, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of John McPherson Berrien. He published a volume of poems in 1839, Leaves from the Portfolio of a Georgia Lawyer, and several addresses. He departed this life in Savannah, Jan. 18, 1854. Walter Glasco Charlton is the youngest child born to his parents, among the elder ones being: Robert Milledge Charlton, who served throughout the war between the states as a private in Wheaton's battery, Chatham artillery, and died from disease contracted in the service, in 1865; Mary, wife of Julian Hartridge (deceased); and Margaret (deceased), who was the wife of Capt. Charles P. Hansell, of Thomasville, Ga. Mr. Charlton was educated in the schools of Savannah, in 1866, attending the academy in Hancock county, Ga., which was presided over by Prof. Richard Malcolm Johnston, and later was under the tutelage of the same gentleman in Baltimore, Md. In 1869, he became a student at the university of Virginia, remaining there until 1872, and graduating from the law department. Returning to Savannah, he entered the office of Hartridge & Chisholm, and was admitted to the bar in January, 1873. During the following November he associated himself in practice with A. R. Lamar, then solicitor-general of the eastern circuit, and this partnership was continued until 1877. Mr. Charlton practiced alone for the succeeding two years, then formed a partnership with N. C. Collier, now United States judge for the district of New Mexico, which was continued until the retirement of Mr. Collier, in 1882, Mr. William W. Mackall having been admitted the previous year. In 1880, Mr. Charlton was elected as solicitor-general for the eastern circuit by the legislature of Georgia, and retained that office until January, 1885, when he declined further service in that capacity. He is very active in national, state and local politics, and was especially prominent in the local campaign of 1880, was temporary chairman of the state convention of 1883, president of the democratic convention of the First district in 1886, and was made chairman of the democratic executive committee of Chatham county in 1888, and is now serving his third term in that position. As an attorney and counselor Mr. Charlton sustains a most desirable rank among the members of the Savannah bar, the firm of Charlton & Mackall being general counsel for the Savannah Electric railway and for the Atlantic Short Line railroad. He is not connected with any secret society or fraternity, and is a consistent member of the Episcopal church, has been a vestryman of Christ church, Savannah, for many years, was a member of three church conventions for the diocese of Georgia, was for several years a member of the standing committee, and was church advocate in the famous Armstrong trial. He was married on Feb. 11, 1874, to Mary Walton Johnston, the accomplished daughter of Col. Richard Malcolm Johnston, the distinguished southern litterateur, and that union has been blessed by the birth of five children, viz.: Robert Milledge, Frances Mansfield, Walton, Richard Malcolm, and Margaret Walter Charlton.

WALTER SCOTT CHISHOLM (deceased), at the time of his death vice-president of the Plant Investment company; of the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway company; of the Plant Steamship lines; also president of the Alabama Midland railway, and a director of the Brunswick & Western railroad, and the senior member of the law firm of Chisholm, Erwin & Du Bignon, of Savannah, was born in Macon, Bibb Co., Ga., Nov. 7, 1830. His father was Murdoch Chisholm, of Scotch descent, and his mother Georgia Barnard of Savannah, both of whom died before he had reached the age of twelve years. His earlier education was received amid the cultured citizenship of the county of Liberty, Ga., that nursery of eminent men, and he was graduated from the university of Georgia with second honor in 1855, in a class of more than usual ability. He then studied law in the offices of Law & Bartow of Savannah, and was admitted to the bar in 1857, forming a partnership soon thereafter with that brilliant son of Georgia, Julian Hartridge. On the death of Mr. Hartridge, he formed the firm of Chisholm & Erwin, and later Chisholm, Erwin & Du Bignon. He was judge of the Savannah city court from 1863 to 1878, the only public office he ever held. He organized and was captain of the Savannah cadets early in the war between the states, but delicate health forbade the service he wished, and he was made the head of the military examining board. He became, in 1877, general counsel for the failed Atlantic & Gulf railroad, and then general counsel for its successor, the Savannah, Florida & Western railway, and for the Southern Express company. He became also president of the Alabama Midland railway; vice-president of the Savannah, Florida & Western railway, Charleston & Savannah railroad, and the Plant Investment company, and of the Southern Express company; director of the Richmond Terminal company, East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway company, South Florida Railway company, Central Railroad and Banking company of Georgia, and the Brunswick & Western railroad. His law judgment was unerring, and a wise mercy tempered his justice. To the profoundest legal knowledge he added an instantaneous grasp of principles, like intuition, while his lucid statement and close argument made his speeches masterpieces of potent reasoning. Richly endowed with analytical power, he fortified it with thought and wide study; and with his intellectual force he combined an even placidity of spirit, wonderful in that he was ever confronted by great physical ill. Attracted by his great fame as a lawyer, he was employed in some of the most celebrated causes of the Southern bar, notably of the Telfair will case. His intellectual versatility was fully demonstrated when he so ably bore heavy business responsibilities in vast railway systems. He spent in these new duties the last five years of his life in the city of New York, handling large corporate and financial problems against the legal genius of the nation's commercial center. He was happily married in 1861 to Eliza, daughter of that noble citizen of Savannah, Capt. John W. Anderson, and by her had six children, viz.: Anderson, Georgia, Walter S., Jr., Eddie, Frank, and Sadie. Five children, with his wife, survive him. The universal outpouring at his funeral in Savannah showed the exalted esteem in which he was held at home; while no citizen has ever had more elegant tributes from the illustrious men of his state. The late Senator Evarts, of New York, once said of him that he was the best lawyer before the supreme court of the United States that the south had, and that was the estimate placed upon him by the bar of Georgia. The following is an extract from the tribute of respect paid to his memory by the bar of Savannah: "His constant growth, the unimpaired vigor of his mind, the versatility of his powers commanded, as they received, the admiration of his fellow-citizens; whilst their manifestations placed him in the foremost rank of his profession—a wise, learned, useful lawyer, in the skilled exercise of his calling imposing peace upon the discordant elements of strife, and quieting, with kindly, sympathetic speech, the anxious doubts of troubled minds." He departed this life in the city of New York, Dec. 5, 1890.

HENRY CUMMING CUNNINGHAM, one of the most prominent attorneys of Georgia, was born in the city of Savannah on April 5, 1842. His father, Dr. Alexander Cunningham, was a native of Wilkes county, Ga., and practiced medicine in Augusta and Savannah for many years. His mother was Anna Francis Mayhew, and is still alive. The father departed this life in the city of Savannah in 1861 at the ripe age of seventy-six years. Henry C. Cunningham attended the schools of Savannah until the fall of 1858, when he entered the South Carolina college, now the university of South Carolina, and was graduated in the class of 1861. He left college to enter the Confederate service as a private, and a year later, after a competitive examination, was appointed a first lieutenant of artillery in the Confederate states army. He served throughout the war between the states and was paroled at the surrender of Greensboro, N. C. Mr. Cunningham had three brothers, viz.: Alexander T., Thomas M. and Charles M. After the war Mr. Cunningham entered the service of the Central railroad of Georgia as a clerk, and later became treasurer of the company. He was admitted to the bar in 1872, and located in Savannah, forming a partnership with Charles N. West, Esq., which lasted until July, 1876, and he then practiced alone until 1881, when Gen. A. R. Lawton, Mr. Cunningham and A. R. Lawton, Jr., formed a partnership under the firm name of Lawton & Cunningham, which continued until 1886, Gen. Lawton withdrawing from the firm on being appointed minister to Austria in 1886. Mr. Cunningham was corporation attorney for Savannah from 1880 to 1887, the only office he ever held. He is a warden of Christ church of Savannah. He was married on Dec. 19, 1867, to Virginia Waldburg Wayne, daughter of Dr. Richard Wayne, deceased. She left four children, three sons and a daughter. Mr. Cunningham was again married in 1886 to Nora, daughter of Gen. A. R. Lawton, and has one daughter by his second marriage. The firm of which Mr. Cunningham is the senior member has been the general counsel for the receivers of the Central Railroad and Banking company of Georgia since their appointment.

BRANTLEY A. DENMARK, a very prominent attorney of Savannah, Ga., was born in Brooks county, Ga., on April 25, 1850. His father, Thomas Irving Denmark, now living at the age of eighty-six, is a native of Georgia, and served in the war with the Indians in Georgia, and through the latter part of the war between the states, in the Confederate service. He had two sons, Redden I. and Clayton R., who served throughout the civil war. Another son, Elisha P. S., is a prominent lawyer of Valdosta, Ga., and was a member of the Georgia senate at twenty-five years of age. Brantley A. Denmark was reared on a farm and attended private schools until eighteen years of age; attended the Valdosta institute for one year, and then became a student of the university of Georgia, at Athens, from which he was graduated in 1871 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Soon after his graduation he began the study of law, in September, 1871, under Hon. Henry G. Turner, in Quitman, Ga., but one month later removed to Savannah, Ga., where he continued to study law with Hartridge & Chisholm, being admitted to the bar on Jan. 9, 1872. He at once entered into partnership with Mr. George A. Howell, under the firm name of Howell & Denmark, which continued until August, 1876, when Mr. Howell removed to Atlanta, both practicing from the office of Hartridge & Chisholm up to January, 1875, looking after the minor cases of that firm and pursuing their studies. After the dissolution he practiced alone until April 1, 1879, when he formed a partnership with Hon. Henry B. Tompkins, who had just resigned the office of judge of the eastern judicial circuit. This partnership was continued under the firm name of Tompkins & Denmark until October, 1881, when Judge Tompkins returned to the bench and subsequently removed to Atlanta. Mr. Denmark practiced alone until March, 1882, when he formed a partnership with Samuel B. Adams, Esq., which now continues. In 1883, Mr. W. L. Gignilliat was admitted to the firm and remained four years, retiring on account of ill health. In March, 1889, Hon. A. Pratt Adams, who succeeded Judge Tompkins in the judgeship of the superior court of the eastern judicial circuit of Georgia, resigned and entered the firm, which became Denmark, Adams & Adams, and was continued under that style until the death of Judge Adams in September, 1892. In May, 1893, Mr. Davis Freeman was admitted, though the firm name remained under the style of Denmark & Adams until Sept. 1, 1895, when it became Denmark, Adams & Freeman. Mr. Denmark has never sought or held any office, nor does he take any active part in politics, though doing his duty as a citizen. He has been delegate several times to congressional and gubernatorial conventions. For the last seven or eight years he has rarely gone to the court house, his work being chiefly confined to the office, and his health and temperament not being suited to jury practice. In June, 1890, Mr. Denmark was elected president of the Citizens' Bank of Savannah, with a capital of $500,000, which position he still holds. In April, 1890, he was elected president of the Savannah Construction company, which company was formed for the purpose of building a railroad from Savannah, Ga., to Columbia, S. C. This road was completed in September, 1891, and Mr. Denmark was made vice-president of the corporation, it being known as the South Bound Railroad company. In August, 1892, he was made president of this railroad, and filled that office until October, 1893, when the Savannah Construction company sold the road to the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad company. Both of these companies have proved a great success. Mr. Denmark is a director in the Savannah Hotel company, which built the DeSoto hotel, in Savannah, the Savannah Mutual Gas Light company, was a director in the United Underwriters' Insurance company of Atlanta, now out of business, and is a director in the Savannah Guano company, with which he has been connected for years. He is also a director of the Southwestern Railroad company, and various other enterprises. Mr. Denmark is a member of the Savannah board of public education, in which he has always taken a deep interest. The firm of Denmark, Adams & Freeman is general counsel for the receivers of the Savannah & Western Railroad company, counsel in Georgia for the Florida Central & Peninsular railroad system, and for various other corporations in Savannah, and has a very large practice. Mr. Denmark also represents a large number of estates as guardian, trustee and in other fiduciary capacities. He is a consistent member of the Baptist church, and was married Feb. 21, 1877, to Miss Anna R., niece and adopted daughter of the late Mr. William H. Stark, of Savannah.

HON. FLEMING GRANTLAND DU BIGNON. With a strong and interesting individuality; an exceptionally fine mind; an orator whose eloquent thoughts, clothed in language classic, flow with all the naturalness and ease as the sparkling waters from a fountain; a lawyer who crowds court rooms; a speaker who arouses the latent enthusiasm of his hearers to the highest pitch; skilled in the maneuvers and expedients of the parliamentarian, possessed of all the dash of the cavalier that dazzles and fascinates, Hon. Fleming G. du Bignon has rapidly risen to a height where the greatest public honors are within easy reach. He was born on July 25, 1853, at Woodville, near Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., and is a son of Capt. Charles and Ann (Grantland) du Bignon. Charles du Bignon was born on Jekyl island, off the coast of Georgia, March 2, 1809, was a graduate of Yale law college, and twice represented Glynn county, Ga., in the state legislature. During the late war he served as captain in Gen. Cobb's legion, and at its close returned to his vocation as planter, never having followed the law as a profession. His death took place in 1876. He was a son of Henry du Bignon, also a native of Jekyl island, and who, in turn, was a son of Christopher Poulaine du Bignon, a native of Bordeaux, France, who came to the United States a refugee from the first Napoleon, purchased Jekyl island, and there located with his family. Ann (Grantland) du Bignon was born in Baldwin county, Ga., and was a daughter of Hon. Seaton Grantland, who established one of the first newspapers in Georgia, the old "Federal Union," and edited it for many years. He was a whig and an elector on the Scott-Graham ticket; he also represented the Milledgeville district of Georgia in the United States congress for six years, and died in 1864. He was a son of Fleming A. Grantland, a native of Virginia and a planter. Fleming G. du Bignon is the second of a family of three living children, the others being Kate and Christopher P. His early education was begun under the private tutorship of the celebrated Washington Baird, D. D. After receiving a military education at the Virginia Military institute, at Lexington, Mr. du Bignon went thence to the university of Virginia. Upon leaving that institution he spent more than a year in Europe to complete his education. Returning to Georgia, he settled in Savannah, was admitted to the bar and began the practice of law. In 1875 he married Miss Caro Nicol Lamar, daughter of the late Col. Charles A. L. Lamar (and granddaughter of Judge Nicol, of the United States district court), and soon thereafter he removed to Milledgeville, where he began the practice of law under the favorable auspices of family influence. It was soon acknowledged that the young attorney was strong in debate, and possessed to a high degree the graces of an accomplished orator. He had the capacity to win success in the face of opponents of wide experience and established reputations. From 1875 to 1877 he was county judge of Baldwin county, and for one year of that time was associated as partner with Robert Whitfield, Esq., and afterward, when that law firm was dissolved, he formed a partnership with A. McKinley, Esq. In 1880 he became a candidate for representative of Baldwin county in the general assembly of the state, and he defeated his opponent, the mayor of Milledgeville, by a large majority. In the lower house of the general assembly Mr. du Bignon took an active and prominent part. He was the author of the measure which appropriated one hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars ($165,000) for the purpose of erecting new and additional buildings at the state lunatic asylum, and for improving the treatment of the unfortunate there confined. The measure, though bitterly opposed at first, was carried finally by an overwhelming vote. In 1882, at the end of his term, Mr. du Bignon was elected without opposition to the state senate from the twentieth senatorial district, comprising the counties of Baldwin, Hancock, and Washington. Upon the organization of the senate, Mr. du Bignon's friends urged him to allow the use of his name for president of that body, but he preferred to be upon the floor, and declined. He was appointed chairman of the judiciary committee, which is the most important committee in the legislature. It is to this committee that all important legislation is referred before enacted into laws. After the organization of the senate, a poll of its members was made, and it was found that there was but one vote's difference between Mr. du Bignon's following and that of Mr. Boynton, who was elected president. Had Mr. du Bignon been elected, he would then have succeeded to the gubernatorial office upon the death of Gov. Alexander H. Stephens, which occurred shortly afterward, and would have been the youngest man who ever entered that high office. After a residence of a few years in Milledgeville, Mr. du Bignon returned to Savannah, and was directly afterward elected solicitor-general of the eastern judicial circuit, which embraces the counties of Chatham, Bryan, Liberty, McIntosh, and Effingham. In Savannah, in the superior court of Chatham county, he won a splendid reputation as a fearless and successful prosecuting attorney for the state. No influence was strong enough to deter him from prosecuting to the full extent of his ability a violation of the law. Mr. du Bignon took an active part in local politics, and in 1888 he was elected a member of the state senate without opposition. He resigned the office of solicitor-general, and on the assembling of the senate was unanimously elected its president. He filled the chair with dignity, impartiality and ability. Legislation was in a great measure in his hands, and as those who are acquainted with the secret history of the two sessions know, the designs of certain foreign corporations to mulct the state treasury were thwarted mainly through his efforts. In 1889 he accepted a partnership in the law firm of Chisholm & Erwin, the counsel for the Platt system of railways and steamships, for the Southern Express company, and Western Union Telegraph company. The firm is now Chisholm, Erwin & du Bignon. As a delegate to the national democratic convention of 1888, he served on the committee on platform and resolutions, and heartily supported the tariff reform idea. In 1892 he was elected a delegate for the state at large to the national democratic convention, and was unanimously elected chairman of the Georgia delegation in that convention. He was a supporter of Mr. Cleveland, and took a prominent part in the proceedings of that body. Both in 1890 and 1894 Mr. du Bignon was urged to enter the race for governor. He is now prominently mentioned as Gen. Gordon's successor in the United States senate.

DR. WILLIAM DUNCAN, a thirty-second degree Mason, of Savannah, Ga., was born in that city on Jan. 4, 1840, and received his primary education there. He then attended Chatham academy, Savannah, Ga., and Springfield academy, Springfield, Ga., then became a student at the old Oglethorpe university, at Midway, near Milledgeville, Ga. He was graduated in medicine from the Savannah Medical college in March, 1861, and from the Rotunda hospital, of Dublin, Ireland, in 1865. Dr. Duncan is also a licentiate in midwifery of Kings and Queens College of Physicians, Ireland, and pursued a clinical course in Kings hospital, London, England, and in the hospitals of Paris, France. He located in Savannah, for the practice of his profession, in 1866. He is a member of the State Medical association, of Georgia, of the Georgia Medical society, of Savannah, and was treasurer of the latter in 1867. The doctor was demonstrator of anatomy in the Savannah Medical college (now suspended) in 1867, and is at present dean of the faculty and secretary of the board of trustees. He has been one of the attending physicians of the Savannah hospital since 1868, and was for many years secretary and treasurer of the board of trustees of the Georgia infirmary for colored people. During the civil war, he served as an assistant surgeon in the army of the Confederate states, and in the field, also, at the hospitals of Savannah, Richmond and Harrisonburg, Va. Dr. Duncan was an alderman of the city of Savannah for twelve years, during that entire period serving as a member of the sanitary board of that city. In the masonic circles of Savannah, there are few that stand as high as he, having received the thirty-second degree of that order. The doctor has never married.

CHARLES STEPHEN ELLIS, a prominent dealer in naval stores, of Savannah, Ga., was born in Wilmington, N. C., in January, 1835. His father, Charles D. Ellis, was a native of Vermont, and a resident of North Carolina. During the war between the states he was attached to the Confederate artillery service, and he and three others organized three companies of artillery in the city of Wilmington. His son, Zaccheus, brother of Charles Stephen Ellis, was killed at the battle of Bentonville, N. C. Charles Stephen Ellis was reared and received his earlier education in Wilmington, N. C., at fifteen years of age becoming a student at Wake Forrest college, North Carolina, from which institution he was graduated in 1857, with the degree of bachelor of arts. Soon after his graduation he removed to Charleston, S. C., and engaged in the commission business. In December, 1860, he entered the Confederate service as a private in the Washington Light infantry, which company was afterward assigned to the Twenty-fifth South Carolina infantry, called the Eutaw regiment. In 1863, he was transferred to the First North Carolina battalion of heavy artillery, and was detached for duty as assistant quartermaster of the post of Wilmington, with the rank of captain, and remained there until the fall of the city. He then followed Gen. Bragg, and laid down his arms at Chester, S. C., in April, 1865. Capt. Ellis was an active participant in the campaign around Charleston and other important engagements. After the close of hostilities, he went to Wilmington, N. C., and entered the commission business, which was continued until 1877, when he removed to Savannah, Ga., in order to enter the business he now conducts. In 1884, with W. U. Holt and J. R. Young, he founded the naval stores firm of Ellis, Holt & Co. Mr. Holt, dying in 1886, Mr. C. B. Parker, of McRae, Ga., was admitted to the firm, the name changing to Ellis, Young & Co. Mr. Ellis is now actively engaged in the naval stores and wholesale grocery business. He served as the first president of the Naval Stores exchange, and is vice-president of the Chatham bank. Ever alive to the best interests of the city of Savannah, he has been chosen as an alderman, and served a portion of his term. Mr. Ellis is a consistent member of the Baptist church. He was married in Savannah, in 1883, to Cate A., daughter of the late Milton J. Bucker, of that city, and they have five interesting children, two manly sons and three accomplished daughters.

JUDGE ROBERT FALLIGANT, of the eastern judicial circuit of Georgia, was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., Jan. 12, 1839. Maternally, he is descended from the Raifords, who were among the earliest settlers of the colony of North Carolina. His maternal great-grandfather, John Raiford, was a soldier in the war of the revolution, a commissioned officer in the Second North Carolina continental line, serving under Gen. Greene at the battle of Guilford court house, and settled after the independence of the colonies was declared in Jefferson county, Ga. His maternal grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812. On his mother's side, he is also descended from the Batteys, who were among the earliest settlers of the colony of Rhode Island. His paternal grandfather, who was a soldier under the first Napoleon, emigrated to Georgia after the battle of Waterloo, and settled in Savannah, Ga., in the year 1816. Robert Falligant, the distinguished subject of this sketch, was educated at the Cherokee Baptist college, then located at Cassville, in what is now Bartow county, Ga., and at the university of Virginia. While a student at the last-named institution, the civil war broke out, and he joined a company of college boys, known as the Southern Guards, and was one of the party that seized Harper's Ferry while the Virginia secession convention was in session. He remained in the army of northern Virginia until the close of hostilities, being in the artillery service during the whole of that memorable struggle and winning promotion to a lieutenantancy after the battle of Antietam, by special order of Gen. Robert E. Lee. Returning to his home in Savannah after the surrender of the Confederate forces, he began the study of law in the office of that eminent jurist, William Law, and finally became his partner in the practice. Entering at once upon a most successful career, he was chosen by his fellow-citizens as one of the representatives from the county of Chatham in the Georgia legislature, in 1882, and two years later as senator from the first district. He was appointed by Gov. Gordon, of Georgia, to the bench of the superior court, in 1889, to fill a vacancy, and, upon the expiration of his term of appointment, he was elected by the general assembly for the full term, and afterward for the succeeding term. For more than twenty years Judge Falligant has taken an active interest in the welfare of the volunteer militia of Georgia, and commanded for seventeen years the Oglethorpe Light infantry, of Savannah, one of the most prominent military organizations of Georgia. As a soldier, he stands in the front rank; as a legislator, his course was marked by numerous instances of sagacity. He sustains a most desirable rank among the public speakers of the state, his gifts as an orator making him a natural leader, a position fully justified by his course on the bench and at the bar.

CAPT. JOHN FLANNERY, a prominent banker and cotton factor of Savannah, Ga., was born in Nenagh, county Tipperary, Ireland, Nov. 24, 1835. While in his sixteenth year he came to America, accompanied by his father, landing at Charleston, S. C., in October, 1851. He remained in Charleston until April, 1852, when he went to Atlanta, Ga., to accept a situation in a dry-goods store. In August, of the same year, he returned to Charleston, where he remained until December, 1854, as clerk in the dry-goods business. In December, 1854, he removed to Savannah, Ga., to accept a position in a dry-goods establishment, with which he remained until the fall of 1855. The next three years finds him successively as bookkeeper in the wholesale grocery, and the paint, sash and blind business. In October, 1858, he decided to try the cotton business, and secured a situation as account sales clerk with the house of Evans, Harris & Co., cotton factors. He was promoted to bookkeeper the following year, and continued in this position until May, 1861, when he entered the service of the Confederate states as junior lieutenant of the Irish Jasper Greens, First volunteer regiment of Georgia, of Savannah, in which company he had previously served the state at Fort Pulaski as a non-commissioned officer. In January, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and the following October was made captain of the company, in which capacity he continued for the remainder of the war. His company served as heavy artillery on the coast of Georgia and South Carolina up to May, 1864—he being in command of Lee battery, Savannah river, for over a year prior to that time—when he joined the army of Gen. Joe Johnston near Dallas, Ga. He was an active participant in several skirmishes between that point and Lovejoy's Station, Ga., and also in the battle of Jonesborough, which was practically the last of the Atlanta campaign. He was with Hood's army in the disastrous Tennessee campaign, but was not present at either the battles of Franklin or Nashville, being on detached service with his command when these battles were being fought. As a result of the exposure and hardships of this campaign, he was taken sick at Corinth, Miss., in January, 1865, which practically ended his active connection with the army for the remainder of the war. He was paroled at Augusta, Ga., in May, 1865, and returned to Savannah during the same month. Being an expert bookkeeper, he was soon employed to go to Hilton Head, S. C., to adjust the books of a prominent concern, which was closing up its business at that point. Returning to Savannah in July, 1865, he again entered the cotton business, having formed a copartnership with L. J. Guilmartin and E. W. Drummond, under the style of L. J. Guilmartin & Co. In June, 1877, this firm was dissolved, Capt. Flannery purchasing all of its assets, and, with John L. Johnson, formed the firm since known as John Flannery & Co. Capt. Flannery takes very little active interest in politics, though ever watchful of local affairs. He served from 1879 to 1889 as chairman of the sinking fund commission of the city of Savannah. He is connected with a number of enterprises of importance to Savannah, and has served as a director of the Southern Bank of the State of Georgia since its foundation in 1870, and as its president since 1881. He was re-elected as captain of the Irish Jasper Greens, on the reorganization of the Georgia volunteers, in May, 1872, and still holds that position. He is a consistent member of the Catholic church. His marriage, in April, 1867, to Mary E. Norton, has proved a source of unalloyed domestic felicity, and has been blessed by the birth of six children, of whom only two are now in life, viz.: Katie M., the wife of Raphael T. Semmes, of Atlanta, Ga., and John McMahon Flannery, lately graduated in the class of civil engineering at the university of Notre Dame, Indiana.

WALLACE W. FRASER, a leading attorney of Savannah, Ga., was born in Hinesville, Liberty Co., Ga., May 23, 1857, and is a son of Simon A. and Mary W. (Bacon) Fraser, both of whom were Scotch Presbyterians. Simon A. Fraser was a native American, but at the age of ten years went to Inverness, Scotland, which was the home of his ancestors before they emigrated to America, and there he attended the schools for nine years. He was a large planter and slave owner, and at one time represented the county of Liberty in the Georgia legislature. Mary W. (Bacon) Fraser was of Puritan ancestry, natives of Dorchester, Mass., who settled in Dorchester, S. C., and later in Dorchester, Ga. Wallace W. Fraser was educated at the Bradwell institute, Liberty county, Ga., and afterward took a special course in the classics at the university of Georgia, Athens, from which institution he was graduated in law in 1877. He engaged in the practice of his profession for the two years next after his graduation in Liberty county, Ga., and the following two years at Darien, McIntosh Co., Ga. In October, 1881, he located in Savannah, and has since been actively and successfully engaged in practice there. In November, 1888, he was elected solicitor-general of the eastern judicial circuit of Georgia, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. Fleming Grantland Du Bignon, was re-elected for the full term of four years, beginning January, 1889, and re-elected for four years from January, 1892. Mr. Fraser was happily married on Sept. 7, 1887, to Miss Eva M. Lawson, of Waco, Texas, and that union has been blessed by the birth of two sons and a daughter, viz.: Wallace W., Jr., Rachel Lawson, and Howard Lawson. In politics he is a democrat and has been a very active member of the party, having been a delegate from the county of Chatham to the last two state conventions. He is talented as a public speaker and is an able advocate. Mr. Fraser is a master Mason in Landrum lodge, a member of Acorn lodge, I. O. O. F., a member of the Savannah volunteer guards and of the Oglethorpe club, of Savannah.

COL. W. W. GORDON, commanding First regiment of cavalry, Georgia volunteers, was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., on Oct. 14, 1834. Until the age of seven years he resided in the city of his birth, then attended school in Morristown, N. J., until 1846, at that time going to an academy at New Haven, Conn., where he remained one year. He next attended school in White Plains, N. Y., and in 1850 entered Yale university, New Haven, Conn., from which institution he was graduated in 1854. Returning to Savannah, he engaged as clerk to a cotton firm of that city, and in 1856 became a member of the firm. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in the army of the Confederate states, was wounded at the battle of Lovejoy Station, was promoted to captain, and retired on April 26, 1865. After the close of hostilities he resumed the cotton business at Savannah, in which he has been very successful. Col. Gordon was elected a member of the general assembly of Georgia from the county of Chatham in 1884, was re-elected in 1886, and again in 1888. He was defeated by a small majority for the democratic nomination for congressman of the first district of Georgia in 1886. Col. Gordon was very happily married in 1857 to Miss Nellie Kinzie, of Chicago, Ill., and that union has been blessed by the birth of two sons and four daughters, all of whom are now in life except one daughter, Miss Alice. The colonel is not a member of any church organization. He occupies a prominent place in the masonic circles of Savannah.

GEORGE S. HAINES, postmaster at Savannah, Ga., was born in the city of Augusta, Ga., in September, 1847. He is the grandson of the late Hon. John Schley, judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit; grand-nephew of the late Hon. Wm. Schley, governor of the state of Georgia; grand-nephew of the late Hon. Geo. Schley, postmaster at Savannah, Ga., for thirty years, and nephew of the late Hon. Wm. Schley, judge of the superior court of the eastern judicial circuit of Georgia. He was reared and educated in the schools of Augusta, and at the commencement of the war between the states, being too young to enter the regular army, he enlisted in the Georgia state troops, and did his duty as faithfully in that memorable struggle as he has since done in time of peace. He was a frequent visitor to the city of Savannah prior to taking up his permanent residence there, and most of his life has been spent in that city. Mr. Haines began his business life with the Central railroad of Georgia, in whose service he remained three years. He then went to Robert Habersham's Son & Co., rice factors, and was with that firm three years. He was next in charge of the wharf of the Empire line of steamships, Wallace Cumming & Co. being agents, then being elected superintendent of the Savannah, Skidaway & Seaboard railroad, serving in that capacity six years. He then went to the Atlantic & Gulf railroad, as general ticket agent and paymaster. When that road was merged into the Savannah, Florida & Western, Mr. Haines became assistant general freight and passenger agent, remaining in that position until October, 1879, when he resigned and entered the brokerage business. In 1884 he and W. H. Daniel formed a partnership in the insurance business, which was continued until April 1, 1891, when it was dissolved, each continuing in the insurance business alone. He is a very public spirited citizen, and has always been ready to do his share in advancing the best interests of the city of Savannah, for the benefit of all the people thereof. Being a man of the highest integrity, modest and unassuming, he has probably more strong personal friends than any man in that city. Marked characteristics of this gentleman are strict honesty, a veracity which can never be questioned, absolute fidelity to all trusts committed to him, and a devotion to his friends which is without limit. Of course, such a man is possessed of a warm heart, and is courteous and affable to those about him. He has never sought public office, until recently, though he has for some years taken an active interest in city matters. In January, 1887, he was elected a member of the city council of Savannah, and was re-elected three times, serving in all eight years, with the exception of about a month or two, when he resigned and retired, only to be called back to fill a vacancy in that body. As a member of the council he took high rank, bringing to the discharge of his duties untiring energy and a zealous desire to round off his work as it should be. On May 10, 1894, he tendered his resignation as a member of the council, having been nominated by President Cleveland as postmaster at Savannah. Being a reformer by nature, when he sought the office of postmaster his application was largely endorsed by the leading business people of Savannah. It is generally conceded that the president could not have made a better appointment, Mr. Haines now having brought every department of the service up to a high grade of administration. He is very prominent in the masonic circles of Savannah, having filled several important offices in that order. He was happily married to a daughter of Hon. George S. Owens, of Savannah, a lady of rare culture and charming character, and they have several children. His home is a happy one, and he is a devoted husband and father.

WILLIAM DEARING HARDEN, very prominent in the legal circles of Savannah, Ga., was born in Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., on July 15, 1837. His parents removing to Savannah when he was about three months of age, he has

resided in that city continuously since. His father was Thomas Hutson Harden, son of Thomas Hutson Harden and Matilda A. Baker, and grandson of Col. William Harden, senior colonel of Marion's command, and grandson of Col. John Baker, of Liberty county, Ga., for whom Baker county was named. His mother was Margaret E. Dearing, daughter of William Dearing and Eliza J. Pasteur, and granddaughter of Capt. John Dearing, of Fauquier county, Va., and of Lieut.-Col. Thomas Pasteur, of North Carolina. Thus four of his great-grandfathers were officers of the continental army during the war of the revolution, each being a native of a different state, viz.: Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia. The following extract from the list of members of the society of the Sons of the Revolution in the state of Georgia will show the lineage of Judge Harden: "Harden, William Dearing (Insignia No. 797), great-grandson of William Harden (1743-1785), appointed captain of Beaufort artillery, South Carolina, March, 1776; in command of Fort Lyttleton for fourteen months; colonel of militia under Gen. Stephen Bull; attacked British at Wiggins Hill, 1779; colonel in Marion's command, 1780-1781; in several skirmishes with British, 1781; captured Fort Balfour with about 100 prisoners, April 12, 1781; at siege and capture of Fort Galphin, 1781; in active service until end of war. Also great-grandson of John Baker (17—1792), member of committee appointed by convention at Savannah, Ga., July 20, 1774, to prepare resolutions expressive of the sentiments and determination of the people of that province in regard to the Boston port bill; member of provincial congress of Georgia, 1775-1777; member of Georgia council of safety, 1776; colonel commanding a regiment of militia of Liberty county, Ga., 1775-1783; wounded in a skirmish at Bulltown Swamp, Nov. 19, 1778; defeated Capt. Goldsmith at White House, Ga., June 28, 1779; participated in the capture of Augusta, Ga., May-June, 1781. Also, great-grandson of Thomas Pasteur (17—1806), ensign Fourth North Carolina regiment of infantry of the continental line, Dec. 29, 1777; transferred to the First North Carolina regiment, Dec. 29, 1778; promoted to lieutenant First North Carolina regiment, Nov. 20, 1779; paymaster, April 10, 1782; honorably retired Nov. 15, 1783; lieutenant First regiment United States infantry, June 3, 1790; captain First regiment United States infantry, March 5, 1792; Major Second regiment United States infantry, April 11, 1803; died in service, July 29, 1806; original member North Carolina Society of the Cincinnati." William Dearing Harden was reared in the city of Savannah and educated at private schools, being prepared for college by the late Henry K. Preston. He entered the junior class of Princeton, N. J., in 1854, and two years later was graduated from that institution, at nineteen years of age. Returning to Savannah he read law under John E. Ward, George S. Owens and Charles C. Jones, Jr., and was admitted to the bar in 1858. Late in 1860, just prior to the secession of Georgia, he went with a detachment of the Chatham artillery, which he had joined for that purpose, and took charge of Fort Pulaski "for whom it may concern," using no flag, Georgia having seceded on Saturday, Jan. 19, 1861; on Sunday, Jan. 20, he was one of three men who raised the flag of Georgia over that fort. His subsequent career in the service of the Confederate states was as follows: He was assigned to duty as acting ordnance officer of Fort Pulaski and Tybee island, and mounted a number of guns; was mustered, with the Chatham artillery, into the Confederate service on July 31, 1861, and then detailed as acting lieutenant and ordnance officer of Brig.-Gen. H. W. Mercer's command, extending from Savannah to Florida, and was sent to Blackbeard, St. Simon's, Jekyll and Cumberland islands to complete the batteries, build magazines, mount the guns and drill the men in the use of heavy artillery; went with Gen. Mercer to Brunswick, and returned with him to Savannah. He was commissioned first lieutenant in the provisional army of the Confederate states on July 19, 1862, and assigned to duty by the war department as ordnance officer of the military district of Georgia. On July 15, 1863, he was commissioned as captain and ordered to report to Gen. Beauregard for duty on Morris island, Charleston harbor; inspected Morris island and James island, the Charleston arsenal, and then made a tour of all the arsenals in South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama to secure material for the defense of Charleston. Having performed these duties he was again appointed ordnance officer of the district of Georgia. Gen. Mercer having been ordered to north Georgia, Capt. Harden notified Col. Oladowski, chief of ordnance of the army of Tennessee, that he declined to further waive his rank, and was accordingly assigned as ordnance officer of Maj.-Gen. E. C. Walthall's division on Aug 13, 1864, and on Oct. 22, 1864, was verbally ordered by Lieut.-Gen. A. P. Stewart to report as acting chief ordnance officer of his corps, and acted in that capacity throughout Hood's campaign in Tennessee. After that campaign had closed he was given a brief leave of absence, the only one he had during the war, but soon rejoining the army under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in North Carolina, he was, at the request of the ordnance bureau at Richmond, assigned by the war department permanent chief ordnance officer of Stewart's corps with the rank, pay and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry, and was paroled at Greensboro, N. C. He was present at all the battles fought by the army from Dalton to Atlanta, to Huntsville, and Tuscumbia, and to Columbia, Franklin, and Nashville, Tenn., and back to the Tennessee river, it being almost a continuous action. After the close of hostilities, Col. Harden resumed the practice of law in Savannah, and, in 1878, was made corporation attorney of the city and judge of the city court. He held the attorneyship for two years and the judgeship for fourteen years. With what signal success he filled the latter position may be gathered from various expressions of the supreme court of Georgia and from the opinions of the various members of the bar. Upon retiring from the bench, Jan. 20, 1892, Judge Harden was tendered a complimentary banquet by the entire bar of Savannah, and thereupon resumed the practice of law in that city, in which he is now engaged. He has been an officer of the Georgia Historical society for the past twenty-four years, is a fellow of the American Geographical society, of the Theosophical society, corresponding member of the American Ethnological society, and member of the American branch of the society for Psychological Research. He is also the first vice-president of the Sons of the Revolution in Georgia, and an hereditary member of the distinguished Society of the Cincinnati, and of the Veteran Corps of Artillery in war of 1812, in right of his grandfather, Thomas Hutson Harden, lieutenant-colonel and division inspector with Gen. John McIntosh; also one of the two trustees allotted to the southern states of the American college of Musicians, chartered by act of congress. Among the more prominent social organizations he is a member of the Manhattan club, the Reform club and the Southern society, all of New York city, and the Oglethorpe club and the Guards club of Savannah. He still retains his connection with the time-honored Chatham artillery, not actively, but as an honorary member. Judge Harden is the author of An Inquiry into the Truth of Dogmatic Christianity; Comprising a Discussion with a Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, and London, 1893, which has received high encomiums on both sides of the Atlantic. The book is anti-dogmatic but not anti-religious. Its character may be judged of by the following published extracts: "The style of the discussion is as courteous as the learning is profound—no flippant infidelities deface its pages. The obvious objections to the progress of religion are argued as reverently as the archbishop endeavors to refute them. The manner seems like the earnest conversation of two eloquent and educated gentlemen of equal piety and ability, whose object is not to controvert each other, but to get at the real truth of the serious subject about which they intelligently differ."—Stephen Fiske, Esq., in New York "Spirit of the Times." "We heartily wish our time permitted a full review and analysis of this book. It is good to read it, good to study it, good for the heart and good for the mind, and we commend it to the reading public, and here close its pages with no little gratitude to the author for the hours in which he has caught us up out of the heat and toil of current work and refreshed us by glimpses of a higher life, of loftier aims, and of more lasting pleasures."—D. H. C., in "Atlanta Constitution." "I have read your book through with the closest possible attention. * * * Your scope is extensive, your style of treatment clear and logical—in some passages terribly trenchant—and your argument irresistible. How I wish that every intelligent man in Savannah would read it with the care and candor which it deserves and be brought to the conclusion that there is a religion which is true, and a service of God and man which is noble and blessed, apart from superstition."—Extract from a letter from Rev. T. Harley, of London, in the "Savannah Morning News."

JULIAN HARTRIDGE, deceased. Handsome in person, accomplished in intellect, polished in manners, the very mirror of honor, always kind, always gentle, always considerate of the feelings of others, generous almost to prodigality, the late Julian Hartridge impressed one as the most lovable gentleman one ever chanced to meet in the social circle. As a lawyer, he was rarely equipped. Endowed by nature with an intellect singularly adapted to the discernment of truth, and embellished by literary attainments of the most liberal description, acquired in the very best institutions of learning in the country, he brought to the pursuit of his chosen profession an honorable ambition and a persevering industry which speedily secured for him an enviable distinction at the bar of Georgia. As an orator his language was unusually chaste and elegant, as well as easy and fluent, his elocution correct and impressive, his logic clear and concise, and his voice musical and magnetic. Few who heard him can forget the charm of his manner or the force and perspicuity of his matter. As a legislator he was pre-eminently conservative and just, and although a democrat of the strictest sect, he did not hesitate to disregard the demands of mere party exigency whenever there was a conflict between them. The Hon. Julian Hartridge was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., Sept. 9, 1829. From early youth he was remarkable for his studious habits and reflective turn of mind. He was the eldest son of a successful merchant of Savannah, who gave his son all the educational advantages within reach. At the Chatham academy, a school then distinguished of its kind; at the Montpelier institute, presided over by the late Bishop Elliott, of Georgia, and at other educational institutions in the interior of the state, Julian Hartridge passed the school days of his boyhood. From the first he was a bright and apt scholar, standing at the head of his classes and mastering with equal facility the classics and the sterner routine of mathematics in advance of the boys of his own age. Even then he developed a marked capacity for speaking in one so young and modest, and soon attained rank as a declaimer. When prepared for college, he entered Brown university at Providence, R. I., an institution of high renown, then under the presidency of the eminent Dr. Wayland. His class was one of rare ability, being composed for the most part of young men from the best families of the neighboring New England states. His powers of oratory and composition made up in a measure for other delinquencies, and he graduated with distinction at the age of nineteen. After graduation he entered the law school of Harvard university, and there diligently applied himself to the mastery of the principles of that great science. Having taken his degree of Bachelor of Law when just of age, he returned to Savannah, and after service in the office of Judge Robert M. Charlton, was admitted to the bar and settled down for practice in his native city. Success attended him from the inception of his career, and he was soon elected by the legislature of Georgia to the office of solicitor-general of the eastern judicial circuit. In the discharge of the duties of that office he was thrown into almost daily antagonism with a bar of exceptional power and brilliancy, composed of such men as Charlton, Law, Ward, Owens, Lawton, Jackson and others, whose names and achievements are a part of the history of the state. This office he filled with marked ability and unswerving fidelity, winning distinction which was an earnest of his future professional power and success. Yielding to the persuasion of personal and political friends, he was elected to the general assembly of Georgia from the county of Chatham in 1859, and in the execution of this his first political trust, he secured the respect and confidence of all. He was chosen and served as a delegate in the democratic convention of 1860 at Charleston, S. C., and Baltimore, Md. Upon the inception of the late war between the states, thoroughly in sympathy with his state and people, he took the field as second lieutenant of the Chatham artillery of Savannah, and served in that capacity until he was elected a representative from the first district of Georgia to the Confederate congress. There he served until the close of hostilities, holding a distinguished place upon the committees and in the debates of the house, his speech upon the conscript act having marked him at once as one of the profoundest thinkers and ablest debaters in a body composed of men who had justly won their titles to eminence in governmental affairs. Upon the subjugation of the Confederate states he returned to his home in Savannah, broken in fortune, but undismayed in spirit, and resumed the practice of his profession, being associated with the late Judge Walter S. Chisholm. Almost his first appearance of note was before a military tribunal charged with the trial of an old and prominent citizen of Georgia for his life, and, though conviction followed, the sentence of the court remains until this day unexecuted. Debarred for a time in common with his fellow-citizens in the political management of his state, he devoted himself assiduously to the law, and with eminently satisfactory results. When the sword was at length sheathed at the behest and in the presence of the civil law, he was called to preside over the first convention which gave Georgia a chief magistrate chosen by the people. He was then and there made chairman of the state central executive committee, and soon after was one of the electors-at-large for Georgia on the Tilden and Hendricks ticket. Reluctantly he gave up his profession and agreed to stand for the forty-fourth congress, to which he was elected by a handsome majority. In this contest, after accepting the nomination, he prepared a letter of withdrawal and was only persuaded by the strong appeals of personal and political friends from putting his determination into execution. In 1876 he was returned to congress by his constituents, and was in Washington, discharging with admirable ability his duties as representative of the first congressional district, when death summoned him hence, anticipating by but a short time a step he deemed incumbent upon himself in behalf of those he held most dear, he having voluntarily announced his retirement from public life soon after his election as a member of that body. In early manhood he married Miss Mary M. Charlton, eldest daughter of his legal preceptor, Judge Robert M. Charlton, one of the purest and ablest of Georgia jurists, and once a senator in the United States congress. Nine children were the fruit of this union, four of whom survive, and the youngest was born at the moment when his father was eloquently defending his people in the matter of the Hamburg massacre. On the morning of Jan. 8, 1879, Julian Hartridge departed this life, the disease which bore him away being pneumonia. Although he had been confined to his apartments for several days, no one, until a late moment, anticipated a fatal termination of his attack. His unexpected demise produced a profound impression alike in the national capital in Savannah and throughout the wide borders of Georgia. His body was tenderly laid to rest in the cemetery of Laurel grove, near Savannah, and the entire community gave token most emphatic that theirs was no ordinary bereavement. Julian Hartridge died as his star was in the ascendant. On either side fame and fortune seemed to be waiting and beckoning to him with kindly hands. He had declined a place upon the supreme bench of Georgia, the goal of the ambitious of his profession, and had laid aside the power and place of a representative of the people just as his name and fame were becoming familiar to the heart and ear of the country. He was indeed a true type of the men of the south of his day and generation. His last public duty was the preparation of an argument upon the Geneva award. Just as that was finished, the summons came. He does not need the pen of eulogy. His record is inscribed upon the pages of the history of Georgia, and truly may it be said that

"A sweeter and a lovelier gentleman,
Framed in the prodigality of nature,
* * * * *
The spacious world cannot again afford."

GEN. HENRY ROOTES JACKSON, a prominent lawyer, soldier and diplomat, of Savannah, Ga., was born in Athens, Ga., June 24, 1820. He was one of the highest honor men at Yale college in 1839, and was made a lawyer in 1840, settling in Savannah. He was United States district attorney for Georgia in 1843, colonel First Georgia regiment in the Mexican war in 1846 and 1847, judge of the superior courts of Georgia in 1849-1853, United States minister to Austria in 1853, resigning in 1858. He declined to be chancellor of the state university at Athens, Ga., in 1859, which institution made him LL. D. in 1893, was delegate to the historic Charleston democratic convention in 1860, elector for the state-at-large on the Breckinridge and Lane ticket, Confederate judge for Georgia in 1861, brigadier-general Confederate states army in 1861, major-general Georgia state troops in the field in 1862, brigadier-general Confederate states army in 1864, trustee of the Peabody educational fund for years, United States minister to Mexico in 1885-1887, president Georgia Historical society from 1875 and of the Telfair Art academy, in 1892 a director of the Central Railroad and Banking company of Georgia. In all these important functions Gen. Jackson has been signally successful and distinguished. His character has been marked by a deep aversion to office-seeking and to the personal rivalries of politics, and he has repeatedly declined the highest political offices. He has achieved the largest successes of his career in his profession of the law. While his large practice has been interrupted by long intervals of military and diplomatic service, one in two great wars far apart, and the other in widely different epochs of national interest, embracing both his young and matured manhood, and each only an incident of his record, yet his speeches in the court room and his triumphs in vast cases at the bar, make up the best and main part of his long and eventful life. His effort in the famous "Wanderer" slave-ship prosecution over thirty years ago is to-day a living memory of the highest forensic eloquence, and he conducted and gained some of the heaviest litigations in the south, and earned the largest fees known in that section, realizing a fortune from them. As a commander and organizer of troops he won distinction in Mexico and on Confederate battle-grounds in Georgia, northwestern Virginia and Tennessee, becoming a prisoner in the last fateful campaign of the war. As a diplomatist he conducted international negotiations with consummate tact and statesmanship. He has true poetic genius, publishing a volume in 1850 entitled, Talulah and Other Poems. A connoisseur in art and letters, genuinely eloquent, of dauntless chivalry and immovable convictions, a man of affairs, and endowed with exalted home qualities, and a prince of entertainers, Gen. Jackson is a type of our best American manhood.

ALEXANDER ROBERT LAWTON, one of the foremost attorneys of the southern states, was born in St. Peter's parish, Beaufort district, S. C., Nov. 4, 1818. His grandfather was an officer of the continental army, and his father pursued the vocation of a planter. His youth was spent among the sports and comforts of a generous southern plantation, and his early education was acquired at the private schools of the neighborhood. At sixteen years of age he entered the United States Military academy at West Point, from which he was graduated in 1839 as second lieutenant of the First artillery and for the ensuing eighteen months was stationed successively at Petersburg and Rouse's Point, N. Y., and at Coastport, Me. Resigning from the army in January, 1841, he studied at the Dane law school, Harvard university, Cambridge, Mass., and was graduated therefrom in June, 1842. Returning to his home he continued his studies in the office of Hon. William F. Colcock, and in December of that year was admitted to the practice in Columbia, S. C. In January, 1843, he established his home in Savannah, Ga., and entered regularly and very earnestly upon the practice of his profession. In November, 1849, he accepted the presidency of the Augusta & Savannah Railroad company, and retained that office until the successful completion and operation of that road in 1854. Gen. Lawton's entry into the political arena was as a representative from the county of Chatham in the Georgia legislature during the session of 1855-6. Among other important services rendered by him while a member of that body was the introduction and passage of the act incorporating the Atlantic & Gulf Railroad company. During the winter of 1860-1 he was a member of the Georgia senate and time and again measured swords with Benjamin H. Hill, anti-secessionist. While absent from the state and entirely without solicitation on his part, he was called upon to represent Chatham county in the lower house during the legislative session of 1874-5. He was vice-president and chairman of the judiciary committee of the convention which, in 1877, framed the present constitution of Georgia. Gen. Lawton was president of the Tilden electoral college of Georgia in 1876, and chairman of the Georgia delegation to the national democratic convention that nominated Gen. Winfield S. Hancock at Cincinnati, and Grover Cleveland at Chicago. Early in 1885 he was nominated by President Cleveland as minister plenipotentiary to Russia, but technical objection being raised as to his eligibility under the fourteenth amendment of the national constitution, he urged the president to withdraw the nomination, though the point raised was not sustained by the attorney-general. The patriotism which thus laid upon the altar of democratic harmony one of the highest honors within the gift of the administration, won for him a reputation transcending any fame he could have acquired by an acceptance of the tendered mission. When congress reassembled in December, 1885, the first private act passed was one removing the political disabilities of Gen. Lawton. It received the unanimous vote of both houses. In April, 1887, President Cleveland conferred upon him the mission of Austria-Hungary. As minister plenipo-tentiary to that power, Gen. Lawton conducted himself and maintained diplomatic relations with marked acceptability both to his home government and to the Austrian court. His residence in Vienna, which extended over a period of two years, was entirely pleasant. His resignation of this official position was in the hands of the secretary of state prior to the inauguration of President Harrison, although, by request, he delayed his return home until the arrival of his successor. Since his return to Savannah Gen. Lawton has not resumed the practice of his profession, which he relinquished when he went abroad upon the mission just referred to. The war record of Gen. Lawton is a very brilliant one. He was the first colonel of the first volunteer regiment of Georgia, brigadier-general in the Confederate army in command of the military district of Georgia in 1861, served in Virginia in 1862, was wounded at Sharpsburg, Md., under Gen. Stonewall Jackson, and in August, 1863, was appointed quartermaster-general of the Confederate states, holding that rank at the termination of hostilities. As a lawyer and orator, Gen. Lawton is pre-eminent. He has had an enormous practice and as chief counsel of the Central railroad of Georgia for twenty-one years, has treated questions of private and corporate right in the supreme courts of Georgia, South Carolina and Florida, and in the United States supreme court. He is one of the ten founders of the American Bar association, and had a leading part in the formation of the Georgia Bar association. His address as president of the American Bar association on the lives and services of James L. Pettigrew and Hugh S. Legare, his eulogy on the life, character and services of Robert E. Lee, delivered in Savannah, and his oration upon the laying of the corner-stone of the new capitol of Georgia, by invitation of the general assembly, are all full of genuine eloquence. Gen. Lawton has long been recognized as a true type of the southern gentleman. He is now crowning a life of labor with an age of ease. His marriage in November, 1845, to Sarah H. Alexander, of Savannah, proved a source of unalloyed domestic happiness, and has been blessed by three children, viz.: Louisa F., wife of Mr. Leonard C. Mackall, of Philadelphia; Nora, wife of Henry C. Cunningham, of Savannah, and Alexander R. Lawton, Jr., of the Savannah bar, who is following in the footsteps of his illustrious father.

EDWARD LOVELL. Among those who have contributed by their enterprise and public spirit to the permanent growth and prosperity of Savannah, Edward Lowell will always have a prominent place. Mr. Lovell was born at Medway, Mass., March 4, 1816, and came to Savannah in 1835, then a little seaport having a limited commerce carried on by sloops and brigs, the river being too shallow to admit larger vessels. Mr. Lovell, as soon as he attained his majority, embarked in business for himself. His first venture was a gun store, both for the sale and repair of guns. In 1840 his success justified him in enlarging his business and adding thereto a line of hardware and house furnishing goods, and in 1857 he established the house of Lovell & Lattimore by associating his brother, Nathaniel Lovell, and his friend, William Lattimore, in co-partnership with him. In 1868 his son, Edward F. Lovell, having arrived at maturity, Mr. Edward Lovell retired from the firm of Lovell & Lattimore, leaving the good-will, the established stand or location of the business and the familiar firm name to his partners, and opened a place of business on Congress street, which was soon removed to Broughton street; and taking William C. Crawford and Edward F. Lovell, who had received their training under his watchful care, he continued his old business with their co-operation under the firm name of Crawford & Lovell. This firm soon commended itself to public patronage and continued until terminated by the death of Mr. Crawford in 1884. The business of the old firm having been speedily and satisfactorily adjusted a new firm took its place, comprised of Edward Lovell and his two sons, Edward F. Lovell and Robert P. Lovell, and soon the new firm became one of the largest hardware and iron houses in the state and has so continued, notwithstanding his death, which occurred on Aug. 25, 1888. Mr. Lovell by his sagacity and experience laid the foundation broad and deep for a growing and successful business and the impress of his wisdom and integrity is illustrated in the name of Edward Lovell's Sons, under which the business still continues. Mr. Lovell was a man of great industry and application, but so methodical and exact in all his transactions that he kept the even tenor of his way, without hurry or confusion, accomplishing a vast amount of work without excessive effort or apparent sacrifice of physical or mental activity. He was loyal to his adopted city. He had confidence in her ultimate success. He did not hoard his gains and after filling his coffers remove himself and his wealth to the place of his birth, there to enjoy in ease and comfort his well earned rest, but actively participated in every important enterprise that promised to advance the interest and prosperity of Savannah; invested his income judiciously in permanent improvements, in real estate in and out of the city, and became interested in financial and manufacturing ventures which have largely contributed to the growth and progress of Savannah. He was early interested in the Savannah & Ogeechee canal, which, in its day, floated millions of feet of lumber and timber to the city and before the construction of the Central railroad was an important highway of commerce to this point on the coast of Georgia. Mr. Lovell was its president for many years. He was a director in the Atlantic & Gulf railroad, president of the Savannah Brick Manufacturing company, vice-president of the Oglethorpe Savings and Trust company, while his name appeared as a stockholder and contributor to many of the corporations and associations formed for the promotion of manufacturing and commerce. Not only was Mr. Lovell loyal to his adopted home in contributing to its growth and material prosperity but he was also true to it in time of war and pestilence. Although he was exempt by age from service as a soldier he served the Confederacy in superintending the construction of batteries and earthworks in the defense around Savannah. With the capacity and fitness for business so eminently displayed Mr. Lovell possessed the estimable qualities of charity and benevolence, unostentatious but effective, dispensing relief to the needy and distressed with a lavish but discriminating hand. No worthy object ever appealed to him in vain. Mr. Lovell was married May 4, 1845, to Miss Mary A. Bates, of Cohasset, Mass., a devoted wife and constant companion. Together they pursued the even tenor of their way devoted to each other and their children. The widow did not long survive her husband. This worthy couple left a good name to their children, a heritage more lasting than wealth or earthly preferment. Mr. Lovell was social in his feelings and while immersed in business and discharging many duties and trusts he found time to participate in the pleasant associations of Odd Fellowship as a member of Live Oak lodge, and was for many years an active member of that time-honored corps, the Chatham artillery, a military company which united the discipline of the soldier and the amenities of social engagement more successfully than any other of the volunteer militia of Georgia. Mr. Lovell was an honorary member of the Chatham artillery at the time of his death.

M. YOUNG M'INTYRE, a prominent cotton factor of Savannah, Ga., was born in Thomasville, Thomas Co., Ga., Oct. 23, 1856. His father, A. T. McIntyre, is a native of Georgia, and a son of Archibald McIntyre, who was a native of Scotland. A. T. McIntyre is now engaged in the practice of law at Thomasville, Ga., at the age of seventy-two. Just prior to the civil war he was a member of the legislature of Georgia from the county of Thomas, and also represented the old First district of Georgia in the United States congress during the seventies. During the civil war Mr. McIntyre was a colonel of the Georgia state militia. Col. McIntyre has never held or sought office, preferring to devote his entire time to his business. M. Young McIntyre was reared and received his primary education in the city of Thomasville, attended the university of Georgia, at Athens, and was graduated from that institution, with the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy, in 1877. For the first five years next after his graduation he was in charge of his father's farm in Thomas county, Ga., and in 1882 he removed to Savannah, where, for one year, he was engaged as clerk for Capt. C. F. Stubbs, in the cotton business. Upon the death of his employer he became a member of the firm, under the style of Garnett, Stubbs & Co., which relation he sustained for two years, when he and his brother, Mr. D. I. McIntyre, entered the cotton business. In the spring of 1894 Mr. D. I. McIntyre disposed of his interest in this business, which has since been continued under the name of M. Y. McIntyre & Co. He is prominently identified with the directory of the Savannah Bank and Trust company, and among the more prominent social, fraternal and military organizations, is a member of the Masons, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Oglethorpe club, Savannah Yacht club, University club, a pay member of the Chatham artillery and the Georgia hussars, and vice-president of St. Andrew's Society of Scotchmen.

WILLIAM WHANN MACKALL, one of the leading attorneys of Savannah, Ga., was born in the city of Washington, D. C., on July 8, 1853. His father was Gen. William W. Mackall, of the United States army, a graduate of West Point Military academy, who was stationed in California until 1856, resigning that post at the commencement of the war between the states in order to remove to the southern states. The subject of this sketch came south with his father and resided in Macon and Savannah, Ga., and in Virginia. He received a limited education in the schools of Macon, graduating later from St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., his father having settled in Virginia some time prior to the year 1871. He was admitted to the bar in Maryland in 1875, one year later removing to Columbus, Ga., thence coming to Savannah, Ga., where he entered the office of Col. William Garrard on a salary, remaining in his employ for two years. He then formed a partnership with R. G. Erwin, which was continued for one year, and in 1880 he entered the firm of Collier & Charlton as a partner. Mr. Collier withdrew from the firm at the expiration of one year, the business being continued under the style of Charlton & Mackall. In 1890 Jefferson R. Anderson was added to the firm, its name being then changed to Charlton, Mackall & Anderson. Mr. Mackall takes no active part in politics, nor has he ever sought or held office of any kind.

ALEXANDER HARRISON MACDONELL, judge of the city court of Savannah, Ga., was born in Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., March 28, 1858. His father, Rev. George G. N. MacDonell, is a native of Savannah, Ga., and has been in the service of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, since 1855. He is now stationed at Columbus, Ga., as presiding elder of the Columbus district, South Georgia conference. On account of his father's connection with the Methodist itinerancy, the education of Alexander H. MacDonell was not received at any one town, he being prepared for college in the schools of Savannah and at Mercer university, preparatory department. In 1875 he entered Emory college, at Oxford, Ga., and was graduated from that institution four years later, with the degree of Master of Arts. Returning to Savannah, he began the study of law under Hon. J. R. Saussy, and was admitted to the bar at Savannah, in 1879. Until 1882 he practiced his profession alone, that year forming a partnership with J. E. Wooten, which was continued until 1886. In January, 1892, Mr. MacDonell was appointed judge of the city court of Savannah, his term of service expiring in January, 1896. Judge MacDonell is a fourteenth degree Scottish rite, and a third degree York rite Mason. He is also a member of the I. O. O. F., and of the Sons of St. Andrew. He has held important positions in both the Masons and Odd Fellows. He is a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, having been for several years past a steward in, and secretary of, the Wesley Monumental church, of Savannah. He was united in marriage, in 1886—Nov. 4—to Miss Lillian, daughter of Col. William Mercer, of Augusta, Ga.

PETER WILTBERGER MELDRIM, one of the leaders of the bar of Georgia, was born in Savannah, Ga., Dec. 4, 1848, and is a son of Ralph and Jane (Fawcett) Meldrim. His earlier education was acquired at Chatham academy, under a private tutor, and he was graduated with distinction from the academic department of the university of Georgia in 1868, being the anniversary orator of the Phi Kappa society; and from the law department in 1869. During the following winter, he began the practice of his profession at Savannah, and went steadily and rapidly to the front, winning a large and lucrative business. Two days before the state election of 1881, he was nominated for and elected state senator; but after serving two terms, he has since declined public life, and has devoted himself exclusively to the law. A writer, in summing up Mr. Meldrim's legislative service, says that it was active, high-toned and brilliant. He was ever ready to give his vote and his voice to those measures of policy, or to the statutes which seemed to him essential to individual and public welfare. In all his acts he reflected the liberality and intelligence of his constituents, and for this was beloved and admired by all who witnessed his course. His efforts in debate sustained his reputation as an orator. As chairman of the committee of military affairs, he was indefatigable in his labors in behalf of the perfect organization, equipment and discipline of the volunteer troops of the state. His speeches on this subject before the committees, and in the senate, were models of eloquence and logic. Then, when the bill to make tuition forever free at the state university was put upon its passage and the measure was violently opposed, he came to the rescue fearlessly and grandly, aiding materially in bringing about the happy result of its triumphant passage. His constituents and the people of Georgia have reason to be proud of his talents and character. For several years Mr. Meldrim has been associated with Col. William Garrard in the practice of law. These gentlemen have long had the reputation of enjoying one of the largest practices in the city of Savannah. Mr. Meldrim is the court-house lawyer of the firm, and is remarkably successful in both civil and criminal practice. In many of the Georgia decisions, where appear Mr. Meldrim's cases, there are high compliments from the supreme bench. In all things appertaining to Irish affairs, he takes a deep interest, and has been president of the Hibernian society for years. He is major of the Fifth regiment of Georgia cavalry, to which position he was promoted from a lieutenancy in the Georgia Hussars. He is also a member of the board of trustees of the university of Georgia, and president of the Alumni society of that institution. He has been an earnest worker and member of the Jasper Monument association, and aided very materially in the erection of the monument to Sergt. Jasper, in Madison square, Savannah. Maj. Meldrim is probably the warmest friend that the cause of the state aid to education has in the limits of Georgia, and he aided in securing free tuition at the university of Georgia. As a speaker, Maj. Meldrim is ornate, strong, and shows very wide reading. He has delivered the annual address before the Georgia Historical society, the university of Georgia, and numerous literary addresses. Every political canvass brings Mr. Meldrim to the front. Candidates need his aid and influence, which is far-reaching; and, being a good planner and organizer, his friends invariably get him interested. He is too busy with pressing professional business to aspire to office himself, but every two years he is urged to become a candidate for congress. Maj. Meldrim was happily married in 1891 to Miss Fannie P. Casey, daughter of that distinguished citizen of Savannah, Dr. H. R. Casey. The Meldrim residence in Savannah is one of the most stately and beautiful homes in the southern states. It is possessed of historic interest from the fact of its having been the headquarters of Gen. Sherman when the city of Savannah was captured, at the termination of his celebrated march to the sea.

MALCOLM MACLEAN, cotton factor, of Savannah, Ga., was born in North Uist, Inverness shire, Scotland, March 17, 1837, and resided there until eighteen years of age. In 1855 he came to the United States, landing at Newport, Fla., where he at once entered the employ of McNaught & Ormond, general merchandise and commission men, receiving for his services $12.50 per month for the first six months. When this firm established a branch house in Savannah in 1860, known as McNaught, Beard & Co., Mr. Maclean was made clerk and confidential man, and remained in that position until a few months before the outbreak of the war between the states. Leaving this firm, he engaged with Duncan & Johnston, cotton merchants in Savannah, Ga., for a few months, and then enlisted as a private in the Oglethorpe State artillery. A few months later, when the company disbanded, he enlisted in the Savannah Volunteer guards, and served with that command to the close of the war. He was wounded and captured at the battle of Sailor's Creek, Va., and was held at Fort McHenry until the war closed. On the reorganization of the Savannah Volunteer guards, in 1872, he was elected second lieutenant of Company B, of that battalion, but was, by exactions of business, compelled to resign this office, when he was elected an honorary exempt member of that command. He has always felt a lively interest in the volunteer soldiery of the state, and is always ready to aid and encourage them in their efforts to attain proficiency. After his release from Fort McHenry, he returned to Savannah, and three days later secured a position as purchasing agent and commissary for the Atlantic & Gulf railroad—now the Savannah, Florida & Western railway—which he held for three months. Re-entering the employ of Duncan & Johnston, in 1865, he was successively bookkeeper, cashier, and partner, but the yellow fever appearing in Savannah in 1876, he was forced to give up his business connection with this firm, and accepted a position as cashier for the receivers of the Atlantic & Gulf railroad, serving in that capacity for six months. Again entering the cotton business in Savannah on his individual account, he has continued in that line to this time, and has been very successful. Mr. Maclean, in addition to other extensive business interests, is a member of the board of directors of the Merchants' National bank, Ocean Steamship company, Planters' rice mill, of Savannah; the Kincaid Manufacturing company, of Griffin, Ga.; the New England & Savannah Steamship company, and one of the board of managers of the Savannah hospital. He is a Knight Templar Mason, and has served as president of the St. Andrew's society, of Savannah. He is a member of the Independent Presbyterian church, and has never sought or held public office. He was married on Dec. 2, 1875, to Mary McIntosh Mills, daughter of Capt. James G. Mills, deceased, of Savannah, and they have seven living children: Annie Macdonald, Edward Mills, Marion Morrison, Cernelia Sams, Malcolm Roderick, George Mills, and Charles Mills.

COL. GEORGE A. MERCER, the ranking line officer of the Georgia state troops, was born in Savannah, Ga., Feb. 9, 1835, and is a son of Gen. Hugh Weedon and Mary S. (Anderson) Mercer. His paternal grandmother was the daughter of Cyrus Griffin, of Virginia, the president of the continental congress. Gen. Hugh Weedon Mercer was a native of Fredericksburg, Va., and was born in 1808; he was graduated from the United States Military academy at West Point in 1828, in the class of Jefferson Davis, and one class behind that of Gen. Robert E. Lee. In 1833, he resigned from the army and settled in Savannah, became cashier of the Planters' bank, and filled that position until the breaking out of the civil war. He was the second colonel (and afterward brigadier-general) of the first volunteer regiment of Georgia. He served throughout the war, doing duty chiefly on the coast of South Carolina and Georgia, and in the western army, under Gens. Joseph E. Johnston and Hood. At the close of hostilities, he returned to Savannah, and then went to Europe, dying at Baden Baden, Germany, in 1877. He was a son of Col. Hugh Mercer, the president of the old Farmers' bank, of Fredericksburg, for many years. Gen. Hugh Mercer was an intimate friend of George Washington, and was killed at the battle of Princeton during the war of the revolution. Mrs. Mary S. (Anderson) Mercer was a native of Savannah, and a daughter of George Anderson, a prominent merchant of that city. Of the three children, now living, born to Hugh and Mary S. Mercer, the distinguished subject of this sketch is the eldest, the other two being Mrs. Mary S. Walker and Robert Lee Mercer. George Anderson Mercer received his preliminary education in Savannah, and at the age of thirteen was sent to the celebrated school of Prof. Russell, in New Haven, Conn. Returning to Savannah, he became a pupil of the well-known teacher, Prof. William T. Feay, who prepared him for college. He entered the sophomore class of Princeton college, and was graduated therefrom with the degree of Master of Arts in 1856. He attended the law school of the university of Virginia in 1857, visited Europe the following year, and, upon his return to Savannah, he entered the law office of Lloyd & Owens, being admitted to the bar in Savannah in 1859. After admission, he was in the office of Ward, Jackson & Jones for one year, and was then taken into partnership with George A. Gordon, then counsel for the Central railroad of Georgia. At the breaking out of the civil war, Mr. Mercer entered the Confederate service as a corporal of the Republican Blues, of Savannah. In November, 1861, he was appointed assistant adjutant-general, with the rank of captain of infantry, and served along the coast of Georgia, and in 1864 he was transferred to the western army, where he was in service at the surrender. The following year, 1865, after having been captured by the Federal forces under Gen. Wilson, at Macon, Ga., he was paroled and returned to Savannah, where, as soon as the courts were open, he resumed the practice of his profession, which soon became large and lucrative. In 1872-74 he represented Chatham county in the Georgia legislature, accepting the place at the earnest solicitation of many friends, but has never held any other office, once refusing the Federal judgeship of Georgia. Upon the reorganization of the Savannah military he was chosen captain of the Republican Blues, organized in 1868, and held that rank fifteen years. He is now colonel of the First Volunteer regiment of Georgia, and is the ranking officer of the line in the state. Col. Mercer has always taken an active interest in the local affairs of his native city and in the development of her educational system. He was president of the board of trustees of the Savannah Medical college, and is president of the educational board of the city of Savannah and the county of Chatham, a member of the trustees of the Chatham academy, the Georgia Historical society, and the Telfair Academy of Arts and Sciences. He is also an active member of the Georgia and the American Bar associations. He was chosen a delegate to the Chicago national democratic convention of 1892, and was a warm supporter of the claims of Grover Cleveland for the presidency. He was married in 1861, at Fredericksburg, Va., to Nannie Maury Herndon, daughter of Dr. B. S. Herndon. Mrs. Mercer departed this life in June, 1885. Of the seven children born of that union, five survive, viz.: George A., Jr., Lewis Herndon, Robert Lee, Edward Clifford Anderson, and Nannie Maury, the wife of J. M. Lang, of Savannah, Ga.

GEORGE MEYER, general manager of the Georgia Brewing association, of Savannah, was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., June 19, 1860, and was reared and educated in that city, graduating from the grammar school in 1875. At the age of fifteen he apprenticed himself to a baker in Savannah, but was stricken the following year with the yellow fever, which incapacitated him for duty for a long time, and at the instance of his physician, he took a position with the Knickerbocker Ice company, of that city, requiring outdoor work, and drove one of their delivery wagons. Two years later he was promoted to the position of general superintendent of the delivery system of that company, and in 1884 he accepted the agency of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing association in Savannah, consolidating his business with that of the Wolters Brewing company, in 1892. On petition of the stockholders, the receivership of that company was placed in his hands during October, the following year. He served as receiver six months, during which time, by judicious management, he increased the value of the brewery plant many thousand dollars. In March, 1894, the Georgia Brewing association was formed by the creditors of the Wolters company, and Mr. Meyer was elected general manager of the plant, retaining that position at this time. The Georgia Brewing association has a capital stock of $48,000, Mr. Meyer being the largest individual stockholder. The annual output of this plant will reach this year 15,000 barrels. Mr. Meyer is a stockholder in the Savannah Savings bank, is a retired member of the local turnverein, the I. O. O. F., the Knights of Pythias, and the uniform rank. He is also prominently identified with the German volunteers, in which military organization he saw active service for ten years. His home life is a very happy one. He was married in 1890 to Amelia W., daughter of the late August Walter, and that union has been blessed with the birth of two manly sons—Walter Rudolph and George Herman.

HERMAN MYERS, mayor of Savannah, Ga., was born in Germany, Jan. 18, 1847, and is a son of Sigmund and Fannie Myers. The family emigrated to the United States in 1852 and settled in Bath county, W. Va., where Herman lived until 1862, when the family removed to Lynchburg, Va. From 1854 to 1862 Herman attended the schools of Richmond, Va., and in 1867 came to Savannah, Ga., and in connection with his two brothers, Fred S. and Sigo, established a wholesale tobacco business on a rather extensive scale under the firm name of H. Myers & Bros., they being the pioneers of that line of business in the city of Savannah. In 1890, the tobacco business was discontinued by the brothers, and they and others organized the Savannah Grocery company. The controlling interest of the Savannah Grocery company is now owned by the Myers brothers, its capital stock being $200,000, and doing an annual business of $1,000,000. Herman Myers is also president of the El Modelo Cigar Manufacturing company, located at Jacksonville, Fla., which does an annual business of $500,000, and he is a large stockholder in the B. F. Gravely & Co., limited, tobacco manufactory, located at Martinsville, Va. In 1886, the National bank of Savannah was organized, with Mr. Myers as president, which position he has since retained. He is also vice-president of the Oglethorpe Savings and Trust company, of Savannah. He has served five terms as alderman of the city of Savannah, during the entire period of his incumbency being chairman of the finance committee. On Jan. 22, 1895, after one of the most exciting contests ever known in the history of the city, he was elected mayor of the municipality of Savannah, his opponent being Dr. Duncan, one of the city's most prominent residents, whom he defeated by a majority of 700 votes. In the exalted office of mayor Mr. Myers has proven himself one of the most progressive administrators of public affairs the city of Savannah has ever known, and has demonstrated what is possible to the young men of the country who are the architects of their own fortunes, a striking object lesson of what is in reach of those who have a determination to succeed in life, against whatever odds. Mr. Myers is a member of the Knights of Pythias, a master Mason, a member of the B'nai Brith and the Hebrew church. He is not married.

THOMAS MASON NORWOOD, lawyer and ex-United States senator, Savannah, Ga., was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1830. He was graduated from Emory college, Georgia, in 1850, admitted to the bar in 1852, and began the practice of his profession in Savannah in 1857. In 1861-62 he was a member of the state legislature, and in 1868 was an alternate elector on the Seymour and Blair ticket. In 1870 he was chosen to fill an unexpired term in the United States senate, and was elected a year later for a full term, serving until 1877. His seat was unsuccessfully contested by Foster Blodgett. In his political canvass in 1870 he won celebrity by a series of newspaper articles written under the pseudonym of Nemesis, and his senatorial career was distinguished by two speeches he delivered, which were models of polished invective. Upon the expiration of his senatorial term he resumed his practice at Savannah, and is one of the foremost lawyers of the state.

PATRICK JOSEPH O'CONNOR, national president of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and a member of the well-known law firm of O'Connor & O'Byrne, of Savannah, Ga., was born in that city on Sept. 25, 1859. His father, Daniel, was a native of Ireland. He was a manufacturer in the city of Savannah for many years, served as alderman of that city for four years, and died there in 1887. Patrick J. O'Connor was reared and educated in the city of Savannah, in 1877 attending the Pio Nono college, Macon, Ga. He then entered the law department of that famous Catholic institution, Georgetown college, in the District of Columbia, and was graduated therefrom in June, 1880. Returning to Savannah, the following January he was admitted to the bar in that city, and practiced his profession alone until 1890, when he was admitted to partnership with M. A. O'Byrne. He has actively and successfully followed the practice since his admission to the bar. From 1883-87 Mr. O'Connor served on the aldermanic board of Savannah, and has ever evinced a very active interest in the politics of that municipality. He is a consistent member of the Catholic church, is a pay member of the Irish Jasper Greens, a prominent military organization of the city of Savannah, and also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. At the national convention of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, held at Omaha, Neb., he was elected the national president of that order, which has more than 150,000 members in the United States. The private life of Mr. O'Connor is ideal. He was very happily married in November, 1883, to Miss Winnifred, the daughter of Thomas Maher, a prominent citizen of Savannah. That union has been blessed by the birth of a son and three daughters.

CAPT. DANIEL G. PURSE. No one has stamped his impress upon the development of his section to a greater degree than Capt. Daniel G. Purse, president of the Savannah, Ga., board of trade. A man gifted with so keen a foresight, of such broad intellectuality, masterful and prolific in originating, and absolutely tireless in advancing enterprises calculated to benefit his city and section, exhaustive in expedients to foster them, magnetic, persuasive and logical in presenting his views, and with an executive ability that is rarely possessed by those of such fertile genius, it is no wonder that by common consent his people seek to enlist his directive energy in all great enterprises affecting the future prosperity of the principal city and seaport of the South Atlantic states. Capt. Purse inherits much of his father's enterprising spirit and exhaustive ability. The elder Purse was one of the principal projectors of the Central railroad of Georgia, to whose indomitable spirit it may be safely said the success of the enterprise was made possible. When an effort was being made to secure a stock subscription of $500,000 in the enterprise from the city of Savannah, one of the speakers at a public meeting said Savannah could not subscribe $5,000. Thos. Purse took the stand and said Savannah could not only, but would, subscribe $500,000 (a vast sum in the forties for Savannah) and he pledged himself to see that it would be done. It was raised in stock and he himself negotiated the loan for nearly half a million dollars, which resulted in the building of the first great system of southern railways, and not one dollar of the subscription was lost to the city. As its first superintendent, as alderman, mayor of his city and as state senator, the elder Purse manifested a fidelity to every public trust, second only to the zeal and ability which were traits of character that he transmitted to the son. Capt. Purse is a native of Savannah in his fifty-sixth year, but with the energy, vigor and spirit of a man of thirty. Educated for the law, circumstances beyond his control forced him into commercial pursuits. The war between the sections led him to give up his business to enlist in the army of the Confederacy and he was serving in the supply department with the title of captain when peace was restored. Like many others, he returned depleted in purse to resume his commercial life, which he conducted with a success characteristic of the man. Among some of the enterprises with which he has been connected (for in the narrow limit of a sketch like this all of them cannot be embraced) the principal ones are the Tybee railroad, built from Savannah through twenty miles of salt marsh, an enterprise that was held by many to be impracticable, if not impossible, yet he projected and completed it, and it has made Tybee island famous as one of the most inviting resorts in the south. The plan of veneering the banks of the railroad through the marsh with the marsh sod was an experiment unheard of in railroad construction and it was not thought possible to secure by an embankment, except at great cost for piling, protection that would not be influenced by the winds and washing tides. The success of the marsh sod, Capt. Purse's conception, was beyond expectation, and attracted the widest attention in this country and Europe. Russian engineers were quick to adopt it in railway construction through the steppes. As the father was the originator of the time-table for railways, so the son was the inventor of this economical protection for railway tracks through semiaqueous marshes by a method as simple as it is practical, as the great storm of August, 1893, has abundantly shown, although so severe a test was never contemplated. For years the cities and towns of the South Atlantic and gulf states drew their water supply either from muddy and contaminated streams or surface wells. The water was not conducive of health, and in fact much of the sickness among the people of the semi-tropics was due to the insanitary water they were compelled to drink. The first artesian well was sunk by him in Savannah, under the most adverse circumstances and discouraging criticism of the people and of the press, but a strata of pure water was reached at a distance of less than 500 feet, which caused a revolution in the water supply. Savannah now draws all its water from a system of wells of this kind, yielding 10,000,000 gallons daily, exclusive of the many private artesian wells, while the coast towns and cities of South Carolina, Georgia and Florida all draw upon the artesian supply to the marked increase of health. Prior to the building of the Tybee railroad, Capt. Purse had made a reputation as a financier by his management of one of the banking institutions of the city. He took the presidency when the bank was not only without surplus, but actually impaired seventeen per cent. and its stock down to seventy, and brought it to a standard equal to any in the south, which it has ever since been able to maintain, giving it several years' service without remuneration. The confidence reposed in him was well shown by a special loan of a quarter of a million dollars he secured for the institution, upon his individual representations, on what others thought would be a fruitless visit to the east, which loan was absolutely necessary to save the bank when he first assumed the presidency in its depleted condition from being compelled to go into liquidation, and the bank in which confidence had been shaken, under his administration survived the heavy losses that had fallen upon it prior to his management, and when he voluntarily resigned to connect himself with other enterprises he left it one of the most stable institutions of its kind in the south. As chairman of the finance committee of the city council he succeeded in funding the city's seven per cent. bonded indebtedness in 1877 at five per cent. when some of the heaviest holders of the city's credit gave him to understand that there would be no use to ask it. At the instance of the bond-holders and at the request of the mayor and city council, he in his capacity of chairman of the finance committee of the city council addressed the holders of the bonds at Baltimore, Charleston, S. C., and at other places, and when he left the meetings he carried with him in each instance the written consent of every holder present to funding the debt. Probably his greatest and most far-reaching work was that of planning and conducting what is known as the "campaign of education" for government aid in deepening the harbor of Savannah. His connection with that movement gave him national reputation. His communications to the press, to the governors and legislators of the different states, his addresses to the commercial bodies of the south, the west and the northwest, and to the state and national farmers' convention, were able and convincing, and led to the appropriation by the government of $3,500,000 for harbor improvements, all of which has been appropriated and nearly all expended, and to-day Savannah has practically a twenty-six foot channel from her wharves to the ocean. Capt. Purse deserves every honor Savannah can bestow upon him for the part he has performed in the accomplishment of this great work. Capt. Purse is now serving his fifth term as president of the board of trade, something unexampled in the history of that organization, in which position he has done much to advance the interest not only of his own city, but of other ports of the South Atlantic. Believing in the admission of raw materials free from the burdens of a tariff tax, the board of trade at his instance took early and pronounced action on the subject and largely influenced like action on the part of commercial and trade organizations in other parts of the United States. Capt. Purse is one of the honorary vice-presidents of the Cotton States and International exposition opening at Atlanta on Sept. 18, and is commissioner in charge of Savannah's splendid exhibit. Capt. Purse has ever been one of the most pronounced and zealous advocates of sound money, and the resolutions of the board of trade adopted at different times in advocacy of sound money have the earmarks of his strong and decisive methods of thought. The Savannah bureau of freight and transportation, organized and operating in the interest of Savannah's commerce and against unjust discriminations affecting all the South Atlantic ports, is the result of his foresight and labor. At first he declined the commissionership which would have entailed upon him the active management and direction of the bureau; but recently, upon the resignation of the commissioner first elected, he has been called the unanimous vice-director and share-holder to the vacancy to meet the demand for a vigorous and aggressive policy on the part of the bureau in dealing with the embarrassment entailed upon Savannah's commerce, and that of the ports of Charleston and Brunswick, by what are considered unjust discriminations in freight, etc. Far-reaching results are expected to result from Capt. Purse's incumbency of the commissionership. In his work he will enlist the hearty co-operation of the ports of Charleston and Brunswick. In his general pacificatory policy in dealing with commercial questions he has done much to bring about a friendship and harmony between Savannah and rival ports, and this is practically true of the cordial relations now existing between Charleston and Savannah, due in a large measure to the course pursued by Capt. Purse since his accession to the presidency of the board of trade. Capt. Purse is engaged in formulating plans for the projection of enterprises that will be of vast importance to the south, and which will, if possible, make him even more prominent in the history of southern development and progress. That he will succeed, who can doubt? We have not attempted to deal with the various local enterprises in which he has been prominent, such as street railway construction, the introduction of electric light and power, or his connection with almost every enterprise calculated to foster the growth and prosperity of his city. At one time extensively interested in rice planting, he has been in this and other ways closely allied with agricultural interests and was elected vice-president of the National Farmers' alliance at Sedalia, Mo., in 1891, presiding at its session at Lincoln, Neb., in 1893 and in Savannah in 1894 in the absence of President Smith, of Kansas. After declining an election as president, which was unanimously tendered him, he was elected the first life honorary member of that body. He is prominent in masonic circles, having taken every degree up to and inclusive of the Scottish rite and thirty-second degree, and for twelve years has successfully and ably managed the large property interests of Solomon's lodge No. 1, F. & A. M., the oldest lodge in the United States, with an uninterrupted history back to the date of its charter in 1735, with Gen. James Oglethorpe, founder of Georgia, its first worshipful master. Capt. Purse has a happy family—wife and five sons—having married Miss Laura Ashby, a Virginia lady, sister of Col. Henry M. Ashby, of Wheeler's cavalry, first cousin of the famous Confederate cavalry officer, Gen. Turner Ashby. Their home is on one of the most beautiful boulevards of the city. Those who have experienced its hospitality know it to be as cordial as the zeal of its owner in the prosecution of an enterprise is endless and tireless. The south is quite sure to hear more of him in the era of material development and progress upon the threshold of which it stands, and it will be well to keep an eye on him. He has a genius for vast and valuable public enterprises of practical utility, and has shown the uncommon blending of the business capacity to execute with the greatest faculty for originating broad and progressive undertakings for the public welfare. Such a union is as rare as it is remarkable, and any community is fortunate in having in its citizenship a spirit so richly endowed and so willing to devote his surpassing powers to the public good.

THOMAS PORCHER RAVENEL, one of the most prominent attorneys of Savannah, Ga., was born in St. John's, Berkeley parish, Charleston district, state of South Carolina, on Oct. 3, 1850. His father, Thomas Porcher Ravenel, was a native of the same parish as the son, and his ancestors had resided there for two centuries. The gentleman whose name heads this sketch was reared in the village of Pinopolis, which was a sort of summer resort for the adjacent planters, and on his father's plantation, near that village. At the evacuation of Charleston, at the age of fourteen years he entered the Confederate service as a volunteer courier for Maj. George Lamb Buist, and served until the surrender at Greensboro, N. C. After the close of hostilities he attended school in Aiken, S. C., until the autumn of 1867, and the following spring removed to Darien, Ga., where he began the study of law under Hon. W. Robert Gignilliat. In 1870 he came to Savannah and entered the office of his present partner, Hon. Rufus E. Lester, member of congress from the first district of Georgia. He was admitted to the bar at Chatham superior court in 1871, and formed the present partnership nine years later. Mr. Ravenel stands of equal stature with his distinguished colleagues at the Savannah bar and is one of the most prominent young attorneys of the south. He is vestryman of St. John's Episcopal church, of Savannah. Young, talented, and the possessor of great family prestige, the future holds much in store for him.

GARLAND MITCHELL RYALS, the pioneer truck farmer of Georgia, and first vice-president of the National Farmers' congress, was born in the county of Cumberland, Va., May 27, 1839, of Vincent C. and Hardenia (Mitchell) Ryals. His parents combined farming and merchandising at their little country place, known as "Oak Forest." For the first few years of his boyhood Garland attended the old field schools of the neighborhood during the week, and on Saturdays, holidays and vacations assisted his father in the farming operations and behind the counters of the store. At twelve years of age he was considered an expert salesman and a good collector, and at thirteen was sent to a boarding school in Buckingham county. The sessions of this school commenced very soon after sunrise on the first day of January, and closed about sunset on the thirty-first day of October, without intermission or holiday of any kind. The teacher, Rev. John J. Berryman, required the scholars to assemble in his office and there pursue their studies for one or two hours during the night. The following year Mr. Ryals' father and others induced Rev. Berryman to remove his school to "Oak Forest," which was done; but about that time the old teacher and pedagogue concluded to take unto himself a wife—thus putting an end to his school. At this juncture the elder Ryals was dismissed from the Baptist church for communing with the Campbellites, and thereupon said "Elder Ryals" took his son, Mitchell, to Richmond and arrayed him in "store" clothes, filled his pockets reasonably well with money, and sent him to Bethany college, founded by that great and good leader of the Christian denomination, Alexander Campbell, and located in Brooke county, W. Va. At this institution young Ryals managed to remain for two nights and two days, thence making his escape into the state of Ohio, where he rusticated for several days, and then returned to his father's house. For the succeeding two or three years he sold goods at his father's store and acted as his bookkeeper, not, however, forgetting to ride many weary leagues on Sundays in order to visit the rosy-cheeked girls of that God-favored neighborhood. At eighteen years of age he was tendered the position of deputy sheriff of his county, which he accepted, qualified and filled acceptably until the commencement of the war between the states. He entered the war in the Cumberland troop of cavalry, an old organization dating from the war of the revolution, of which his father was a member. He left Cumberland C. H. as color sergeant of his company, proudly bearing the colors which had been lovingly woven by the deft fingers of the fair daughters of the county of Amelia. At Ashland, a few days thereafter, he was mustered into the service as second sergeant of the Cumberland troop, Fourth Virginia cavalry, which was ordered to report to Gen. Magruder in the peninsula, where he assisted in watching the blockading squadron, doing picket and scout duty, and, by way of innocent diversion, helped to burn the city of Hampton. During the winter of 1861-62 Sergt. Ryals was commissioned as second lieutenant of infantry, provisional army of the Confederate states, the commission reading "for gallant and meritorious conduct." Being ordered to report to Gen. Albert Sidney Johnson, he was assigned to duty with the First Kentucky cavalry, commanded by the gallant Benjamin Harden Helm, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Lincoln, wife of the president. He remained with the First Kentucky cavalry, and was on staff duty with Gen. Helm's brigade of infantry from Murfreesboro, Corinth, the siege of Vicksburg of '62, and Baton Rouge, La., where Gen. Helm lost a large portion of his officers in battle. At his own request he was ordered by the secretary of war to join the army of northern Virginia, and served first with Fitz Lee's cavalry brigade, then with Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, and upon the recommendations of these generals was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant of cavalry, then captain, and afterward major. He also served as provost marshal of Stuart's cavalry corps, and was with that gallant commander from May, 1863, to the day of his death at Yellow Tavern in 1864. The following is the correspondence bearing upon Mr. Ryals' successive promotions in the service:

Headquarters Lee's Cavalry Division,
Madison Co., Nov. 23, 1863.

I take pleasure in recommending Lieut. Ryals for the promotion he justly claims. He was for a long time one of my staff officers and his efficiency shown in the discharge of his duties, his bravery and gallant bearing displayed on the field of battle, are beyond question.

Gen. S. Cooper, A. and I. Gen.

General:—I respectfully forward three additional recommendations of Lieut. G. M. Ryals, C. S. A., lately recommended by me to be appointed major. I hope these will add sufficient weight to those already sent in to induce the department to reconsider its action in his case and give him the appointment of major instead of captain. His case is by no means an ordinary one. No officer of his rank in the Confederacy has half the claim for promotion. It certainly must be the desire of the department to promote, as far as is compatible with law, those whose fidelity and distinguished gallantry have made them the special objects of commendation from all the commanders with whom they are thrown. I have in my former letter shown that it would be compatible and very desirable. The value of promotion is always comparative, and taken in this particular connection, I renew this application for Lieut. Ryals as an officer like him of the Confederate states army, without one-fourth the active service, whose deeds cannot be mentioned the same day with those of Lieut. Ryals, has, without my knowledge or consent or that of the commanding general, been returned to my command with the rank of major, P. A. C. S., to command in Young's brigade, the variable quantity constituting the dismounted battalion. I allude to H. S. Farley, second lieutenant of infantry, C. S. A., and major P. A. C. S., to whom I do no injustice to say that Lieut. Ryals should be at least two grades higher in rank. It is highly prejudicial to the service to decline to promote the highly deserving, recommended by their immediate commanders in the most urgent terms through the proper channels for such communication, while another, less deserving, whose claims are presented by indirect means or in person, without the knowledge of his immediate commander, is put above the former. I have had full and fair opportunity to observe Lieut. Ryals. He is different from many officers in one respect. He displays the same zeal in all duties to which he may be assigned; while the majority of officers may be efficient and zealous in some, but are averse to others, and by demurs and lack of zeal render them worse than useless in such. I recommend Lieut. Ryals and Capt. White from an earnest conviction, based on long and intimate official acquaintance, that they deserved the positions and that the service will be greatly benefited by their proposed advancement. Every officer of my command, with the same opportunities, concurs in my recommendation. I sincerely hope that the department will not in this case, as was done in that of the lamented Pelham, whose promotion was so often and so earnestly recommended by me, defer a recognition of these deserving officers until it is too late to touch their mortal careers. I have the honor to be, general,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Lieut. Ryals is zealous, faithful, extremely brave and cool in action—always distinguishes himself in action by his conspicuous gallantry—well versed in his duties as an officer, has been in a great number of battles—his own promotion has been the last thing to receive his attention—universally regarded, where known, as a most deserving officer. Is second lieutenant in the regular army, and as he is provost marshal of the corps, his appointment as major in the provisional army is legitimate under the law.

Gen. S. Cooper, A. and I. G.

Sir:—I have the honor to recommend Lieut. G. M. Ryals for the appointment of major. I have had numerous opportunities of witnessing Lieut. Ryals' coolness and gallantry. He has been provost marshal of the cavalry corps for some time and has given great satisfaction. His ability, service and merits justly entitle him to promotion. I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,

John B. Gordon, Brigadier-General.

Reporting to Gen. Wade Hampton for service, Maj. Ryals was with him at Trevillian's depot, at Nancy shop, in Kent county, at Sophronia church, and at Ream's station. At this time the infantry service was subsisting on corn as rations, and were begging for "fodder;" whereupon Gen. Hampton concluded to make a forced loan, and went to Cabin Point, on the James river, borrowed 2,464 head of the finest beef cattle obtainable, brought them safely from the rear of the Federal army, and turned the larger part of them over to his famished brothers of the infantry service; after which it was not unusual to see whole brigades rush from their tents to shake hands with a lone cavalryman. For the part he took in this cattle expedition Maj. Ryals was favorably mentioned by Gen. Hampton, afterward serving with Gen. Fitz Lee to Appomattox court house.

On the day of the surrender his services were recognized by the cavalry officers of rank and by them recommended repeatedly for promotion.

After the close of hostilities Maj. Ryals settled in Nelson county, Va., where he farmed, merchandised, and cut cordwood and railroad ties, with varied success. In the fall of 1868 he removed to Georgia and settled in the city of Savannah, where he did a drayage business for six years, and then connected with it a cotton farm in Screven county, and a truck farm in Chatham county. Since July, 1881, the major has devoted his entire time and attention to the trucking industry, and though the experiment was not at first a great success he has never failed to make a good living and to lay up something for a rainy day and year. A portion of his savings he has invested in the stock of the Germania bank of Savannah, and is now one of the directors of that prosperous institution. He conducts his truck farm upon the intensive system of high fertilization. Manures and composts are gathered the year around, a large number of teams being used for this purpose, which is spread broadcast upon the land, high grade commercial fertilizers also being used very liberally. He attributes his marked success as a truck farmer very largely to the use of these manures and fertilizers, but he insists that too much cannot be said in praise of cow peas as a means of improving the fertility of the soil and putting land in admirable tilth. This system is to permit the peas to die down upon the land, instead of turning them under green, as far as possible. He also uses freely the very best turning plows, subsoils and pulverizers upon his farm of 150 acres, upon which there are twenty-one head of mules. He uses much care in the selection of seed for all crops, ordering only from the very best houses of respectability and long standing. He employs twenty-five hands regularly and 200 hands at times; shipping and selling at home as much as $25,000 worth of vegetables and farm products in a year and paying from $4,000 to $8,000 in freights. Maj. Ryals is a gentleman of sterling qualities and marked influence and public spirit. He is serving his second term as director of the experimental farm of Georgia from the first congressional district, is president of the Truck Growers' association of the county of Chatham, and first vice-president of the National Farmers' congress. He is a stanch democrat, and always takes a lively interest in the political affairs of his county, state and nation. He has never filled any political office, except to serve as one of the three representatives from the county of Chatham in the general assembly of Georgia, in which he was chairman of the committee on special agriculture. He was a delegate to the democratic state convention in 1880, and served as chairman of the democratic executive committee of the first congressional district for many years. The major is a master Mason, a pay member of the Georgia hussars, and although not an active member of any church organization he affiliates with the Christian denomination. He was married in Charlottesville, Va., on Feb. 24, 1864, to Elizabeth, daughter of D. W. Kennedy. His old commander, Gen. Stuart, had been invited to his nuptials, but finding that it would be impossible for him to be present, sent the following letter, which the major now treasures:

Headquarters Cavalry Corps, Army Northern Virginia,
Feb. 23, 1864.

My Dear Major:—I deeply regret that I cannot be present at your nuptials to-morrow. I send, however, a very worthy representative in my particular friend, Surgeon Covey. Do me the kindness to assure the bride of my prayers and best wishes for long life and happiness, and believe me,

Your sincere friend,

J. E. B. Stuart.

Mrs. Elizabeth Ryals departed this life in 1869, leaving as issue one daughter, Carrie L. Some time before his marriage, while still a citizen of Nelson county, Va., he wrote to Gen. Robert E. Lee, telling him of the wreck and ruin that encompassed him on every hand and of his determination to repair his own fortune, and in reply received this letter from the leader of the Confederate forces:

Lexington, Va., Jan. 13, 1868.

My Dear Captain:—I am glad to learn from your letter of the 10th that you have set manfully to work to repair your wasted fortune. If you will carry into your business the same energy, attention and fortitude which you exhibited while attached to the army of northern Virginia, I shall feel sure of your success. Wishing you all happiness and prosperity, I am, very truly yours,

R. E. Lee.

Capt. G. M. Ryals.

On Oct. 24, 1870, Maj. Ryals was joined in the bonds of matrimony to his present estimable wife, Anna B., daughter of Col. T. E. Ware, a prominent citizen of Greenville, S. C. This union has been blessed by the birth of four children, viz.: James W., Edwin C., Sidney G., and Mary L. The home life of the major is ideal, and being generous and hospitable, he is a general favorite with all who know him.

MAJ. JOHN SCHWARZ, vice-president of the Savannah Steam bakery, is a native of Zweilruecken, kingdom of Bavaria, Germany, is the son of John and Margaret (Braun) Schwarz, and was born Sept. 23, 1840. His paternal grandfather was Nicholas Schwarz. John Schwarz came to the United States in 1848, was a coal and iron merchant, and died in Savannah, Ga., in 1868. Mrs. Margaret Schwarz died in New York city, in 1873. John Schwarz is the second of three children born to his parents, the others being Emily and Nicholas. He learned the trade of a baker in his native country, coming to the United States at the age of fifteen, landing at New York. The voyage across the Atlantic was made in a sailing vessel and lasted for thirty days. He remained in New York city for one and a half years working at his trade, then secured a place as pastry cook on the steamer "Augusta," plying between the ports of New York and Savannah, where he remained for six months. He located in Savannah in 1858, for two years worked as a journeyman baker, and then set up for himself. Jan. 10, 1861, he entered the Confederate service, and was one of the party of three that took possession of Fort Pulaski, using no flag. In 1862 he enlisted in Capt. Phillips' company, Thirty-second Georgia regiment of infantry, and served a year and a half, and was then detailed to take charge of the Confederate steam bakery at Savannah, where he remained until the close of hostilities. At the termination of the war he resumed the bakery business in Savannah, and has been engaged in that trade continuously since. He has been very prominently identified with the material advancement of the city of Savannah during the entire period of his citizenship; served as an alderman from 1869-89, as mayor of the municipality 1889-91, and was for eight years the president of the local Scheutzen society. Maj. Schwarz also served as foreman of the Germania Fire company for many years, and of the hook and ladder company for five years. He was one of the organizers and a director of the National bank of Savannah, president of the German Loan and Building association, which terminated in 1894 without a loss or a suit, and was one of the originators of the first street railways ever operated in the city of Savannah. Among the more prominent fraternal and benevolent orders he is a Knight Templar Mason, a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the Knights of Pythias, uniform rank. The company in which he served during the civil war was re-organized soon after the termination of hostilities and he was made second lieutenant, was promoted to captain, and later was made major of the First regiment, Georgia volunteers, which rank he held until January, 1894. Maj. Schwarz is a consistent member of the Roman Catholic church. He was happily married in Savannah in 1859, to Mary Geil, daughter of Jacob Geil, and they have four children now in life, viz.: Fred, Rudolph A., Mary, Thekla and John G.

JOHNSCREEN, one of the most prominent citizens of southern Georgia, was born in Savannah, Ga., Sept. 18, 1827. His father, Dr. James P. Screven, mayor, state senator and railroad president, was of English descent, his ancestor, Rev. William Screven, coming to Maine, and then to South Carolina, where he founded the first Baptist church. Dr. Screven was also descended from Thomas Smith, colonial governor of South Carolina. John Screven's mother was Hannah Georgia Bryan, whose ancestor, Jonathan Bryan, was an associate justice and royal councilman, and one of the founders of the colony of Georgia. John Screven was taught by eminent teachers of Savannah and attended Franklin college, now a part of the university of Georgia, sharing the honor of the first gold medal awarded for sophomore declamation. Leaving before he had graduated, he completed his studies at home under private tutors. He read law under Judge William Law, went abroad in 1848, spent some time in Heidelberg, and was admitted to the bar in Savannah in 1849, but left the profession soon after to manage his father's estate. In 1852 he was elected a justice of the inferior court, which place he held until 1866. In 1859 he was chosen president of the Atlantic & Gulf railroad upon the death of his father, the then president, but when the war began he was given leave of absence from railroad duty for military service. In 1857 he had been elected captain of the Savannah Volunteer Guards, the oldest infantry corps of Georgia, the command of which his father resigned, and in 1861 he was commissioned major of artillery, and assigned to the command of the Eighteenth Georgia battalion, and with it directed the erection of sea defenses until 1862, when, at the request of his railroad directors, he was ordered back to railway duties to attend to military transportation. In 1864 he raised and was lieutenant-colonel of a battalion for the defense of the inner lines of Savannah. In June, 1865, he began the restoration of his railroad, destroyed from Savannah to the Altamaha river. He continued president until 1880—over twenty years—when his company was succeeded by the Savannah, Florida & Western Railroad company. In 1859 he was chosen one of the representatives from the county of Chatham to the general assembly of Georgia, and mayor of Savannah in 1869, and re-elected mayor twice. He was a member of the constitutional convention of Georgia in 1877; in 1880 associate arbitrator of the Southern Railway & Steamship association; in 1883 declined to be a capitol commissioner; in 1889 was made a member of the board of trustees of the university of Georgia, having been a member of the old board since early after the civil war; was president of the Savannah University club, trustee Chatham academy, fellow New York Geographical society, first vice-president Georgia Historical society, and president of the Sons of the Revolution in Georgia. Col. Screven has, indeed, traced the path of his honored father with singular closeness in his solid virtues, valuable distinctions and hold on public esteem. As a citizen, soldier, railway magnate, legislator and man of letters and affairs, he has been equally equipped and made a rounded record. In every trust he has borne himself with dignity, wisdom, ability and conservatism, and has won public confidence. As a student and reader, his culture is varied and broad, and he enjoys his magnificent library. In him dignity does not have to bear the burden of ostentation. Of delightful suavity, he is a true type of the southern gentleman. Latterly, Col. Screven has devoted his attention to rice planting on the estate bequeathed him by his father. He has been twice married, first to Miss Mary Footman, of Savannah, in 1849, who died in 1863, and then to Mrs. Mary Eleanor Brown, daughter of Dr. H. O'K. Nesbitt, and niece of United States Senator Berrien, in 1865, who died in 1883.

DANIEL R. THOMAS. The accident of birth, as to place of nativity, may have very little to do with the career of the individual, and, while citizenship in the United States invests every citizen in any state with all immunities and privileges of those to the manor born, yet it is a matter of pride, a badge of honor to a state to be able to say of any thrifty and honored citizen: "This is my son." The subject of this biographical sketch was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., on Aug. 27, 1843. His father was John T. Thomas, whose ancestors came of that noble band of Huguenots who settled in South Carolina, and his mother was descended from the sturdy stock of Salzburgers, who came early in the history of the colony of Georgia to contribute to its life and prosperity. The predominant traits of Mr. Thomas' character plainly demonstrate his lineage. The patient, minute, and careful attention which he pays to all the details of business, to the demands that the public and the church have, from time to time, made on him, and the conscientiousness with which he discharges his duties, bespeak the characteristic inherited from the Salzburgers, while the energy and zeal that mark the pursuit and maintaining of his purposes and opinions derive their force and power from the blood of the Huguenots. By these hereditary endowments he has overcome many obstacles and imperfections and won a high place among the honored names of his native city. In his childhood his health was extremely delicate and his sight imperfect, so that he could not acquire the foundations of a liberal education, although the opportunity was not wanting, and at the age of fifteen years he gave up the schools and applied himself to work in a clerical capacity, accumulating, by careful attention, a fund of experience that served him better in the struggle of life than the scholastic theories of the books. In 1862, although far from being a robust, vigorous youth, he volunteered his services to his state and section as a private in Company I, First Volunteer regiment of Georgia, and continued in active service as long as his health permitted, and when he could no longer continue in active service in the field, he served with equal devotion in other departments of the Confederate service, in Savannah, Forsyth, and Macon, Ga. His books were kept with accuracy and care, and were carefully preserved, so that after the fall of Savannah he was able, in Forsyth, Ga., to make a complete statement, and to obtain a full settlement with the Hon. E. G. Cabanis, state collector of war taxes. At the close of the war he had the experience gained by a faithful discharge of his duties and his contact with men in the various branches of the service in which he had been engaged, and an attenuated purse. Loyal to his native city, he made his way to Savannah from Johnson county, Ga., and, notwithstanding the difficulties of transportation, he contributed to commerce by bringing four bales of cotton with him. This being the first receipt of cotton since the Federal occupation of the city, attracted marked attention and received a prominent notice in the Savannah "Republican." For a while Mr. Thomas engaged in business as an insurance agent in Macon, Ga., where he remained until March, 1866, when he returned to Savannah, and in July of that year commenced a more independent and extensive business, in the commission, fertilizer and coal business, in copartnership with Capt. D. G. Purse. This firm established a business second to none in its credit and reliability, and derived a profitable return as the fruit of the integrity, thrift and unremitting energy of its members. In December, 1878, this firm was dissolved, Mr. Thomas continuing in the coal trade, and Mr. Purse devoting his attention to the commission and fertilizer business. During all these years Mr. Thomas had suffered greatly from impaired vision and disease of the eyes, and his suffering became so intense, in 1874, that he had to seek the advice of an oculist, whose skillful treatment gave him such relief that he was able to enlarge his field of action, and take part in matters of public concern. The embarrassed condition of the finances of the city presented a difficult question for adjustment. Mr. Thomas took an active part in effecting a satisfactory compromise between the city and the bondholders, whereby the credit of the city was restored and enhanced, while the rate of interest was materially reduced, and the time of payment of the debt extended for a long period. In view of this valuable service he was elected a member of the sinking fund commission for a term of ten years, and resigned the office only to assume the more arduous position of an alderman. He was re-elected a member of the commission in July, 1891. Elected an alderman in January, 1883, he rendered valuable services to the city for six years as an active member of many of the committees of council, mainly those of accounts, finance and streets and lanes, besides serving for a term as a member of the sanitary commission, a body created by the legislature after the terrible experience of the epidemic of 1876. Mr. Thomas was well qualified to serve as a member of this body. He was among those who stood by his stricken city, fearlessly faced the dread destroyer and gained a fund of practical knowledge that made him an efficient member of the sanitary board. No alderman has ever devoted more time and earnest attention to the details of his respective departments. He was especially prominent and successful in his efforts to improve the financial condition of the city, and in reducing the rate of taxation, and there has never been a more vigilant superintendent of the accounts of the city. His vote determined the introduction of asphalt paving, which, commencing with the improvement of such business streets as Broughton and Congress, has culminated in the construction of two of the most beautiful streets in any city, in the asphalt paving of Liberty and Bull streets. As chairman of the committees on streets and lanes Mr. Thomas exhibited the most satisfactory and substantial proof of his capacity as alderman. The streets, parks, squares, sidewalks and trees all showed improvement under his watchful care, and the "Forest City" maintained its well-earned fame during his term of office. His successful career as alderman impressed a large number of our most conservative citizens with his eligibility for the office of mayor, and he was nominated for this office, and received the earnest support of a constituency that would do honor to any man. Mr. Thomas was not possessed by the politicians, he declined to engage in an unseemly scramble for the office, he accepted the nomination and the successful results of the election without the compromise of a single principle of honor and integrity. While Mr. Thomas has always been an energetic man of business, giving careful attention to his private affairs, active and earnest in his public services, he has also been prominent in matters pertaining to religion and broad and practical charity. For many years he has been a devoted member of the Independent Presbyterian church, for four years one of the trustees, and is now in the eighth year of his office as elder. He has for years served as a member of the board of managers of Savannah's oldest and most beneficent charity—the Union society—of which he has been vice-president since 1891, and whose successful rearing and education of helpless orphan boys has given to Georgia some of her most useful citizens. Many of the incorporated institutions of Savannah have felt the benefit of the sound judgment and practical suggestions of Mr. Thomas. He has served as a director in railroad companies, banking institutions, investment companies and in such adventures as contributed materially in building up the city. The Brush Electric Light and Power company and the De Soto hotel each received substantial support and liberal subscriptions from him. Mr. Thomas is still in the prime of life, one of the live men of his native city, and, while unabated in activity and usefulness, he is training one of his own blood to excel him in his devotion to church and state. On May 13, 1892, he associated with him his son, John Murchison Thomas, in his business as a partner, and the firm of D. R. Thomas & Son is one of the substantial business houses of Savannah. The effect of such a life should be to encourage young men to remain at home, and, by faithful work and diligent training, fit themselves to occupy useful and honorable positions and demonstrate that one may be the successful architect of his own fortune and be not without honor in his own community.

LEWIS TATTNALL TURNER, one of the prominent citizens of Savannah, Ga., was born in the little township of Hardwick, Bryan Co., Ga., Nov. 5, 1846. At an early age he was called upon to mourn the death of his estimable mother, and soon after her decease he removed to the home of his grandfather, Mr. Lewis Turner, planter, of White Marsh island, Chatham Co., Ga., where he remained until twelve years of age. From 1858-61 he attended school at Savannah, Ga., and also spent one year at the Georgia Military institute, at Marietta, which institution he left July, 1863, in order to enlist in the Confederate service, as junior lieutenant of Company A, Sixth Georgia reserves, and served as such until the war closed. Lieut. Turner was an active participant in the skirmishes around Savannah, and vicinity of Pocotalago, S. C., and in the battle of Bentonville, N. C. After the surrender he made his way back to Savannah, and entered the cotton export firm of William Battersby & Co., as clerk, and remained with them until Mr. Battersby retired, about 1870, when the firm became Muir & Duckworth. In 1873 he was sent to New Orleans, as manager of the branch house there, under the firm name of Muir, Duckworth & Co., and remained until 1890, when he returned to Savannah to take charge of the business of the firm, the senior partner, Mr. Duckworth, going to England to live. When Mr. Muir retired, in 1888, the firm became Duckworth, Turner & Co., as at present known. Mr. Duckworth has charge of the house in Liverpool; there is a branch house in Manchester, England, and one in New Orleans, La. The house was originally founded in 1819, in Charleston, S. C., by Walter Duckworth, who died the same year of yellow fever, he being succeeded by Joseph Battersby, and he by William Battersby, and afterward by Francis Muir and Joseph B. Duckworth, son-in-law of William Battersby. Mr. Turner is vice-president of the Cotton exchange, a director of the Central railroad of Georgia, and the Ocean Steamship company, president of the board of trustees of the Georgia infirmary, and a director in the Marion Phosphate company, the Baldwin Fertilizer company, and is one of the commissioners of pilotage of the city of Savannah. He is also member of the Savannah Yacht club, is a pay member of the Georgia Hussars, and is an elder in the Independent Presbyterian church. He was happily married, in 1868, to Mary Wyly Newell, daughter of the late Commander Thomas M. Newell, of the United States navy, and they have three sons and a daughter. Mr. Turner does not seek office and takes no part in politics.

BENJAMIN SCREVEN WELLS. Family tradition has it that the Wells family is of English origin. Mr. James T. Wells, the father of the subject of this sketch, was a native of South Carolina, and served throughout the war between the states in a Georgia regiment. He departed this life in 1891, at the age of sixty-eight years. Of Benjamin S. Wells, whose name heads this sketch, one of his associates says: "He is strictly honest, conscientious and thoroughly reliable. While not a member of any church, he is moral and an ardent supporter of the right. He makes a success of almost everything he undertakes to do." Mr. Wells was born in the city of Savannah, Ga., Feb. 27, 1857, and was reared and educated in that city. In 1871 he began his business career as a clerk for the Andrew Low company, of Savannah, and upon the dissolution of that firm remained with their successors for five years. He then entered the employ of Brierly & Maitland Dugall, with whom he remained two years, at that time setting up in the cotton business alone. In 1881 his brother, James T. Wells, was associated with him. Since the retirement of the latter, in September, 1893, Mr. B. S. Wells has conducted the business alone. In addition to his extensive cotton business Mr. Wells is largely engaged in truck farming and owns a farm of two hundred and twenty-five acres six miles from Savannah, upon which he produces annually a great amount of truck, which finds ready sale in the markets of the east. Among the more prominent social and military organizations he is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and is a pay member of the Georgia hussars and the time-honored Chatham artillery. He was happily married in 1879 to Miss Jennie, daughter of James Gribble, deceased, of North Carolina. Mrs. Wells departed this life in July, 1892, leaving as issue of that union four sons and a daughter. She was a most lovable woman and was highly esteemed by all who knew her.

JESSE PARKER WILLIAMS, commission merchant and railroad president. Savannah, Ga., was born in Wayne county, N. C., Dec. 27, 1842. His father, Mack Williams, was a native of North Carolina, and a son of Charles Williams, who was a captain of cavalry in the army of the colonies during the revolution. Jesse Parker Williams was reared and received his earlier education in his native county, attended the Franklin military institute 1858-9, and during the autumn of 1860 became a student at the university of Virginia. When the sullen boom of the opening gun sounded along Charleston harbor he closed his books and returning home enlisted as a private in the Twentieth North Carolina infantry. Resigning his commission as captain after a year's service, he returned to his home and was made adjutant of Nethercot's battalion of rangers, but resigned after several months' service and organized an infantry company at Kenston, N. C., and served as its captain until the close of hostilities. Capt. Williams was an active participant in the battles of Washington, Plymouth, Wilmington, Wise's Fork and Bentonville, N. C., and Petersburg, Cold Harbor, Fort Harrison and Walthall Junction, Va., and also in several skirmishes in North Carolina in 1863. After the war had closed Capt. Williams was for two years employed as book-keeper for a firm at Conway, S. C.; in 1868 he engaged in the lumber business, and two years later in the mercantile business at Fort Harrelson, S. C. In 1880 he removed to Savannah, Ga., and entered the commission business, as at present conducted. In addition to other extensive business interests, Mr. Williams is president of the Seaboard Construction company, owning the Middle Georgia & Atlantic railroad, sixty-five miles in length, running from Milledgeville to Covington, Ga., of which road he is president. He was also connected with the banking business in Savannah for several years. Mr. Williams is a master Mason and he has never held nor sought public office. He is a steward of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal church south, of Savannah, and a member of the board of trustees of Emory college, Oxford, Ga. He was married in 1873 to Olivia Outland, who died without issue, and in 1879 to Cora V. Taylor, daughter of W. H. B. Taylor, of Statesboro, Ga.

GEORGE BOARDMAN WHATLEY, a prominent attorney of Savannah, Chatham Co., Ga., was born on Beech island, now Aiken county, S. C., Dec. 27, 1853, being a son of Rev. Edmund Lampkin and Elizabeth (Lawton) Whatley. Rev. Edmund Lampkin Whatley was a native of South Carolina, a Baptist minister, was editor and proprietor of the "Edgefield Advertiser" for many years, and was the author of a novel entitled The Pine Farm, published in Nashville, Tenn., in 1860. During the war between the states he served as chaplain of a South Carolina regiment known as the "Edgefield rangers." He departed this life in 1886. Elizabeth Lawton Whatley, his wife, was a native of South Carolina, and a daughter of Rev. Joseph J. Lawton, a prominent Baptist minister of that state. George Boardman Whatley was reared in his native district until he was fourteen years of age, removed with his parents to Scarboro, Ga., in 1867, and four years later came to Savannah, Ga., where he completed his education in the schools of that city. He then taught school in the state of Georgia for several years, studying law meantime, and was admitted to the bar at Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., on Sept. 25, 1877. Returning to Savannah, he at once entered actively and successfully upon the practice of his profession in that city, which has been continued uninterruptedly to this time, and he now sustains a very desirable rank among the members of the legal fraternity of Savannah. Though he had never sought office, nor had he taken any active part in politics up to that time, he was an ardent champion of Gen. Clement A. Evans for the democratic nomination for the governorship of Georgia; was afterward elected a member of the first congressional district convention, and by that body chosen chairman of the executive committee of the first congressional district of Georgia, which position he now holds. Mr. Whatley is a member of the masonic fraternity, the Baptist church, and is prominently connected with the Georgia Historical society. On Feb. 1, 1882, he was happily married to Miss Georgia Helen, daughter of John B. Ryals, of Montgomery county, Ga., and that union has been blessed by the birth of a son and three daughters.

CAPT. JOHN FRANCIS WHEATON, a prominent underwriter of Savannah, Ga., was born in Guilford, Newhaven Co., Conn., Jan. 22, 1822. He lived in the county of his birth until he was sixteen years of age, and received his educational advantages there. His home was at Hartford three years, and then at Bridgeport, Conn. In 1852 he removed to Savannah, Ga., where he engaged in the lumber business. In January, 1861, he entered the service of Georgia as a member of the state troops, and the following July enlisted in the army of the Confederate states as sergeant of the Chatham artillery, was promoted to lieutenant of his company in May, 1862, and to captain in December of the same year. Capt. Wheaton was an active participant in the battles of James island, Battery Wagner, around Charleston, Oolustee, Fla., and Columbia, S. C. At the close of hostilities he came to Augusta, and soon after to Savannah, where he conducted a general merchandise business until 1875, since which time he has given his attention to insurance. Capt. Wheaton was mayor of Savannah from 1877 to 1883, and now holds the position of commissioner of pilotage. Prior to the civil war he served as an alderman of the city of Savannah for two years. From 1879 to 1883 he served as president of the Savannah cotton exchange and from August, 1886, to February, 1890, was collector of the port of Savannah, under an appointment from President Cleveland. He is now president of the United Hydraulic Cotton Press company; the Pawnee Land and Mineral company, the latter company owning 6,700 acres of coal lands in Blount county, Ala. He resigned the command of the Chatham artillery July 2, 1895, and is a member of the Oglethorpe club, the Commercial club, the Savannah Yacht club and the Georgia Historical society. Capt. Wheaton is a royal arch Mason and a regular attendant of St. John's church of Savannah. He was married in October, 1847, at Bridgeport, Conn., and has one son and a daughter, viz.: Samuel J. Wheaton, and Kate, the wife of H. K. Burras, of New York.

JOHN R. YOUNG, was born in Thomas county, Ga., April 7, 1856, and is the son of the late Remer Young, who was one of the largest and most successful planters of Lowndes county, to which county he removed in 1859, where the earlier years in the life of John R. Young were spent. From estimable and cultured parents the son inherited splendid traits of character. He was educated at Valdosta institute and at the university of Georgia. After completing his education he spent a few years on his father's plantation, and in the management of the plantation of J. W. Lathrop & Co., in Lowndes county, after which, with an associate, he began the manufacture of naval stores, a business venture, which proved to be successful, but which he disposed of to accept a position with the large naval stores house of Peacock, Hunt & Co., in 1883. After two years with this firm, Messrs. Ellis and Holt, the junior partners, withdrew from the company, and formed a co-partnership under the firm name of Ellis, Holt & Co., and offered Mr. Young an interest in the business, which he accepted. Subsequent to the death of Mr. Holt, Mr. C. B. Parker was admitted, and the firm became Ellis, Young & Co., under which it was built up, and now conducts one of the largest trades in turpentine and resin in the world. That the present high standing and immense naval stores trade of the firm of Ellis, Young & Co., is largely due to the energy and business foresight of Mr. Young cannot be doubted. This young man of thirty-nine, who came to Savannah twelve years ago, an entire stranger, is to-day so thoroughly identified with every enterprise of a public character that no one is better known on 'change and throughout Georgia and Florida. In these years Mr. Young has stamped the impress of his sterling business qualities and infectious zeal upon every project looking to the advancement and progress of not only his own city and state, but it has been extended to the peninsular state of Florida. In addition to his share of the active management of the naval stores and general merchandise interest of the firm of Ellis, Young & Co., Mr. Young organized the Georgia Pine Investment company, of which he is president. This corporation has a capital of $75,000, owns 100,000 acres of the best pine lands of the south, and an interest in five of the largest turpentine farms in the south. No man has a more abiding faith in the continued prosperity and future grandeur of this seaport, whose every industrial, commercial and railroad interest he has aided to foster, and to the development of which he has brought to bear individual enthusiasm which has been infectious. Mr. Young's success and ability as a business man so widely attracted attention through the commercial channels of Savannah that four years after he arrived in Savannah he was elected vice-president of the board of trade, and was at the following election promoted to the presidency by the board, and the next year was re-elected. Mr. Young's address in 1890, reviewing the trade of Savannah for 1889, was one of the ablest documents of its kind ever presented for the consideration of the board, and showed that all the ramifications in the city's commerce had been thoroughly canvassed by him, and that he was familiar with every statistical detail of one of the most prosperous commercial years known in the city of Savannah. In that report he showed that Savannah had done a naval stores business for that year of nearly $6,000,000, an increase of $1,500,000 over the year previous, and that the grain, provision and grocery trade had increased 25 per cent., and this in the light of the fact that prices on nearly all the leading articles were lower than for several years past, showing an increase in bulk considerably in advance of the percentage in value. His recommendations on the increase of industrial industries and increasing railroad facilities, not only commanded attention at home, but have attracted the attention of capitalists elsewhere. Mr. Young reorganized the old Macon & Atlanta Railway company that was placed in the hands of a receiver with the Georgia Southern & Florida and Macon & Birmingham in 1892-93. He was elected president of the Atlantic Short Line Railway company in 1893. When the property of this company was sold and the sale failed to go through by the objection of a small percentage of the stockholders, he was appointed by Judge Speer of the United States court receiver for the Atlantic Short Line Railway company. He was appointed receiver of the Electric Railway company, of Savannah, by Judge Speer in 1893, and is now managing these properties as receiver. Mr. Young is also a director of the Metropolitan Loan company, of Savannah, of the Citizens' bank and of the Georgia State Building and Loan company, president of the Tattnall Investment company and of the Young Investment company, of Valdosta, Ga.

EFFINGHAM COUNTY.

ANGUS EUGENE BIRD, educator, Guyton, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Col. Edward and Ann E. (Wilson) Bird, was born in Effingham county, Sept. 12, 1854. His father was a native of Effingham county and was engaged in the timber and turpentine business when the war between the states began, when he enlisted as captain of a company in the Fifth Georgia cavalry, and was afterward promoted first to be lieutenant-colonel, and subsequently to the colonelcy, and as such served until the close of the war. He served in Tennessee, Georgia, and North and South Carolina. After the war he resumed the timber business and the manufacture of turpentine, and died April 15, 1893. His mother was a daughter of James and Eliza Wilson, of Effingham county. They were both active working members of the Methodist church; and to them were born four children: Robert Edward, born in 1852; Angus Eugene; Almeda G., born in October, 1856, wife of Thomas M. Arden, Savannah, Ga.; Ida R., born in May, 1859, wife of James M. Needlinger, Effingham county. After receiving his preparatory education Mr. Bird entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., in 1874, and graduated in 1878. After leaving college he kept books for his father in South Carolina until early in 1879, when he came to Guyton, where he engaged in farming. The fall of that year he accepted a position as principal of the high school at Guyton, and kept it three years. The three years following he was engaged with his father in the turpentine business, and in 1885 embarked in sawmilling, which he followed until 1890. He was then again elected principal of the high school at Guyton, and retained it until elected to represent Effingham county in the general assembly in 1894. When in college he was a member of the Chi Phi fraternity and of the Phi Gamma Debating society. He has served Guyton two years as alderman, and one year as mayor; and is a member of the Effingham Hussars. He is also a correspondent of the "Daily Morning News," Savannah. Mr. Bird is a gentleman of superior ability, of fine literary attainments, stands high in his locality as an educator, and, withal, is a man of affairs, possessing excellent business qualifications. He is well read in the history of the past, and fully abreast with events of the present, public-spirited and progressive. Mr. Bird was married in Oxford, Ga., Jan. 30, 1879, to Miss Kittie, daughter of Joseph S. and Rebecca Stewart, and to them four children have been born: Emmie, born Nov. 30, 1879; Daisy, born July, 1881; Ruth, born Nov. 1, 1886; and Angus Eugene, Jr., born 1888. He is a stanch democrat and a member of the Knights of Pythias, and has filled every office in the local lodge. Mr. Bird and wife are active members of the Methodist church, Mr. Bird especially so, having been a steward twelve years, and recording steward of the quarterly conference since the death of his father, who has filled the office nearly thirty years; has been superintendent of the Sunday school for fifteen years, and is secretary of the County Sunday School association.

JAMES BIRD, farmer, Springfield, Effingham Co., Ga., son of William and Maria Bird, was born in Effingham county, April 27, 1833. His father was a large planter, who was also engaged in saw-milling, and was a strict member of the Baptist church. Of eight children born to his parents, Mr. Bird was the fourth. He was educated in the Springfield academy, and when eighteen years old engaged in farming and the timber business. When the civil war began he joined the Fifth regiment Georgia cavalry, and in March, 1862, with it entered the Confederate service. The regiment was commanded by Col. Edward Bird, a brother of the subject of this sketch. With his command he saw service from Florida to Virginia and west to the mountains, and was in many engagements of more or less importance, and numberless skirmishes. He was in the battle of Noonday church, Ga., at Murfreesboro, Tenn., Saltville, and Bear Creek station, in the battles near Macon, and that at Aiken, S. C., where he was wounded and sent to the hospital, soon after which the war came to a close. He was sergeant-major of the regiment. Immediately after the war he resumed farming and has engaged largely in the timber and wood business, and has given his undivided attention to this business ever since. Although unambitious of political office, he has served the county as treasurer a number of years. He is a good business man, and a superior manager, and has a fine property and nice home a few miles from Springfield, near where he was born. He is one of the county's most upright and substantial citizens, enjoying the confidence of all. Mr. Bird was married to Miss Martha H. Berry, daughter of John B. and Mary Berry, and to them ten children have been born: Leona Irene, Lilla A., Maggie G., Mary Ella, Jennie Lou, Borgia Eugenia, Ada A., Verda Ethlyn, Ramah Jordan and Nollie Viola. He is an active and prominent member of the Methodist church, which he joined when he was fifteen years old, and of which he is a steward and trustee. James Bird is now a member of the First regiment cavalry, Georgia volunteers, and was appointed paymaster of the regiment by Col. W. W. Gordon.

REV. JAMES MADISON CROSS, Baptist minister, Guyton, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Sardis Eason and Delano (Hayslip) Cross, was born in Burke county, Ga., Sept. 9, 1834. His father was a prosperous farmer, who died when he was eighteen months old, and he had the misfortune to lose his mother by death when nine years old. Being an only child he was left to the care of Alexander E. Cross, a cousin. He was given a good primary education, and then prepared for the junior class at college at the Louisville academy, in Jefferson county, Ga. But when eighteen years of age he left his studies in the school room and entered upon the study of law under the direction of T. H. Polhill of Louisville. When twenty years old he was admitted to the bar, located in Louisville, where he practiced his profession four years. But his health failing, acting under the advice of a physician, he abandoned the practice. On his restoration to health he determined to enter the ministry, and accordingly was ordained a minister of the Baptist church (of which he has been a minister thirty years), Revs. W. L. Kilpatrick, W. H. Davis and William J. Hard officiating. He served as pastor of country and village churches in Burke, Jefferson and Screven counties until 1883, when he was called to the Waycross church. He preached there three years, after which he accepted a call to Sanford, Fla. He returned to Georgia in 1887, and permanently settled near Guyton. He is now the regular pastor of the churches at Sardis, Burke county, and at Coopersville, Screven county, and Eden and Springfield, Effingham county. He has always been recognized as among the ablest preachers of his denomination, but from choice has preferred to labor in unpretentious fields. Although of far more than usual usefulness in the pulpit, he has been among the most active and efficient in the quite as important ministerial duties involved in a pastorate of visiting his charge and cultivating intimate social relationship between the members and them and himself. He has been untiring in his efforts in organizing churches everywhere that there seemed to be any opportunity for planting or strengthening one; and it is claimed for him that no ministers of any denomination have done more effective work, or more of it in this respect than Rev. Cross. Very many of the most prosperous churches in the state have been organized by him, by his aid, or through his instrumentality. His unceasing, unselfish work in behalf of Christianity has endeared him to thousands outside his own congregations, who love him and hold him in the highest esteem. He labors independently of compensation, as he owns a splendid farm near Guyton, well equipped throughout, which is very successfully conducted by his sons. Rev. Cross was married Nov. 22, 1855, to Miss Julia, daughter of Rev. Joseph Polhill of Burke county. Of the children born to them eight survive: James Joseph, Julia M., Helen A., Lou E., Lloyd W., Samuel E., Kilpatrick and O. M. All his daughters and his eldest son are married. He is a master Mason, member of Bartow Lodge No. 274, of which he was worshipful master for eight or ten years.

BENJAMIN J. DASHER, farmer, Tusculum, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Samuel and Jane Maria Dasher, was born in Effingham county, March 14, 1825. His paternal great-grandfather came with his family from Salzburg, Germany, to Georgia in 1775 and settled in Effingham county. His grandfather was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Dasher's father was a farmer, and was a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war. He and his wife were members of the Lutheran church; first of the old Ebenezer congregation, and later of the church of Bethel. They were the parents of twelve children—seven boys and five daughters—of whom Mr. Dasher was the second born. He received his education at the common schools of the county, and on attaining to manhood he engaged in the timber trade and industriously and profitably pursued it many years. Of late years he has given his attention almost exclusively to his farming interests. He was twice elected a justice of the inferior court—during his second term the court was abolished. Content with the quiet life and the more than sustaining profits of a well managed farm, he has had no ambition for office. Mr. Dasher was married Oct. 17, 1849, to Miss Mary S., daughter of Joshua and Mary Ganann. His wife was a schoolmate at Springfield of Hon. Richard H. Clark, the distinguished judge of the criminal division of the superior court of Fulton county. Mr. and Mrs. Dasher are the parents of five children: Mary Ella, deceased; Jane Florence, wife of Charles Chunn; Solomon Franklin, Fort Valley, Houston Co., Ga.; Charles Emerson, locomotive engineer, Fort Valley; Benjamin J., Jr., farmer, Effingham county. He has been a member of the Lutheran church forty years, and was an elder many years—until he resigned.

PAUL M. EDWARDS, farmer, Eden, Effingham Co., Ga., son of S. A. and Tabitha Edwards, was born in Effingham county, Sept. 14, 1842. His father was a farmer, also engaged in the timber business; and was an ordained minister of the Baptist church. He raised a family of seven children: Indiana Jane, Vernanda D., Paul Marlow, Robert S., Martha Emily, Tabitha Ellen and Rosa Annis. Mr. Edwards was educated at the common schools of the county. He enlisted March 12, 1862, in a company in the Fifth Georgia cavalry, Col. Edward Bird, under command of Gen. Anderson. He was a participant in the battle of Noonday Church, and the battle of Atlanta, and for a long time was courier for Col. Bird. He served in the army throughout the war, and after it was over came home and went into the timber business in connection with farming. He conducted these two interests about nine years; then, continuing his farm, he abandoned the timber business and cut wood for market instead, and is still engaged in it. Mr. Edwards was married Nov. 25, 1874, to Miss Annie E., daughter of Alexander C. N. Smets, of Savannah, Ga., and these children have been born to him: Marie E., Sylvester A., Paul Macrae, Anna Cornelia, Pauline Elizabeth, Gordon, Robert Smets and Henry Marlow. Mr. Edwards is a member of the Baptist church in Eden, and his wife and eldest daughter are members of St. John's church at Savannah.

ABRAM J. FUTRELL, merchant, Guyton, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Christopher and Sarah (Blitch) Futrell, was born in Effingham county, Feb. 15, 1842. His father was a farmer and died when he was only five years old, but his mother is still living at the advanced age of eighty-two years. They had seven children: Abram J.; Georgia, wife of Andrew Hanson, born in Denmark; M. B., farmer, Effingham county; Obedience, deceased; John Thomas, died during the war in the Confederate service; Alzada, wife of James Farris, Laurens county, Ga.; Christopher, killed by a horse when nine years old. Mr. Futrell was reared on a farm and was educated in the common schools of the county. As soon as the civil war began he left school and enlisted in the Georgia militia for six months, and at the expiration of that time enlisted in the Fifty-fourth Georgia, which was assigned to Gen. Mercer's command. He was in quite a number of important engagements and many skirmishes, participating in the battle near Atlanta July 22, 1864, and served until the surrender. After the war he engaged in farming and timber cutting, and continued it ten years. He has since, while continuing his farm, engaged in merchandising in Guyton, and has established a very good and profitable trade. He is a member of the board of county commissioners. Mr. Futrell was married in 1870 to Miss Lucinda, daughter of Roberson and Joanna Newton, and to them the following children have been born: Joanna, deceased; Louisa Gertrude, wife of H. P. Stronge, lawyer, Statesboro, Bulloch Co., Ga.; Canaro Lisette, wife of Walter Aaron, lawyer, Ashburn, Worth Co., Ga.; Florida, unmarried; Victor Harley and Myrtie, both at home. The mother of these children died May 9, 1886, and in September, 1888, Mr. Futrell contracted a second marriage with Miss Lillian, daughter of Edward Sowell, who has borne him four children: Donald Edward, Cattie B., Frank and Abram J. Mr. Futrell is a populist politically and a member of the Baptist church, takes an active interest in all church matters, and has been superintendent of the Sunday school many years.

ANGUS N. GROVENSTEIN, merchant, Guyton, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Shadrach and Susannah (Keiffer) Grovenstein, was born in Effingham county, Oct. 2, 1852. His family is of German descent, and ancestors of his, Salzburg-ers, settled in what is now Effingham county in 1733. His father was a farmer, was a member of the Effingham hussars for many years previous to the war, and enlisted in 1862 with his company (Capt. Stroborn) in the Fifth Georgia cavalry (Col. Edward Bird), with which he served till wounded and discharged. Himself and wife are members of the Lutheran church. A. N. Grovenstein's grandfather, Ephraim Keiffer, was a Lutheran minister and was pastor of the church at Ebenezer, in Effingham county—the oldest of that denomination in the state. The old church building erected in 1769 is still standing, and the worshipers were organized as a church in 1774. Shadrach and Susannah Grovenstein were the parents of seven children: Angus Nesbitt, Hubert, deceased; Homer, deceased; Alice, deceased wife of W. A. Davis, Savannah; Ella, wife of L. C. Tibeau, Jr., Effingham county; Victoria, wife of J. J. Jenkins, Effingham county, and one child who died in infancy. Mr. Grovenstein received an academical education, attending first the school at Guyton, and then two years under Prof. J. J. Jenkins at Groverville, Brooks Co., Ga. After finishing his education he taught school in Camden and Chatham counties, Ga. In 1874 he accepted the position of freight train conductor on the Central railway, and held it between three and four years. He was then made conductor of a passenger train, and was conductor on the first through train from Atlanta to Savannah. After ten years' faithful service in this capacity he was promoted to the position of pay train conductor and assistant paymaster for the Central railway on all of its lines. He held this honorable and responsible position four years—until the Richmond & Danville company took charge, when that service was discontinued. Mr. Grovenstein was tendered a situation as passenger train conductor, but declined it, as he had determined to become a merchant. In 1892 he entered into partnership with Bartemus J. Cubbedge and embarked in a general merchandise business in Guyton, which has proved a prosperous enterprise, with increasing trade and the promise of being a brilliant success. In addition to the store he has a fine farm at old Camp Davis, about three miles above Guyton, which he has managed very profitably. He is an enthusiastic member of the Effingham hussars. Mr. Grovenstein was married March 1, 1876, to Miss Mattie (born May 2, 1857), eldest daughter of B. J. Cubbedge, of Effingham county. Mr. Cubbedge was for many years in the employ of the Central railway under its old management, and held many responsible positions. Mr. and Mrs. Grovenstein are the parents of eleven children: Claudia, born in 1877, deceased; Rufus Nesbitt, Georgia C., Mabel Catherine, Mattie, Angus, Bartemus, Robert Mims, Sidney L., Elmira and Erling. Mr. Grovenstein and his wife are members of the Baptist church at Guyton, of which he is the clerk. He is a member of the democratic executive committee of Effingham county, and is the postmaster at Guyton, Ga.

NESBITT BARTOW SHEAROUSE, farmer and lumberman, Marlow, Effingham Co., Ga., son of Nathaniel and Sarah Shearouse, was born in Bryan county, Ga., Dec. 14, 1862. His father was a farmer and enlisted in a company in the Fifth Georgia cavalry, commanded by Col. Edward Bird, and served through the war. His father and mother were members of the Methodist church, and the parents of twelve children: John, William, Charles, Nathaniel, Robert, George, Virginia, Annie, Emeline, Ellen, Georgia and Nesbitt Bartow. Mr. Shearouse was educated in the common schools of Effingham county, finishing in Shiloh. When about twenty years of age he engaged in the timber business, and not long afterward joined his brother in the publication of the Guyton "Chronicle" newspaper. After two years' experience in the newspaper business he turned his attention more profitably to saw-milling in Effingham and Bryan counties.

He has been thus engaged now for ten years, with very satisfactory results. He owns a small saw-mill near Marlow which cuts about 3,000 feet of lumber per day, and in connection with it conducts a grist mill and a corn crusher. In connection with his other enterprises he conducts a farm. With this command he bore an active part in the Atlanta campaign from Tunnel Hill south, participated in the battle of Atlanta July 22, 1864—during which a shot passed through his coat sleeve. With his command he subsequently participated in the Tennessee campaign under Gen. Hood, and in the battles at Franklin and Murfreesboro. He left Murfreesboro with a wagon train of prisoners. He afterward went to the South Carolina coast and was in the engagement at James Island. From there he went to Augusta, where he was granted a furlough, and on his return to the army he learned of the surrender. On his return home he attended school two years, and then engaged in farming with his father for some time. Then for five years he was in the cross-tie and timber business; after which he resumed farming in connection with saw-milling. The following fall he was discharged from that command on account of sickness. JACKSON COUNTY.

HORATIO W. BELL, county ordinary, Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., was born in the town where he now lives, Aug. 9, 1841. He is the son of Jackson and Rebecca Wilson Bell. Jackson Bell was a prominent citizen of Jackson county, and was engaged in merchandising in Jefferson, and represented the county in the legislature during the session of 1863-64. Horatio W. Bell was educated at the Jefferson academy in Jackson county. At the age of nineteen he volunteered in the first company that left the county, and entered the Confederate service as sergeant of Company C, Eighteenth Georgia regiment, and served with this regiment through the war. He was promoted to be first lieutenant, and on account of his business qualifications was detailed from the line to fill the position of quartermaster, with the rank of captain, and brigade commissary, with the rank of major. He was in the battle of Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, and Chickamauga. He was severely wounded at the battle of Gaines' farm, near Richmond, and at the battle of Chancellorsville commanded Company C during that fight. After the war he returned to Jefferson and began merchandising and farming, which he continued with success till Jan. 1, 1877, when he was elected ordinary, a position which he has filled up to the present day. When his present term—which is the fifth—expires, he will have served his county as ordinary twenty years. His administration has been a credit to himself and satisfactory to the people of this large and prosperous county. When he was first elected ordinary the finances and business of the county were in a bad condition and the county heavily in debt. His management soon placed the county on a firm cash basis, and to-day there is not a dollar of indebtedness and a tax rate of only forty cents on the $100, notwithstanding a splendid brick court house and stone jail, a comfortable, convenient county poorhouse and farm, three splendid iron bridges and seven covered bridges have been erected under his administration and supervision since he has been in office. As judge of the court of ordinary, but few of his decisions have been appealed to a higher court, and but one reversed. He is a member of the board of trustees and treasurer of Martin institute, one of the finest high schools in the state. He is one of the projectors of the Jefferson Banking company, a stock holder and member of the board of directors, and advisor of the cashier in the management of said bank. He was one of the projectors and builders of the G., J. & S. railroad, and has been a member of the board of directors of said railroad company ever since its organization. With all these business responsibilities he finds time to take a lively interest in politics and religion and all charitable institutions. He is chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic party of Jackson county, and a member of the state campaign committee. He is a member of the Methodist church, superintendent of the Sunday school, and among the foremost leaders of charitable work in Jackson county. He is worshipful master of the Unity lodge, No. 36, F. and A. M., high priest of Jefferson chapter of royal arch Masons and a member of the order of high priesthood. He was married Nov. 15, 1866, to Cornelia F. Watson, daughter of Samuel Watson, a wealthy and prominent citizen of Jefferson, by whom he has one son, Samuel J. Bell.

At the close of the war he began farming again, and was elected a member of the inferior court, and in 1868 was elected a member of the legislature, and again elected in 1876. After the adoption of the new constitution in 1877 he was elected again, and re-elected in 1880. He still resides on his farm three miles east of Jefferson. J. C. Bennett was educated in Jackson county at Martin institute, and upon the completion of his studies he entered the office of the clerk of the superior court as an assistant in 1887. He served in this capacity three years, in the meantime prosecuting the study of medicine, and in 1890 was graduated from the Atlanta Medical college, standing fourth in a class of fifty. He then began the practice of medicine at Jefferson, and followed his profession for two years, at the expiration of which time he turned his attention to politics. He was appointed tax collector of Jackson county, and in January, 1893, he was elected clerk of the superior court for Jackson county, and was again elected to the office in 1895. There was an unexpired term on account of the death of W.

T. Bennett of three months in the office that was filled by Mr. J. C. Bennett, from October, 1890, to January, 1891. In 1891 he was elected a member of the board of trustees of the Martin institute, and was elected member of the city council in 1891, and has been president of the alumni of Martin institute. He is a member of the Baptist church, and is a Mason and secretary of the Jefferson chapter, No. 43, royal arch Masons. He has held the position since the chapter was organized in 1891. He was married to Miss Lizzie Dickson, daughter of Jephtha and M. E. Dickson, of Jefferson, in October, 1891, and they have one child, Jessie Marie. He was chairman of the democratic committee of the Ninth congressional district, and chairman of the campaign committee for that district, and has taken an active part in the politics of the county and district. He is a Mason. Mr. Holder was married in 1891 to Ada, daughter of ex-Sheriff T. A. McElhannon, a union which has been blessed with one child, Erin. Mrs. Holder is a graduate of Wesleyan Female college, at Macon, and is a very great help to her husband in editing the "Herald." Mr. Holder is a prominent member of the masonic fraternity.

The mother was a daughter of William L. and Eliza (Trout) Bryant. She was educated at Salem, N. C., and was noted for her intellectual culture, being one of the best informed and talented women of that day. By nature she was endowed with a wonderful talent for art, and by cultivation she became an efficient artist. William Lane Bryant was a successful and extensive farmer and a leading citizen of Jackson county. His wife was Miss Eliza Huguenot Trout, a lady of great intellect and refinement. Nathaniel H. Pendergrass was born Oct. 25, 1807, in South Carolina, and moved with his parents, when only four years of age, to Georgia, and settled in Jackson county. He was elected sheriff of the county in 1841, served for two terms, and was then elected county treasurer in 1851. He was extensively engaged in merchandising and farming. He was a soldier in the war with the Creek Indians in 1836, and served in the state militia during the civil war between the states. He was a prominent Mason and a member of the Methodist church. He died June 3, 1879. From his early manhood he had been before the public, having held various offices of trust and honor. In every position, whether public or private, his course gained the respect and esteem of all with whom he came in contact. Nathaniel Pendergrass, the grandfather of Dr. J. B. Pendergrass, was a great believer in the Bible and lived a consecrated Christian life, often speaking in public and working for Christ. He was twelve years of age at the close of the revolutionary war. His wife was Miss Hannah Nixon, a woman of great beauty and intellect. She was of royal descent. Dr. James Bascomb Pendergrass was educated at Martin institute, Jefferson, Ga., and began to read medicine in 1874 with Dr. J. David Long, of Jefferson. He was graduated in 1876 from the Kentucky school of medicine at Louisville. He at once began the practice of medicine in Jefferson, and owing to his wonderful skill as a physician and surgeon he is now, without question, the most eminent physician in Jackson county. His profession brought him into prominence and a trial of his skill has been displayed and proven satisfactory to the public and his friends. After having practiced medicine for ten years he decided to take a post-graduate course in 1886 at the New York polyclinic. It was while en route to New York he met Miss Nellie J. Egerton, a beautiful and accomplished young lady, who became his wife March 3, 1887. Mrs. Pendergrass was the only daughter of Charles Wilmot and Lou Egerton, the former being a brilliant young attorney of Louisburg, N. C., and the latter a beautiful, accomplished and very aristocratic and wealthy lady of the same state. After a short but happy married life Mrs. Nellie Egerton Pendergrass departed this life, Aug. 5, 1889, leaving one son, Wilmot Harlingsworth Pendergrass. Dr. Pendergrass, like other men, met with misfortunes and disappointments, but being a man of great determination, energy, and will power, he always looked forward to a better and brighter day, and by the help of God he has been successful, both professionally and financially. On Jan. 31, 1894, he was married to Miss Mittie Dell, the youngest daughter of James Thomas and Sarah Elizabeth Heath, of Norwood, Ga. She is recognized as one of the prettiest and most lovable women that Georgia ever produced. She was educated at Wesleyan Female college, taking a very high stand in all the departments of this famous old institution. There never could have been a happier marriage than when Dr. Pendergrass and Miss Mittie Dell Heath were united in the holy bonds of matrimony, and they are thoroughly devoted to each other. Their union has been blessed by one bright-eyed little son, Jamie Evans Pendergrass.

Pike was educated in the common schools and Martin institute, and reading law with J. B. S. Davis, of Jefferson, was admitted to the bar and began practice in 1866. When the civil war broke out he enlisted as a private in Company E, First Georgia Partisan rangers' cavalry, which afterward became the Sixteen th Georgia battalion cavalry, and finally the Thirteenth regiment, Georgia cavalry. He was promoted to ordnance sergeant in 1863, and after the evacuation of Richmond he was tendered the captaincy by the secretary of war at Charlotte, N. C., but the war closed before he donned his stars. He was with Morgan in Kentucky and Tennessee in 1862, with Longstreet in Tennessee in 1863, with Early in the valley in 1864, with Breckinridge in Virginia and Tennessee in 1864-65, and surrendered with Johnston, April 26, 1865. He is also an Odd Fellow. He has been a member of the board of trustees of Martin institute for thirty years. In 1877 he married Miss Elizabeth C. Thompson. She is a daughter of William S. Thompson of Jackson county. Two children born to them are deceased. Mr. Randolph has adopted Minnie May Randolph, a charming young lady.

GUSTAVUS JAMES NASH WILSON, county superintendent of schools, was born near where Harmony Grove now stands, in Jackson county, Ga., Oct. 16, 1827. He belongs to a family living in the county when it was organized in 1796, and subsequently prominent in its political, business and social interests. He is a grandson of George Wilson, a leading citizen in the pioneer days of Jackson county, and one who made the original draft of the first constitution of the state of Georgia. George Wilson was one of the first settlers of Jackson county, and was an elder in the first Presbyterian church organized in that part of the state. James Wilson, a son, married Martha Bowles, daughter of another old settler, and they are the parents of Mr. Gustavus Wilson. The father was an extensive farmer, and a brave soldier in the war of 1812, and in the Indian war of 1836. He died March 17, 1871, aged eighty-three years. In the youthful days of Mr. Gustavus Wilson, educational advantages were few. The "old-field" schools, and here and there a private academy, furnished the mental training of the masses. In the former Mr. Wilson's natural love for learning was nurtured until his mind was prepared to guide it into the channel of self-education. He has been from even his childhood days, a hard and thorough student, ever seeking knowledge. At thirteen years of age, so far had he advanced, that he began teaching a school near Harmony Grove, and so eminent were his qualifications as an educator, that he continued this school with great success for fourteen consecutive years. He was then associated with other schools in the county, and was at the head of some of the most successful institutions of learning in Jackson county in ante-bellum days. In May, 1862, Mr. Wilson left his profession and enlisted in the Confederate army, as an officer in Company E, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment. After the war he devoted most of his time to mechanics and machinery, and was thus engaged when, in 1871, he was elected to the position he now fills, being elected subsequently for six consecutive terms—twenty-four years. Mr. Wilson is of pure Scotch-Irish descent, of fine mental attainments, and possesses a physique of herculean proportions. He is an elder in the Presbyterian church; a chapter Mason, and also an Odd Fellow. Though passing all his days in the common walks of life, Mr. Wilson can boast that he never owed a cent that is not paid; serving the county for nearly a quarter of a century, he has never cost the county or state as much as a "nickel;" and in a life of near three-score-and-ten years he is not conscious of ever passing an idle day. By using "mere scraps of time" Mr. Wilson now lives almost on his native heath in a pretty residence of rare workmanship built by his own hands. Mr. Wilson owns one of the largest private libraries in the state, and notwithstanding his busy life has found time to write essays and articles on educational and religious subjects which have attracted attention all over the country. Mr. Wilson was married Aug. 1, 1844, to Miss Carrie Coleman, daughter of Allen Coleman of Laurens county, S. C. They have two children: L. C. Wilson and Mrs. Maggie Johnson.

JASPER COUNTY.

JAMES HENDERSON, planter, Monticello, Jasper Co., Ga., son of James and Sarah (Bolton) Henderson, was born in Jasper county, Sept. 12, 1828. His great-grandfather was a native of Scotland, and came to North Carolina; where he married. He had one son, William, who married Miss Hannah Johnson, migrated to Georgia, and settled in Wilkes county, where he raised a family of six children, none of whom is now living, namely: James; Henry; William; Elisha; John; and Dorothy, who married William Simmons. Elisha and William were soldiers in the war of 1812-14 and James and William were Baptist preachers. His grandmother lived to be ninety years of age. Mr. Henderson's father was married in Oglethorpe county, Oct. 10, 1811, lived several years in Wilkes county, moved in 1818 to Jasper county and settled between two and three miles from Monticello. He afterward moved to where the subject of this sketch now lives. He was a prosperous planter—one whose unimpeachable rectitude of character won and kept the entire confidence of the people. He was a Primitive Baptist preacher, gained a wide reputation within his denomination, and was a prominent and influential member of it. He died April 1, 1858, and his wife died March 7, 1862. To this union there were born ten children, all of whom were raised to maturity except Caroline, who died in infancy; Christian H. (deceased); Jemima A., widow of a Mr. Dodson, Sumter county, Ga.; Carolina B. (deceased); William C., West Point, Ga.; Sarah A. (deceased); James, subject of this sketch; Emily, wife of John F. Childs, Forsyth, Ga.; Isaac W., Jasper county; Martha V., wife of John M. Gibbs, Social Circle, Ga. Mr. Henderson has passed his life on his plantation in Jasper county, content with the life and income incident to the industrious pursuit of agriculture. When the war began he enlisted in a company that went from Monticello, of which he was made first lieutenant. His company was in nearly every important battle—twenty-three in all—including Sharpsburg, Antietam, Wilderness, Gettysburg, etc. The first battle he was in his company lost heavily, after which he was promoted to a captaincy. He received a peculiar wound in a peculiar way at the second battle of the Wilderness, May 8, 1864. He was lying down ready to make a charge, when he was hit on the top of his head by a minie ball, in consequence of which he lay at the point of death for many weeks. The indentation made by this ball, large and deep enough to receive a walnut, still remains in his head. He has the reputation of having been utterly fearless in battle. After the war he resumed his favorite pursuit, which he has diligently followed since. In 1890 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly—the beginning and ending of his public service. He has a fine plantation of 500 acres, after having divided a like number of acres among his children. Capt. Henderson was married in Jasper county, Nov. 16, 1853, to Miss Miranda, daughter of Robert Sparks, a member of another early and prominent family. To them the following named children were born: Sarah L. (deceased); Robert E. (deceased); Elesiff T. (deceased); Irwin A., single, at home; Wallace H., Jasper county; Minnie, wife of A. S. Walker, Putnam county; Charles Lee, merchant, Monticello; James B., young man, at home. He is a strong and influential member of the Primitive Baptist church.

WILLIAM C. LEVERETT, retired planter, Machen, Jasper Co., Ga., son of Durrell and Nancy (Cody) Leverett, was born in Putnam county, Ga., March 15, 1818. His parents—of French descent—were born respectively in Wilkes and Lincoln counties, Ga., but were married in Putnam county. In 1821 they moved to Jasper county, where they reared a family of nine children: Ann, deceased wife of John Turk; Eliza, widow of James Wright, Eatonton, Ga.; Edward B., deceased; Frank, deceased; Clayton, deceased; Thomas, Jasper county; Catharine, wife of James Lancaster, Putnam county; Martha, widow of Thomas Leverett, Jasper county; Nancy J., maiden lady, Eatonton, Ga. It was a source of pride to Mr. Leverett to give his children a good education, which he did. He was a quiet, unostentatious man, yet very energetic and thrifty; indifferent to public life, but manifested a life-time devotion to the doctrines and practices of the Primitive Baptist church. The old homestead is situated four miles east of Machen, and here our subject's mother died in 1858, aged sixty-one, and his father in 1878, in the ninety-first year of his age. Mr. Leverett's life occupation has been that of a planter and farmer. When he became of age he bought a small farm, which forms a part of the magnificent property he now owns. To be recognized as a good farmer, and to rear his children properly and to start them right on the voyage of life, has been his chiefest ambition, so he has been content to live and fully enjoy the quiet life of a farmer. During the war, however, though exempt by age, he did excellent and valuable service for the Confederate government as a purchasing and collecting agent. His territory was extensive, the number of men under his supervision was large, and his duties were onerous and exacting; the responsibility, also, was very great. Yet he discharged his duties promptly, with scrupulous care, and to the entire satisfaction of the authorities. He has been eminently successful in his farming business, and he now owns about 3,000 acres of excellent land, situated principally between Machen and Monticello, and now, in his ripe old age, surrounded by an intelligent and loving family, he is enjoying the well-earned fruits of an industrious and well-spent life. Mr. Leverett was married four times. His first marriage was in Jasper county, Feb. 6, 1839, to Miss Sarah, daughter of Benjamin Wade, who bore him one child, Harriet, wife of William Spearman, Jasper county. Mrs. Leverett died in 1841, and the following year Mr. Leverett was married in Putnam county to Mrs. Herndon (nee Hearn), by whom he had five children, three of whom are living: Frank, ex-United States marshal, southern district of Georgia, Macon; Sarah, wife of Eli Pounds, Jackson, Ga., and Elizabeth, wife of B. H. Sanders, Cleburne, Tex. This wife died in 1855, and he afterward married, in Jasper county, Mrs. Jane Smith (nee Winfrey), who bore him one child, Alice, wife of Dr. J. H. Bullard, Machen. Having lost this wife by death, Mr. Leverett was married in Putnam county, March 22, 1893, to Fannie, daughter of Irby Scott, who is comforting him in his old age. Mr. Leverett is a democrat, a royal arch Mason, and has been an ardent and exemplary member of the Methodist church for fifty-four years, of which he is a trustee. No person or family holds a higher position or is more influential in the locality than Mr. Leverett and his family.

W. D. MADDUX, physician and surgeon, Monticello, Jasper Co., Ga., son of John and Sarah (Betts) Maddux, was born in Jasper county, Aug. 21, 1814. His grandparents on both sides, Joseph Maddux and Abram Betts, were natives of Maryland, and the two families migrated to Georgia in the latter part of the last century and settled in Hancock county. Subsequently Mr. Maddux moved to Putnam and Mr. Betts to Jasper county. Mr. Maddux's father was born in Maryland, but was reared mainly in Hancock county. He was married in 1804, and in 1808 moved to Jasper county and settled four miles west of Monticello, on the road to Indian Springs, where he passed the remainder of his days. He was a plain, prosperous planter, no politician, but firm in his political convictions, and voted the whig ticket. Dr. Maddux's parents reared eleven children to maturity, of whom three only survive: James L., Flovilla, Ga.; W. D., the subject of this sketch, and Simeon H., planter, Jasper county. His father died in 1868, aged eighty-seven years, and his mother in 1872 at the same age. Dr. Maddux received a good education, and remained at the old homestead until he was twenty-five years old. He then read medicine under Dr. Edward A. Broadus, an eminent physician of that time and locality, and afterward attended a course of lectures at Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia. The next year he attended lectures at the medical department of the university of New York, whence he graduated in 1842. Dr. Maddux located at once at Monticello, where he has almost continuously resided ever since; entered upon the successful practice of his profession and established a patronage which rapidly grew in volume and value. During the war he did an immense amount of gratuitous practice for the families of the soldiers. Advancing years have compelled him to withdraw gradually from the practice. He has been the leading physician of Monticello and a wide sweep of country around for half a century, is widely known and much beloved. Dr. Maddux was happily married in Monticello in 1852 to Miss Araminta, daughter of Thomas B. Comer, who was born and reared in Jasper county, and by whom he had two daughters: Jennie, wife of A. M. Robinson, Atlanta, Ga.; and Kate, wife of David R. Glover, living with her father. Mrs. Maddux died Jan. 23, 1884. Dr. Maddux was a member of the old whig party and a Union man until the state seceded; since then he has been a democrat. Himself and all his family are members of the Methodist church.

WILLIAM J. M. PRESTON, planter, Broughtonville, Jasper Co., Ga., son of William H. and Martha (McDowell) Preston, was born in Jasper county, Jan. 25, 1838. His father was born in South Carolina, and when he was ten years old (1812) came to Georgia with his family, which settled on Murder creek, Jasper Co., seven miles north of Monticello. He married in 1828, and had nine children born to him: Charles T., deceased; Salina, deceased; Mary, wife of Dr. Cheney, Rae, Tex.; John R., deceased; Virginia, deceased; William J. M., the subject of this sketch; Joseph W., lawyer, Macon, Ga.; Henry H., member of Company G, Fourth Georgia regiment, killed at Malvern Hill, and Martha, deceased. Mr. Preston's father was a thrifty, prosperous planter, highly esteemed for his conscientious, upright character and great hospitality, unstintedly entertaining, not only his friends, but the stranger that entered his gates. Before the war he represented Jasper county in the general assembly. Mr. Preston's mother died May 1, 1878, and his father died March 16, 1892, in his ninetieth year. Both were devoted and exemplary members of the Baptist church. Mr. Preston was reared on the plantation and received an excellent education. About the time he became of age he taught school a while, and then commenced the study of medicine. This was interrupted by the outbreak of the war between the states. He enlisted in Company C, Fourteenth Georgia regiment, of which he was made orderly sergeant, and reached the battlefield just after the first Manassas battle. He was in all the important battles fought by the army of northern Virginia, and having been promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, commanded in the battles of Chancellorsville and the Wilderness. Coming home from the war he returned to the plantation and began the work of reconstruction. For a number of years between 1870-80 he was justice of the peace in the Shady Dale district; in 1881 he was elected sheriff of the county, and was re-elected for two years in 1883; was mayor of Monticello in 1885-6, and in 1886 was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, in which body he served on the committees on finance, education and asylum. Capt. Preston's continuous military and political advancement indicate a general popular recognition of his administrative capacity and his fidelity to public trusts, and demonstrates his personal popularity. Capt. Preston was married in Jasper county, Dec. 18, 1866, to Miss Angeline N. Pugh, who died childless Nov. 15, 1880. On Nov. 24, 1886, in Jasper county, he was married to Miss Elizabeth C. Malone. Capt. Preston is personally a most affable and genial gentleman; himself and wife are cultured people and dispense a lavish hospitality. He is a "solid" democrat and a member of the Baptist church.

J. T. WYATT, planter, Farrar, Jasper Co., Ga., only child of W. H. and Cynthia (Winfrey) Wyatt, was born in Jasper county, Sept. 28, 1835. His great-grandfather, John Wyatt, was a citizen of Virginia during the revolutionary war, a soldier in the patriot army, migrated to Georgia, and settled in Clarke county in 1802. He afterward moved to Butts county, Ga., where he lived until his death, which occurred at the advanced age of ninety-nine years. Mr. Wyatt's grandfather, Thomas Wyatt, was born and reared in Clarke county, whence, after his marriage to Miss Nancy Wootten, he moved and settled near the line of Jasper and Morgan counties, where he reared his family, and died in 1857. His children were: John W., planter, Jasper county, the oldest living member of the family; William H., father of the subject of this sketch; Nancy A.; De Graffenreid, and Tabitha. Mr. Wyatt's father was born in Morgan county in 1812, but lived all his life in Jasper county. He was a progressive planter, energetic, shrewd and thrifty, and when he died had acquired one of the largest properties in his section. Having a taste for politics his democratic friends elected him to represent the county in the general assembly thirteen continuous terms. "Ike Tom" Wyatt, as he is familiarly called by his appreciative friends, was reared a plain farmer, and it pleases him to regard the calling as one of the noblest and most dignified a man can follow. He is living in the house in which he was born, and is engaged in the same pursuit his ancestors were engaged in for generations before him. His highest ambition is to be regarded a good farmer, a man of highest integrity, and to be honored by his neighbors as a citizen of unquestioned honor and uprightness of character. During the late war he served three months in Virginia in the Fourth Georgia regiment, and then came home. He re-enlisted in the Sixteenth Georgia battalion of cavalry, which saw much arduous and exacting service under the great Confederate raider, Gen. John H. Morgan. Ever since the war he has been a notary public and ex-officio justice of the peace. Mr. Wyatt was married in Monroe county, Ga., to Miss Mary A. Sullivan, born and reared in Monroe county, daughter of Hilliard Sullivan, a North Carolinian by birth. This union has been blessed with two children: William H., planter, near the homestead, and Cynthia, widow of John Christian, living with the old folks at home. Mr. Wyatt is an uncompromising democrat, a royal arch Mason, having been accepted and entered the same day he became of full age, and is an ardent, exemplary member of the Methodist church.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

HENRY LAURENS BATTLE, physician and surgeon, Wadley, Jefferson Co., Ga., son of Rev. Jesse B. and Martha (Rabun) Battle, was born in Hancock county, Ga. Dr. Battle's father was born in Hancock county in 1791, was a Baptist minister of note, preached the gospel sixty-six years, died in 1873, aged eighty-two years, and was buried on a spot in Hancock county where are buried six generations of the family. His mother, the eldest daughter of Gov. William Rabun, was an exemplary member of the Baptist church, and an earnest Christian worker. She died in 1854, in the sixtieth year of her age. Nine children blessed the union of this devoted Christian couple: Mary, Sarah, Amanda, William, Milton, John, Henry, Leander and Jesse. Only two of these are living—John, who lives in Laurens county, and Henry Laurens. Dr. Battle received his early and preparatory education at Powelton (Hancock county) academy, and then entered Mercer university in 1844, but did not graduate. After leaving the university he studied medicine and then attended lectures at the medical college in Charleston, from which he graduated in 1848. He soon afterward located in Sparta, Hancock Co., where he remained until 1858, when he moved to Jefferson county, which has since been his home. He has lived in Wadley ever since the town was located, has secured a very large and valuable practice, and accumulated large property. He is recognized as a physician of superior attainments and skill, and is held in affectionate regard by his hundreds of patrons. He has been the local surgeon of the Central Railway company since that office was created. Although advanced in age, and has been practicing his profession forty-seven years, he is still in active service, his calls covering miles around him. He takes great interest in politics, but is no politician, his professional duties taking all his time. Notwithstanding this, however, he was elected a justice of the inferior court and in 1874 was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, where he had the bill passed incorporating the town of Wadley. He is a member of the State Medical association. Dr. Battle was married in October, 1848, to Miss Mary E., daughter of Thomas Pierce, who died in 1849, leaving one child, Jesse B., now in Texas. In 1852 he married Miss Anna Chambliss of Brunswick county, Va., by whom he has had five children. One died young; those living are: Leander, in Florida; Henry L., in Texas; Mrs. Lena M. Battle, Wadley, and George Chambliss. Dr. Battle is a master Mason, and himself and family, except the two youngest children, are members of the Baptist church, of which he has been a deacon forty years.

ROBERT L. GAMBLE. One of the best known, and most distinguished and honored of names in middle eastern Georgia in the second quarter of this century was that borne by him whose sketch is now presented. Roger Lawson Gamble, judge of the middle circuit of Georgia, Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., is a son of Hon. Roger Lawson and Martha Rosanna (Gobert) Gamble, and was born in Jefferson county, May 20, 1851. Joseph Gamble, the paternal great-great-grandfather of Judge Gamble, came from Virginia and settled in what is now Jefferson county. His grandfather attained to state-wide eminence as a member of the legal profession, and was one of the most popular political leaders of his generation. He was a member of congress in 1833-35, and then coming to the front again in the ever memorable campaign of 1840 he was elected (the elections then were by general ticket) to the congress of 1841-43. Subsequently he was elected judge of the middle circuit and held the office one or more terms, sustaining his well-earned reputation at the bar and in congress. He was pre-eminently successful in his profession and otherwise, and left a large estate. Judge Gamble's father was a gentleman of liberal education and great diversity of knowledge. He never entered public life, but devoted himself to his large planting interests and to his family. To Col. and Mrs. Gamble six children were born: Roger L., the subject of this sketch; Ruth L., deceased; Marguerite Eula, wife of George K. Chafee, Aiken, S. C.; Millard Gobert, who conducts large merchandise and planting interests, and married Miss Fannie Hunter of Louisville; Philip L., a large farmer, who married Miss Clarissa Baker of Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga.; and Ella, wife of Dr. W. H. Doughty of Augusta, one of the most eminent physicians in the state. Judge Gamble enjoyed exceptionally good educational advantages; first at the excellent schools of Louisville; then was a pupil in Augusta, respectively under Profs. Hard and Pelot; next under ex-Gov. Northen, then teaching at Mt. Zion, Hancock Co., Ga., and finally he was placed under the preceptorship of the pre-eminently distinguished educator, Col. Richard Malcolm Johnson, near Baltimore, Md. Returning to Georgia he entered the junior class at the university of Georgia, Athens, in 1869, and graduated in 1871. He then went to Augusta and read law under William Hope Hull, one of the profoundest members of the legal profession of his time, was admitted to the bar in Richmond superior court in 1872, and in January, 1873, located in Louisville and commenced practice under the most flattering auspices. His very superior abilities being recognized, in 1875 he was appointed judge of the county court, but was found to be disqualified by age, being too young. But that same year he was appointed solicitor of the county court, and held the office until 1880, when he was elected solicitor-general of the middle circuit and served one term—four years. In 1886 he was elected to represent Jefferson county in the general assembly, and was re-elected in 1888, serving two terms. When his legislative term expired in 1890 he was elected judge of the middle circuit and in 1894 was re-elected without opposition. It is very rare for a member of the legal profession to be called into the public service at the youthful age he was, or that one has been so rapidly and continuously promoted. Judge Gamble is universally regarded as one of the ablest lawyers in the state, while his record as solicitor and on the bench has been phenomenal. Being only just on the threshold of a vigorous mature manhood, possibilities and probabilities of a future for him of exceeding brilliance and great distinction are surpassed by no one now in public life in Georgia. Socially his family ranks with the most cultured in the state, while pecuniarily he is highly favored, having large planting interests. Judge Gamble was married in 1882 to Miss Cynthia, daughter of Dr. E. H. W. Hunter, and their household has been brightened and cheered by the addition of three children: Roger Lawson, Jr., Eula and Maude.

WILLIAM LITTLE, farmer, Grange, Jefferson Co., Ga., son of Robert P. and Elizabeth Little, was born in Jefferson county, May 19, 1851. His father was born in Burke county, Ga., and early in life moved to Jefferson county, where he acquired considerable property and became quite prominent. He represented the county one term in the general assembly before the war and one term since. He died in 1878, aged sixty-two years. His widow is still living, aged seventy-three. Both were members of the Presbyterian church, and the parents of eleven children. Mr. Little was educated at the Louisville academy, and at the age of eighteen began life for himself by farming, and has made it his life occupation, devoting his study and labor almost exclusively to it. He started with moderate means, but has kept his mind steadily on his business, managed well and invested judiciously, and now is one of the wealthiest men of his county. He attributes his substantial success and safe financial condition to adhering to the cash system—he owes no man. He has served the county as member of the board of roads and revenues, and in 1892-93 represented the county in the general assembly. Upright, substantial and thoroughly reliable, he enjoys the confidence of his fellow-citizens to the fullest extent. Mr. Little was married Nov. 19, 1875, to Miss Rosa Rozier of Burke county, who died the latter part of 1876, having borne him one child, who died in infancy. On Oct. 9, 1878, he contracted a second marriage with Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. R. K. Dixon, whose family was one of the most prominent and refined in that section of the state. He has four children living: Julia, Mary, William and Elizabeth. He is a stanch democrat, and a member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an elder.

WILLIAM P. LOWERY, merchant, Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., son of Rev. W. J., D. D., and Margaret (Bell) Lowery, was born March 4, 1869. On his father's side he is of Scotch-Irish lineage, four brothers of the name having come to Georgia. His paternal grandfather, William S. Lowery, was professor of Latin and French at Erskine college, Due West, S. C., for nearly twenty years.

His father was born in Louisville, Ga., in 1838, was educated at Erskine college and afterward attended, and at the age of eighteen was graduated from Princeton college, New Jersey; then entered the ministry as a Presbyterian clergyman, conscientiously discharging the duties of that sacred calling until Nov. 10, 1877, when he died while pastor of the First Presbyterian church at Louisville, Ky., aged thirty-eight. He was married twice. His first wife, a native of Starkville, Miss., died in Selma, Ala., in 1872, leaving three children: William Paul, Maggie Bell and Lula Eloise, who died in 1879. His second wife was Miss Mary C., daughter of Dr. R. K. Dixon of Jefferson county, who survives him. Mr. Lowery after preparatory studies entered Erskine college in 1883, from which he was graduated in 1887. After his graduation he taught school in South Carolina three years, and then came to Louisville—in January, 1891—and accepted a situation as salesman and bookkeeper with Beach & Farmer. In September, 1892, he entered into partnership with A. N. Beach in a general merchandise business. The firm has been very successful—its trade having materially increased every year, until now it is one of the largest and most prosperous business establishments in Louisville. Young, energetic and enterprising, possessing great business capabilities and unswerving integrity, he has before him the promise of a brilliant and prosperous business career. Mr. Lowery is a Knight of Pythias, of which he is a past chancellor, and was chosen to represent his (Damon) lodge at the grand lodge, May 21, 1895, in Atlanta. His family was largely represented in the revolutionary war, having had many relatives in the service; among them his maternal grandfather, Gen. Milton of Jefferson county. Ex-Gov. Milton of Florida was his grand-uncle. In politics he is a democrat.

JOHN ARCHIBALD M'MILLAN, farmer, Bartow, Jefferson Co., Ga., only child of Daniel and Mary (McRae) McMillan, was born in Montgomery county, Ga., Sept. 19, 1843. His father was a large and prosperous farmer, and accumulated much property. He represented his county a number of times in the general assembly, was a member of the Presbyterian church, and died in October, 1881, aged sixty-eight years. His widow, also a member of the Presbyterian church, is yet living, aged seventy-four years. Mr. McMillan attended school first at Mt. Vernon, in his native county, and later went to Coopersville, Screven Co., Ga. When the war between the states began he enlisted first in Capt. Styles' cavalry company, and afterward in the Twentieth Georgia cavalry, which was in Gen. Wade Hampton's command. Among other battles he participated in those of the Wilderness, Trevilians Station, Cold Harbor, and quite a number of minor engagements. He served through the war and received a slight wound—losing a finger at Cold Harbor. After the war he commenced business as a merchant at Mt. Vernon, built up a large trade and made money. He also established a store at Bartow, where he commanded a large trade. He has large farming interests; besides his home farm near Bartow, he has several in Montgomery county which he rents. He has acquired much property, and notwithstanding he has had the misfortune to lose very heavily, he still has large possessions. Although he is not a politician, as the term is generally understood, he was ordinary of Montgomery county twelve years. He has prospered, has an abundance and a good home on a well-stocked farm, and is prepared to live in quiet and comfort the balance of his life. Mr. McMillan was married in Jefferson county in 1873 to Miss Hollie F., daughter of Rev. R. W. Johnson. They have two children: Daniel Russell, twenty-one years old, now a student in Emory college, at Oxford, Ga., and John Archibald, attending school at Hephzibah, Richmond Co., Ga. Mr.

McMillan is a master Mason, and a leading member of the Methodist church, serving as a steward many years.

WILLIS D. RIVERS, merchant, Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., son of John F. and Phereby (Howard) Rivers, was born in Jefferson county, Oct. 29, 1856. His father was a prosperous farmer, and devoted his life to his farming interests, serving his fellow-citizens, however, as justice of the peace forty years. Ten children are the fruit of this marriage: George W., died in Richmond, Va., in 1863, while in the Confederate service; Solomon H., died May 27, 1893; John F., was in the militia service during the war, being too young to enter the army; Thomas W., wholesale grocer, Augusta, Ga.; Albert Preston; Willis David, the subject of this sketch; Emily, wife of S. A. H. Thompson, Jefferson county; Elizabeth, wife of S. M. McNai, same county; Savannah, wife of Dr. R. T. Barton, Richmond county, Ga.; Dilla F., wife of A. J. Williams, Jefferson county. Mr. Rivers after receiving a good primary education was prepared for college, but his original intention was not carried out. Instead in 1880 he entered Moore's Business college, Atlanta, from which he graduated the same year. He then taught school one term, after which he accepted a situation as bookkeeper for Little & Clark, and kept it for ten years, when—in January, 1891—he was elected tax collector of Jefferson county, and re-elected in 1893 and 1895, each time over the strongest opponent that the county afforded. Although a stanch democrat, and nominated and elected as such, his popularity drew support from all parties. In 1891 he commenced a general merchandise business with a partner under the firm name of Rivers & Stapleton, the trade growing to very large proportions and proving profitable. Of genial disposition he is very popular; while his mercantile training and strict business methods and accuracy, make him an invaluable public official. Mr. Rivers is a Knight of Pythias, and a master of finance of the local ledge.

GEORGE WILLIAMS WARREN, judge county court, Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., son of Lindsay C. and Julia (Battey) Warren, was born in Augusta, Ga., Aug. 18, 1851. His paternal grandfather, Benjamin H. Warren, was a native of Virginia, who, when a young man, came to Georgia and became quite wealthy and one of the most prominent citizens of Richmond county. Judge Warren's father was a leading merchant of Augusta, did a very large business and had also a large plantation interest. He was an active and valued member of the Presbyterian church, and died some years ago; his widow, a revered member of the same church, is still living. They were the parents of eight children, but only three are now living: Fannie, wife of J. H. Wilkins, Waynesboro, Ga.; Thomas H., merchant, and George Williams, the subject of this sketch. Judge Warren received his primary education first in the excellent schools in Augusta, and then in Louisville. In 1868 he entered the university of Georgia, Athens, from which he was graduated in 1871. After he graduated he attended the university of Scotland, at Edinburgh, a year, and thence went to Berlin, Germany, and entered the university there, where he remained two years. On his return here he read law under the preceptorship of Hon. J. C. C. Black, now representative from the Tenth congressional district of Georgia, and being admitted to the bar, located in Jefferson and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1892 he was elected to represent the Eighteenth senatorial district in the general assembly of Georgia and was chosen president pro tem. of the senate. In June, 1893, Gov. Northen appointed him judge of the county court of Jefferson county, the duties of which he has discharged with distinguished ability. In addition he has a very large planting interest and ranks high as an agriculturist as well as a jurist. Judge Warren was married in 1889 to Miss Mattie W. Walton, of Madison, Morgan Co., Ga., and to them two children have been born: Julia Battey and Mary Louise. He is an ardent and influential democrat and a member of the Methodist church.

JOHNSON COUNTY.

THOMAS JEFFERSON ARLINE, merchant, Wrightsville, Johnson Co., Ga., son of Thomas J. and Elizabeth McCauley (Gilbert) Arline, was born in Washington county, Jan. 17, 1865. His paternal great-grandfather was a native Virginian and raised a very large family. His grandparents were Jethro and Elizabeth (Mason) Arline, who had a family of eight children: Thomas J., Henry, who died young; Mary, Sarah, Jane E., Elizabeth, Martha and John M. Arline. Mr. Arline's grandfather was born in Virginia in 1804, was left an orphan when three years old and grew to manhood comparatively uneducated. He left two brothers in Virginia when he came to Georgia and settled in that part of Montgomery (originally Washington) county now included in Johnson county. He was a man of unusual religiosity, open-handed, an uncompromising temperance man, an exemplary member of the Methodist church and a liberal contributor to its support and to church building. Mr. Arline's father was born in what is now Johnson county, where he received a fairly good education and afterward clerked for several years and then engaged in farming near Oconee, where he was when the war between the states began. In 1861 he enlisted in the Twelfth Georgia battalion, and after serving three years died in Charleston, S. C., in 1864. His wife was of Scotch-Irish descent, and connected with the Lees and Daniels of Virginia, her father, Drewey Gilbert, being a son of William Gilbert, whose mother was a daughter of Joseph Daniel. Mr. Arline's maternal grandparents were natives of Washington county, Ga., and had but three children, herself and two brothers: Thomas M., who died young, and Mills, who was killed during the war while in the service. To Mr. Arline's parents two children were born, himself and a sister, Mattie McCauley Arline, who married Mr. Daley and lives in Atlanta. Mr. Arline's mother, who was a very pious woman and devoted to Christian work and advancement, died in May, 1865, when he was only three months old. Mr. Arline was raised on the farm and enjoyed very good educational advantages until he was fifteen years of age, when he engaged as a clerk for Dr. G. L. Mason in Washington county, with whom he continued a number of years. He then embarked in business with a Mr. Walker, under the firm name of T. J. Arline & Co., for two years, after which he formed another partnership with Mr. Daley, which continued for six years. He next organized the Arline Mercantile company, and two years afterward (Jan. 8, 1895) bought the hardware department and is now engaged in the hardware and grocery business. He has been content to attend strictly to business, taking no part in politics further than casting his vote for such candidates as in his judgment would serve the public interest the best. His fellow-citizens, however, elected him a member of the city council, where he is doing good service, and he is also a trustee of Nannie Lou Warthen college at Wrightsville. Mr. Arline was married Jan. 8, 1885, to Miss Maggie McCord Malpass, daughter of Kinchen and Mrs. Augustus Cummings, of Hancock county, who has borne him four children: Walter Thomas, Clarence, Madeline and Eva McCauley. Mr. Arline is a royal arch Mason and himself and wife are working and influential members of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward.

JOHN F. GRANTHAM, farmer, Wrightsville, Johnson Co., Ga., son of Owen and Elizabeth (Gaddy) Grantham, was born in North Carolina, Sept. 1, 1837. His paternal grandfather, Josiah Grantham, was a native of England and emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, through which he served as a soldier in the continental army. He settled in North Carolina, in which state he married happily and became a man of property and prominence, and himself and wife lived to be very old. His son, Stephen, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in North Carolina, June 23, 1790, where he grew to manhood, married and spent his life, and raised a family of twelve children, of which Owen was the oldest. Mr. Grantham's father (Owen) was born in Robeson county, June 23, 1812, was raised a farmer and remained one all his life. He was twice married—his first wife being Miss Elizabeth Gaddy, by whom he had four children: John F., the subject of this sketch; Ann, wife of Elias Mitchell; S. E., wife of L. R. Daniels, and Catharine Ann, wife of J. D. Rodgers. The mother of these died in 1844, and subsequently he married Miss Abigail Powell, born and raised in Cumberland county, N. C., by whom he had nine children, eight of whom reached maturity. He died June 16, 1882, and himself and wife were members of the Missionary Baptist church, in which faith they raised their children. Mr. Grantham was raised on the farm, and after attending the county schools finished his education at an academy, after which he went to Louisiana and engaged in planting. When the war between the states began he enlisted (1861) in Company A, First Mississippi regiment, which became a part of the western army. With his command he bore a part in the battles of Shiloh and Shelbyville, in which last-named battle he was wounded in the hip by a minie ball, which he keeps as a memento of perils past. He served through the war, but was at home on leave of absence at the time of the surrender; his command was at Nashville. He returned to his North Carolina home after the war and resumed farming. Subsequently he came to Georgia and settled in Mitchell county, still pursuing his original occupation. He remained in Mitchell county six years, after which he sold out his turpentine business and moved to Macon, in Bibb county, Ga., engaging in other business until the present year, when he moved to Johnson county, again investing in the turpentine business, which he is now carrying on. For twenty years he has been engaged in the turpentine business, which he has made a splendid success of. He is a wide-awake business man, energetic and enterprising, and takes an interest in everything calculated to develop the resources of his locality. Mr. Grantham was married in 1866 to Miss Martha E.—born in South Carolina—daughter of John R. and Sarah (Ford) Watson, who bore him eight children: Sarah E., Beulah B., Owen W., Alfred P., lawyer; James M., druggist, Albany; Lena M., deceased; Virginia M. and Lillie, deceased. The mother of these children died in 1883, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, of which Mr. Grantham is also a communicant.

JOHN F. NORRIS, tax collector, Wrightsville, Johnson Co., Ga., son of William and Behlison (Powell) Norris, was born in Emanuel (now Johnson) county, Ga., in 1836. His father, of Scotch descent, was born in South Carolina, came to Georgia when eighteen years of age and settled in Emanuel county, where he married. Fifteen children were born to him, of whom thirteen reached maturity. He had five sons in the Confederate service: Isaac, Benjamin, Jordan, William and James. The two last-named were killed, and Benjamin died in prison while in the service. Of the two survivors Jordan is a Primitive Baptist minister. His wife was a daughter of Benjamin Powell, a member of an old and well-known family, and was born in Georgia. Mr. Norris' mother died in 1856, and his father died in January, 1874. Mr. Norris grew to manhood on the farm and received a very meager education. At the age of eighteen he engaged as a clerk with Mr. W. F. McVeigh, and remained with him three years, when he was elected tax-collector, which office he was re-elected to and held a number of terms. He then formed a partnership under the firm-name of (John B.) Wright & Norris, and engaged in a general merchandise business, which continued until the death of his partner, when he closed its affairs. Subsequently he was again elected tax collector, which office he now holds, and which he has held, altogether, twenty-four years. No better evidence could be given in proof of his business capacity, his efficiency and faithfulness, and his popularity than this fact supplies. In addition to merchandising and holding the office he does, he has continued farming, and now owns and conducts a fine farm, running eight to ten plows. He is a good farmer, as well as a good public officer, prosperous and popular. Mr. Norris was married in December, 1875, to Miss Etta, daughter of Etta Moye, of Washington county, Ga. Her father died during the civil war while in the service. To them five children have been born: John B. W., Lizzie D., deceased; William P., Luella Mabel. Himself and wife are members of the Christian church.

JONES COUNTY.

S. M. ANDERSON, M. D., deceased, son of John C. and Nancy A. Anderson, was born in Monroe county, Ga., July 5, 1829. The Andersons were originally from Virginia. Dr. Anderson's father came from the Old Dominion to Georgia in the 20's, and located in Monroe county, where he raised his family. He was accidentally killed. Dr. Anderson grew to manhood in his native county, where he studied medicine, and afterward attended lectures at, and graduated from the Ohio Medical college at Cincinnati. He located in the southwestern portion of Jones county, Ga., where he did an extensive and profitable practice for thirty years. Retiring from active practice about 1886, he removed to Hillsboro, Jasper Co., and devoted the remainder of his days to church and educational work. He died there Jan. 18, 1893. The following is an extract from a voluntary tribute to his memory, prepared and published by a friend: "At the age of fifteen he united with the Missionary Baptist church. When he removed to Hillsboro, there being no church of his order there, he, with a few others, undertook and erected the Baptist church at that place, which now stands near his grave, as a monument to his memory, his devotion to Christ and to the Christian religion. In his death a wife has lost a devoted husband, the children an affectionate father, the county a good citizen and physician, the church a consistent and devoted member, and the masonic fraternity a tried and zealous brother. He has left a valuable legacy to all, in his quiet, orderly, meek, peaceable, hospitable and charitable life." About 1859 Dr. Anderson married Miss Frances A. Alexander, in Jones county, and raised a family of nine children. He was a firm believer in education, and gave his children the best advantages his means would command. J. F. Anderson, Cornucopia, Jones Co., Ga., the eldest son, was graduated at Mercer university, Macon, Ga., in 1881, and, choosing his father's profession, went to Baltimore, where he graduated in 1885, at the College of Physicians and Surgeons. He succeeded to his father's practice and continued it with skill and profit for several years. His eyesight failing he retired from active practice and is now planting at the old homestead. His popularity with his fellow-democrats brought him the nomination in 1894 for representative of Jones county, and he is now serving in that capacity. J. L., the second son, was also graduated at Mercer university, and is a planter on the old homestead. J. W., the third son, after graduating at Mercer university read medicine, then attended lectures at Bellevue Medical college, New York, whence he graduated, and is now located at Clinton, Jones Co., where he is building up an excellent practice. Carola, married F. G. Middlebrook, and now resides at Flovilla, Butts Co.; Mittie is the wife of J. W. Turner, Hillsboro, Ga.; Lela, Roberta, Eula B. and Marietta, single daughters, are living with their mother at Hillsboro.

JAMES F. BARRON, physician and surgeon, Clinton, Jones Co., Ga., son of William and Elizabeth (Finney) Barron, was born in Jones county, Feb. 10, 1825. Dr. Barron's great-grandfather, Barron, was a native-Irishman, who came to this country in colonial days, and settled in Maryland. From Maryland the family moved to Virginia, where the doctor's grandfather, Samuel Barron, married and went to North Carolina, where he lived until about 1792, when he migrated to Georgia, and settled in Hancock county. In 1809 his grandfather moved into Jones county, then just organized, and settled about six miles north of what is now Clinton, the county seat. Of eleven children born to him all are dead. Dr. Barron's father was born in Hancock county, and married in Jones, where he lived and died. He was the father of eight children: Mary, widow of William Morris, Jones county; James F., the subject of this sketch; John W., died in California; William G., deceased; Abington, died in Camp Douglas, Ill., Dec. 29, 1864; Joanna, widow of Dr. Austin, Fort Valley, Ga.; Robert H., Macon, Ga.; and Andrew J., died in the army of disease, July 2, 1862. He was elected a captain of militia when it was regarded a distinction, and was also elected sheriff, served several years, and was serving as such at the time of his death, Dec. 21, 1836; his widow died, Feb. 11, 1848. Dr. Barron, being the eldest son, and only eleven years old when his father died, had to assume grave responsibilities, and enter upon the battle of life when young. He went to school, and taught, alternately, until he acquired a fair education. He then studied medicine, and, when twenty-seven years of age, graduated from the medical department, university of New York. He located the same year in Clinton, where he has since resided. When the war between the states began, he volunteered, but yielding to the importunities of friends, remained at home for the benefit of soldiers' families, and practiced for them without compensation during the war. When twenty-one he was elected justice of the peace—no unmeaning or insignificant compliment. In 1855 he was elected as a democrat to represent the county one term in the general assembly. In 1858 he was elected a justice of the inferior court, and held the office fifteen years. In 1867 he was elected judge of the county court, but resigned in a few months. Dr. Barron was married in 1853, in Jasper county, to Miss Joanna E. Shropshire, who has borne him six children: James H., farmer, Jasper county; William W., clerk superior court, Jones county; Jackson C., judge Jones county court; A. B. L., teacher, Clinton; Sallie E., single; Robert E., physician, Macon, Ga. Dr. Barron is an uncompromising democrat, and a master Mason; and that he enjoys the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens is evidenced by his election to office, and his being continued so long in any he would accept.

HENRY S. GREAVES, United States deputy collector, Clinton, Jones Co., Ga., son of Joseph D. and Mary (Shorter) Greaves, was born in Crawfordsville, Taliaferro Co., Ga., April 17, 1830. His father was born and reared at Murfreesboro, Tenn., came to Georgia when a young man and settled in Taliaferro county, where he married his wife. Mr. Greaves' grandfather on his mother's side, Henry Shorter, was a member of the family of that name so distinguished for eminent public services in Georgia and Alabama, he having been a brother of Dr. Reuben Shorter, father of the late ex-Gov. John Gill Shorter, and ex-Congressman Eli Shorter, of Alabama. Mr. Greaves' father was a successful planter and speculator, and left a fine estate. He died in Barbour county, Ala., in 1840; and his wife died in 1858, in Fairburn, Ga. They raised a family of nine children: Sarah (deceased); Virginia (deceased); Henry S., the subject of this sketch; Henrietta, widow of Mr. McRae, Henderson county, Texas; Frank (deceased); Reuben (deceased); Joseph (deceased); Cornelia, widow of Richard Hustings, Macon, Ga.; and Mary (deceased). Before he died Mr. Greaves removed his family to Barbour county, Ala. In 1850 they returned to Clinton, to their old Georgia home—so that Mr. Greaves was raised and educated partly in Alabama and partly in Georgia. His introduction to practical business life was as a clerk in a store in Eufaula, Ala.; his fixed life business until 1862 was farming. That year he enlisted in Anderson's battery of artillery as a private, which command was assigned to the western army, reaching it in time to participate in the battle of Murfreesboro. Before and after that battle he accompanied Gen. N. B. Forrest in some of his raids. He was at the second Fort Donelson fight, the battles of Lookout Mountain, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, and then in front of Gen. Sherman between Chattanooga and Atlanta, and in his "march through Georgia." He had a horse shot under him and holes shot through his clothes at Fort Donelson, and holes through his hat at Atlanta, but received not a scratch on his body. He was with the forces surrendered at Greensboro, N. C. During his service he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. After the war he engaged in farming; also clerked for Juhan & Clower, and managed the merchandise business of Peter L. Clower until his death. In 1868-69 he was elected tax collector for Jones county, and held the office of county treasurer for sixteen years—until he would serve no longer. In 1893 he received the appointment of deputy collector Sixth division, United States internal revenue service, with headquarters at Macon. Mr. Greaves was married Dec. 3, 1857, to Miss Martha, daughter of Thomas W. and Pollie Stewart of Jones county, who has borne him the following children: Annie S.; wife of James A. Stewart, Clinton, Ga., drummer for Adam Watson & Co., Macon, Ga.; Frank H. (deceased); and H. Clower (deceased). Frank H. Greaves (deceased), son of Mr. Greaves, was a young man of remarkable intellectual capacity, intense religious sentiment, and other prominent interesting characteristics, giving promise of a most brilliant future. He had been educated at Mercer university, and in his sophomore year won the "black medal" for declamation; and as a junior was given a speaker's place. The spring before he would have graduated he, through Congressman Blount, was appointed to a West Point cadetship. After two months' preliminary instruction he went to West Point, but at the end of six months resigned and returned home on account of protracted sickness. On his recovery he accepted the position of bookkeeper for C. B. Willingham, warehouseman, Macon, Ga., which he held until his last sickness. He was attacked by typhoid fever, and wasting slowly away died Dec. 21, 1885, in the twenty-fourth year of his age. He was an exceptionally devout member of the Baptist church, conspicuous for his deep piety, his observance of every Christian duty, and the ordinances of his church. He developed intellectual ability and spiritual gifts of a high order, and was publicly zealously active in all denominational and Christian work.

JAMES HURT, planter, Blountville, Jones Co., Ga., son of William and Lucy (Turner) Hurt, was born in Warren county, Ga., June 2, 1828. His grandfather, Elisha Hurt, came from Virginia to Georgia, and settled in Warren county the latter part of the last century—where he raised his family. Mr. Hurt's father passed most of his life in that county; but late in life he moved into western Georgia, and ultimately to Russell county, Ala. He was killed in 1844 by the falling of a tree while on a visit to his old home in Warren. His wife died in 1833. He was a man of considerable wealth when he died, but it was lost by mismanagement. They reared seven children: Elisha; George T.; Benjamin Joel; Elizabeth, Mrs. Miller, Rockdale county, Ga.; James, the subject of this sketch; Nancy (deceased); and William (deceased). George T. and Benjamin were members of Cobb's legion, and were killed in the war. Mr. Hurt received a very fair education, and when beginning life for himself embarked in a general merchandise business in the northeastern part of Jones county, in 1852. He did a prosperous business there until it was interrupted by the "unpleasantness" of 1861. He enlisted in the state troops, and served at different times and places; was at the battle of Griswoldville. Since the war he has confined himself to farming, of which he has made a success, as his nice home and pleasant surroundings amply testify. Mr. Hurt was married in 1858 to Miss Mary, daughter of Cary and Leah Davison. They have had but one child, Ida L., who married a Mr. Wagnon, now dead, and the widowed daughter and her little daughter, Alline, are with "the old folks at home." Mr. Hurt belongs to the democracy, and has been a member of the county executive committee. He is also a member of the Methodist church. The Hurts are an aggressively progressive family, a representative type of which is the dashing and daring electric street railway and real estate operator in Atlanta—Joel Hurt. It will be observed that one of Mr. Hurt's brothers bore the same name, which would indicate blood relationship.

G. W. F. M'KAY, planter and mechanic, Plenitude, Jones Co., Ga., son of Hugh and Sarah (Dixon) McKay, was born in Jones county, July 4, 1828. His father was a native of the Hebrides islands (off the west coast of Scotland), where this branch of the McKay family had lived for generations, and came to America, a nine-year-old orphan boy, in 1773. He had relatives in Wilmington, N. C., who raised him to manhood. In 1811 he married Isabella McQueen, by whom he had six children. In 1823, having lost his wife, he came with his family to Georgia and settled in Bibb county. There he married Miss Sarah Dixon, by whom he had three children: Hugh Dixon (deceased); G. W. F., the subject of this sketch, and an infant, unnamed. About 1826 he settled the place where G. W. F. now lives, and where he died, May 21, 1839. He was a whig in politics, and a man of great energy and perseverance. Mr. McKay, the only surviving member of the family, has passed his life at the old homestead where he was born. On Oct. 16, 1849, he was married to Susan A., daughter of Henry and Nancy Finney—a native of Jones county, by whom he has had eight children: Alexander H. S., Clinton, Ga.; Henry A., Jones county; Hugh D. (deceased); Annie L. (deceased), wife of C. L. McCarty, Jones county; William Lee, Macon, Ga.; Jeff Davis; Henrietta D., died in infancy; Sarah J., died in infancy. Mr. McKay's mother died in 1863. He has never sought office, but such is his popularity that the people elected him twice to represent Jones county in the general assembly—1882-83, and 1892-93. He was the author of the act requiring the signatures of three-fifths of the voters to a petition for holding an election on the sale of intoxicants in a county. Mr. McKay is unusually well informed, is enterprising and progressive, and possesses great versatility intellectually. He takes great pride in his children and took the deepest in their education. The intelligent and wise foresight of this is demonstrated by the estimation in which they are held, and their positions in professional and business circles. One son, Alexander H. S., is county school commissioner, one of the most efficient in the state; and another, Hugh D., after graduating in medicine at Bellevue Hospital Medical college in 1883, returned to his native county and practiced five years—until 1888—when he died; in the meantime building a reputation for ability and skill not surpassed by any equally young practitioner in the state, giving great promise of future professional distinction; and establishing a large and lucrative practice. Mr. McKay owns a fine 2,700-acre plantation; is a democrat; is a Knight Templar Mason—for years presiding over the master's lodge; and himself and wife are ardent and zealous working Methodists.

MOUGHON. This is a name that will be recognized by citizens of middle Georgia as belonging to one of the old aristocratic families whose wealth and position in old slavery days were of the highest. The present representative of the family is Col. W. S. Moughon, a planter of Jones county, residing four miles north of Haddock. His father, Thomas Moughon, was a Virginian by birth, who, coming to Baldwin county, Ga., wooed and won Miss Mary G. Sanford, a member of another of the old aristocratic families of the state. The greater part of their lives was passed in Jones county, where the fine old plantation home still stands, and where a family of four children were raised: Thomas (now deceased); Maria (deceased), wife of Jere Bell; Henrietta, who married Joseph Bond, known as the wealthiest planter in middle Georgia before the war. After his death she married Mr. Charles L. Nelson, and is again a widow, residing in Louisville, Ky. The fourth and youngest child was W. S., the subject of this sketch. The thrift and energy of the father of this family resulted in the accumulation of a vast estate in lands and negroes. He was a man of varied attainments, and was honored repeatedly by his fellow-citizens by his election to represent the county in the general assembly. W. S. Moughon was born in Jones county, Nov. 2, 1825, and was raised with all the advantages that wealth could command. He was educated at Mercer university, and assuming control of the estate after the death of his father has devoted his attention to planting exclusively. He has, however, been honored with political position, having represented Jones county twice, and Bibb county once in the general assembly. Col. Moughon's first marriage occurred in Columbia county, in 1847, when he wedded Miss Parthenia Ramsey, to whom twins were born—Emily J., widow of Allen Holt, Jones county, and Elizabeth S., wife of R. M. Bazemore, of Dalton, Ga. Mrs. Moughon died just after the war, and Col. Moughon contracted a second marriage, which was celebrated July 22, 1868, at the famous watering place, Saratoga, N. Y., the bride being Miss Alice K. Wyche of Macon, Ga., who has since presided at his home. Mrs. Moughon was a daughter of Ainsley H. and Harriet (Sullivan) Wyche, a family of English descent, reputed to have been connected with Lord Sterling. Her father, was born and raised in South Carolina. He came to Georgia while a young man, and married his wife in Macon. He became an extensive cotton broker there, and also attained to celebrity as a writer on political subjects, and other topics of general interest. At the time of her marriage Mrs. Moughon was regarded as one of the most versatile and beautiful women in middle Georgia, and she has lost none of that charming vivaciousness and piquancy which made her so attractive and popular. The following named bright and beautiful children grace the family circle of this delightful home, the two oldest daughters being worthy representatives of their charming mother: W. S., a broker in Birmingham, Ala.; Hattie G.; L. Jordan; Gordon W.; Villette S.; Thomas; Clifford, and Ruth.

EDMOND T. MORTON, planter, Morton's Station, Jones Co., Ga., son of Oliver H. and Catharine (Harris) Morton, was born in Jones county, Jan. 27, 1830. His great-grandfather, Oliver H. Morton, was a native of Boston, Mass., was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and made a prisoner and carried to England. He escaped from confinement, and during his wanderings afterward traveled nearly all over Ireland. He finally came to North Carolina, where he married a Miss Everett, in Ashe county. He followed the sea about twenty-eight years, and then settled down as a planter. He migrated from North Carolina to Georgia about 1807 and settled in Jones county, between one and two miles from Clinton, the county seat, where he died at the advanced age of ninety-eight years. Mr. Morton's grandparents passed their lives on this original plantation, and reared quite a large family there. His father was born in 1804 in North Carolina and married Miss Harris, born in Edgefield district, South Carolina, whence her family came about 1812. To them were born the following children: Franklin, deceased; Lavinia, deceased; Thomas, deceased; Edmond, planter, Jones county; William, deceased; Sarah, Mrs. Sydney Bryan, Putnam county; Minerva, Mrs. Pope, of Louisiana; Edmond T., the subject of this sketch; Cynthia, Mrs. Bazemore, Taylor county, Ga.; Mary, Mrs. Cobb, Laurens county, Ga.; and Catharine, Mrs. Wright, Jones county. Mr. Morton had no aspirations for public life, belonged to the old whig party, and felt only the interest in the government of a plain citizen. Himself and wife were members of the Primitive Baptist church. Mrs. Morton died in 1876, and Mr. Morton in 1891, aged eighty-eight years. Mr. Morton has made farming the business of his life, and has no record to speak of aside from that. He enlisted in 1862 in a cavalry company (Company E), commanded by Capt. Dunlap, of Macon, Ga., as a private, and saw service in South Carolina and Virginia. He came out of the war some $6,000 in debt, but now has three plantations of 1,200, 700 and 428 acres respectively, all model farms in every respect. His home place, 1,200 acres, is said to be one of the choicest farms in Jones county. He runs twenty-seven plows. He has paid the money he owed and bought these farms and the stock on them since the war, and, to use his own expression, he has "dug it all out of the ground." He is undoubtedly one of the best farmers in the state. There are several brothers, and all of them have very fine plantations, and are known in that section as the "thrifty Mortons." William, who died a year or two ago, had the finest plantation home in the state. Mr. Morton was married in 1861 to Mrs. Adaline Moore, daughter of Herrington Patterson, Jones county, by whom he has had two children: Edmund P., Morton Station, Ga., and Addie Kate, wife of Homer Johnson, who, with her husband, son of Judge Johnson, of Clinton, makes her home with her parents, who dote on her. She is said to possess a lovable disposition and many charming traits of character, a model daughter and wife, and entirely worthy of all the affection bestowed upon her by her parents.

H. B. RIDLEY, planter, Cornucopia, Jones Co., Ga., son of Dr. Charles L. and Susan Ann (Bonner) Ridley, was born in Hancock county, Ga., Oct. 21, 1828. His grandfather, Dr. James Ridley, was an eminent physician in Oxford, Granville Co., N. C., where he died. Four of his sons came to Georgia, and all became prominent in the several localities in which they lived. His father, Dr. Charles L. Ridley, born July 5, 1802, was a well-educated man, a skillful physician, who practiced in Hancock and Jasper counties and amassed quite a fortune. He was a whig in politics, very prominent in public affairs, and was a member of the convention which adopted the ordinance of secession, against which he voted. He married Miss Bonner, who was of Scotch descent, in Hancock county, where she was born and reared. They had three sons who grew to manhood: James B., a physician, who, enlisting in the Confederate service, was appointed surgeon of the Thirty-second Georgia regiment, and died in 1862 of typhoid fever; H. B., the subject of this sketch, and Robert B., farmer, who died in 1863. Dr. Ridley died in April, 1873. Capt. Ridley arrived at manhood in Jones county, and has been a planter all his life. He settled his plantation, 3,000 acres, in 1851. When hostilities began he raised a company (Company B, Thirty-second Georgia regiment), and was made its captain. In 1861 they were stationed a short time near Savannah, in the state service, then transferred to the regular service, and served through the war, surrendering in North Carolina. In 1875 he was elected to represent Jones county in the general assembly one term, and in 1884-85 he represented the Twenty-first senatorial district in the same body. Capt. Ridley is a quite important factor in county politics, being exceptionally well informed and a shrewd politician. He has been a member of the democratic state executive committee, and chairman of the county executive committee repeatedly. In 1849 he was married in Bertie county, N. C., to Miss Mary E., daughter of Thomas Speller. They have no children, but have reared a niece, Lillie Watson, his wife's sister's daughter, now a charming and accomplished young lady, whose mother is also a member of the household. Capt. Ridley is a fine type of the old-time country gentleman; has his blooded horses, his broad acres of fertile lands yielding abundantly, and the entire household being good musicians, he entertains most royally. He is an uncompromising democrat and a master Mason.

L. SKETOE, farmer, Griswoldville, Jones Co., Ga., son of Gary and Rachel (Campbell) Sketoe, was born in Darlington district, S. C., Oct. 27, 1831. His grandfather, John Sketoe, was a native Spaniard who first came to North Carolina, moved then to South Carolina with his family, and lived there until he died. Gary, his son, was reared and married in South Carolina, whence he came to Wilkinson county, Ga., in 1837. Three years thereafter he removed to Twiggs county, where he remained one year, and then moved into Jones county, where he died in 1870. His wife died in 1868. They reared to maturity but two children out of ten boys born: William, who died of disease while a soldier in the army of Virginia during the war, and the subject of this sketch. Mr. Sketoe was reared a farmer in Jones county, which has been his principal pursuit through life. Just after the war, however, until 1872, he followed railroading. In the fall of that year he bought a 340-acre farm, about twelve miles from Macon, near Griswoldville, and has resided there since, and placed himself in comfortable circumstances with a good home, and esteemed by all his neighbors. Mr. Sketoe was married in January, 1860, to Miss Mary Brewer, who bore him two children: William D., railroad contractor, and Cornelia G., wife of William Balkcom, Jones county. The mother of these children died in 1870. In 1872 Mr. Sketoe married Mrs. Alice (Tarver) Alford, who had three children by her former husband: A. O., deceased; Ava, wife of Henry Morgan, Savannah, Ga., and Alice, deceased. Two children are the offspring of this second marriage: Lela R., wife of Alonzo Balkcom, Jones county, and Thomas L., a bright and very promising thirteen-year-old boy, of fine mental endowments and decidedly literary in his tastes. Mrs. Sketoe died May 4, 1891. Mr. Sketoe is an ardent populist, a master Mason and a Methodist.

L EONIDAS SMITH, planter, Blountsville, Jones Co., Ga., son of John T. and Elizabeth Frances (Key) Smith, was born in Jones county, Dec. 17, 1840. His father, John T. Smith, was born in Weldon, N. C., where he lived until he was nineteen years of age, when he and an older brother, Lovid, early in the 30's, came to Jones county, Ga. About two years after he came to Georgia, March 12, 1835, he married Miss Key. Of the children born to him by her the following are living: Amanda, Mrs. Jeremiah Miller, Jones county, Ga.; Leonidas, the subject of this sketch; Robert, planter, Jones county, and John H., Orange county, Fla. The mother of these having died Mr. Smith married for his second wife Miss Carrie C. Clark, of Houston county, Ga., who survives him. The children born to him by this marriage, now living, are these: Benjamin T., Jones county; Sarah F., wife of Col. Green, of Hancock county, Ga., and William A., Jones county. Mr. Smith, who politically was a democrat, and religiously a Baptist, died April 13, 1873. Mr. Smith has spent his life in planting, and has been successful. In addition to an 1,800-acre plantation near Blountsville, Jones county, he has other plantations in Putnam county, Ga. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in Company B, Twelfth Georgia regiment. He was in the seven days' fight and the second Manassas, in which he was wounded in the left arm. He returned home, and was not again in the regular service. He was elected sheriff of the county in 1868, and served four years. Mr. Smith was married in Jones county to Miss Mary A. M. Tufts, April 14, 1870, who has borne him ten children: Tallulah, wife of Charles Farrar, Jones county, Ga.; Sarah J.; William; Mamie Lee; John T.; Fannie; Laura Belle; Claude; Virgil, and Colton. Mr. Smith is a democrat and a master Mason.

R OBERT J. SMITH, planter, Round Oak, Jones Co., Ga., son of Robert J. and Sarah T. (O'Bryan) Smith, was born in Floyd county, Va., Aug. 8, 1837. His grandfather, William D. Smith, was of English extraction, was an officer in the revolutionary army six years, and then fought the Indians three years. He was a large and handsome man, and after he left the military service became a Methodist preacher. When Mr. Smith was eight years old his father, who was a planter, removed from Virginia to Bradley county, Tenn. There they reared a family of five children: William D., who was a Methodist preacher, deceased; Charles H., deceased; Robert J., the subject of this sketch; Mattie, wife of L. J. Hughes, Bradley county, Tenn., and Susan C., who died when twelve years of age. Mrs. Smith died in 1861, and Mr. Smith died in 1873. Mr. Smith was educated at and was graduated from Hiwassee college, Tenn., in 1862, with the degree of A. B., and later received the degree of A. M. He was physically unable to participate in the war, so between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four he taught and attended school alternately. In 1862 he left Tennessee and came to Murray county, Ga., where he taught school one year, and then went to Putnam county, where he taught until 1875. He then farmed until 1877, when he located on a plantation of 2,000 acres. He has neither sought nor held any public office, devoting his time exclusively to his extensive planting interests, excepting two years he served on the democratic executive committee for the county. As a teacher he was popular and successful, being well educated and well read and of an unusually impressive presence and personality. Mr. Smith was married Dec. 14, 1875, to Miss Sallie M., daughter of Benjamin and Sallie (Shropshire) Barron, one of the wealthiest and most influential families in that section, Mr. Barron having represented the county in the general assembly. His children all occupy a fine social position. Mr. Smith has had but one child born to him, Sallie B., who died when seven years of age. Mr. Smith is a democrat, a royal arch Mason and a Methodist; is a steward of the church in his community. He has a beautiful home and takes great pride in keeping it in good order.

WILLIAMS. Of the many old and honorable families in Jones county none can point to a clearer record than this. For many years they have patiently tilled the generously yielding soil in the northeastern portion of Jones county, bearing the honorable distinction of "model" farmers. John Williams, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was a Virginian of Welsh-Irish descent, who moved with his family to Warren county, Ga., in the latter part of the last century. He raised a family of four boys and six girls. Only one of this family is now living—Mr. John Williams, eighty-two years of age. The other three lived to a ripe old age and raised families. Samuel and Henry became more or less prominent in politics, having been members of the general assembly from their different counties. The mother of the family was Mary Childers. The other son, Thomas Williams, was born and raised on the plantation in Putnam county, where his only son, John T. Williams, now resides. June 7, 1840, he married Samantha E. Dismuke, who survives him, he having departed this life Sept. 2, 1881. They raised the following named children: Marietta, deceased; Martha D., Mrs. Wesley G. Kimbro, Putnam county, Ga.; Ann Eliza, deceased wife of Dr. Clark; Ophelia, wife of J. J. Pelot, Atlanta; Eúzenia, wife of Hon. A. D. Candler, secretary of state of Georgia; John T., the subject of this sketch; Florence Elizabeth, wife of Irby G. Scott, Putnam county, Ga.; Alice, wife of Willis T. Price, Macon, Ga. The father of this family was a careful, thrifty and industrious man, who started early in life with comparatively nothing and accumulated a large property. Disinclined to public life, he devoted himself to the cultivation and improvement of his plantation. He stood high in the estimation of his neighbors and was a worthy citizen in every respect. John Tom Williams, as he is familiarly called, the only son of the above, now lives on the old plantation where he was born. He is a farmer and nothing else—his laudable ambition being to sustain the family record in the line of good farming, and the farm he manages will compare favorably with the most excellent in Jones and the surrounding counties. He is worthily filling the place vacated by his father. Before the alliance went into politics he was an ardent and prominent member. In 1889, when the Central railway proposed to give a free trip to Ohio to a body of editors and a representative farmer from each congressional district, Mr. Williams was selected to represent the sixth—a significant compliment. He went, and was gone three weeks. The trip and experience are an ever green spot in his life-history. Dec. 10, 1879, Mr. Williams was married to Miss Annie R., youngest daughter of Maj. Ben Barron, who has borne him five children: John T., Jr., died when two years old; Annie E., Alice O., Walter B., and John T., Jr.

LAURENS COUNTY.

CAPT. R. C. HENRY, vice-president of the Dublin Banking company, Dublin, Ga., is the leading spirit of his little enterprising city, and has behind him a long and interesting career. He is the son of Neal and Ann (Bouhan) Henry, and was born in North Carolina, April 28, 1838. His father was a prominent planter of that state, where he died; his mother is still surviving at an advanced age. Capt. Henry is one of those gentlemen to whom can be justly applied that honorable term, "a self-made man." Of humble but honest parentage, he was at eighteen without capital and with but little education. Having been reared in the Cape Fear river country, his first efforts were enlisted in the boating industry, on a very humble scale at first, it is true, but with a spirit and energy which soon mended his fortunes. In these early efforts he was associated with his brother, who died during the first year of the war. By the time the war was in progress he had become master of a small river steamer which he owned and which he frequently placed at the disposal of the new Confederacy, of which he was an ardent supporter. Most of his boating at that period was done between Fayetteville and Wilmington. After the war he became identified with the agricultural interests of his section, being connected somewhat also with mercantile life. But the river life had so impressed him that he soon again invested his earnings in a vessel, which he commanded until his removal to Dublin, in October, 1874. When Capt. Henry came to Dublin he had not yet accumulated much, save a rich experience, which he forthwith began to make available in establishing the boating industry from Dublin to the ocean, confining his personal efforts to the Oconee river. His connection with the Central railroad at its point of crossing the river gave him a large freight and passenger trade, and for a number of years he continued a prosperous business. Upon the building of the W. & T. railroad into Dublin the business was somewhat curtailed, but he still continued to do well on the lower part of the river. In 1890 he became interested in the present banking venture and sold out his river business. In "all and singular" of these enterprises Capt. Henry has conducted them on the policy of "live and let live," and enjoys the reputation of being honest and square in all his dealings. Capt. Henry is a veteran of the late war, having enlisted in Company A, of the Third North Carolina cavalry (Barringer's brigade), in 1861, as a private. He was in numerous engagements, the hottest one being at Five Forks; he was also present at the siege of Fort Fisher. The captain's marriage occurred in North Carolina in 1879 to Louisa, daughter of John Bannerman, and who now presides over his pleasant home. In religious belief he is a Presbyterian, and in politics a stanch democrat.

CAPT. HARDY SMITH, the popular ordinary of Laurens county, whose public life has been continuous since January, 1866, was born in this county Oct. 24, 1841. He is a grandson of Hardy Smith, who helped achieve the independence of the colonies, and after the revolutionary war with his family left North Carolina and migrated to Georgia, settling on the Oconee river, where he cleared up a "patch" and established a rude home. One of the sons was given his own name, and married Ann, daughter of Gaillard Anderson, who was originally from North Carolina, a pioneer settler of Laurens county, Ga., and in time a large land and slave holder. The children of this marriage were: Hardy, Lafton L., Rachel E., Rebecca, Daniel A., Henry P. and Ann Eliza. Attending the common schools of the day until he was prepared to enter the university, Capt. Hardy became a matriculate at Athens, with the intention of securing a collegiate education. But the war breaking out at this, for him, inopportune time, he left school—not again to return—to become a soldier. Enlisting in that famous organization, the Blackshear guards, at the age of nineteen years, he became by election second lieutenant of Company H, of the Fourteenth Regimental Georgia volunteers. During service he was promoted to the captaincy, in which position he led his company at the battle of Mechanicsville, where he was severely wounded in the right arm by a ball constructed so as to explode when coming in contact with the bone. The ultimate result of this wound was the amputation of that member, the empty sleeve being an ever-present badge of honor, testifying to the loyalty and valor of its owner. This battle occurred June 26, 1862. After his recovery Capt. Smith rejoined his regiment and in 1864 was placed on the retired list and appointed to the position of enrolling officer of the Fifth congressional district, with headquarters at Augusta, Ga. He held this office during the continuance of the war. Returning home, Capt. Smith was, in 1866, elected clerk of the superior court of Laurens county, and held that office continuously until 1893, when he was elected to his present position. During fourteen years of his service as clerk the captain was by virtue of office also county treasurer. No word of comment is needed here concerning Capt. Smith's ability or his popularity, when both have been so frequently passed upon by friends and neighbors. He is a man of the people and of great public spirit. He was one of the original stockholders of the Macon & Dublin railroad, now Macon, Dublin & Savannah railroad, was for several years its treasurer, and is now secretary of the board of directors. The nuptials of Capt. Smith were celebrated Nov. 21, 1867, Ella Few, daughter of Dr. Tillman and Phoebe (Charlton) Douglas, of Burke county, becoming his wife. A large family of sons and daughters have been born to this union, who are taking their places in the world creditable and respected citizens. The following are those living: Claudie E., Mrs. W. C. Bishop, Arthur Peyton, Annie D., Selaid, Nina Charlton, Hardy, Jr., Tillman Douglas, Gussie Lester and Helen Few. Capt. Smith is, of course, a stanch democrat, and is a prominent member of the Methodist church.

JOHAN B. WOLFE was born in Dublin, Ga., Oct. 7, 1838, and is the son of C. B. and Rebecca Wolfe, both of whom were natives of North Carolina. The mother having died when he was only a few weeks old, he was left to the care of relatives. His boyhood days were passed on a plantation, where he received a common school education. His higher education was received at the university of Georgia and university of South Carolina. At the opening of the war he enlisted as a private in the Fifty-seventh Georgia, Company I, but was made second lieutenant early in the service, and served in that capacity until the close of the war. He was at Baker's creek, surrender of Vicksburg, and that fiercest of all battles of the war, Jonesboro. In 1864 he was elected justice of the inferior court; he returned home and served in that position till the law was passed abolishing the court. He also practiced law for some time, having been admitted to the bar prior to the war. From 1870 till 1876 he held the office of ordinary of the county, at the same time being engaged in farming and merchandising. In 1882 the people of the county showed their appreciation of good service rendered and elected Mr. Wolfe to the legislature, where he served them one term. Married to Mary L., daughter of Dr. Lillman Douglas, of Wilkes county, he became the father of the following children: Mrs. Dr. Walton, Mrs. George Wright, J. A. Wolfe, farmer, Mary, Eva G., Arthur M. and Thomas Lawson, at home. Although Mr. Wolfe is practically retired from business, he holds the office of justice of the peace. Mr. Wolfe is a master Mason, a Baptist in faith and in politics a good democrat.

LEE COUNTY.

J. P. CALLOWAY, merchant, Leesburg, Lee Co., is a son of C. B. and Anna V. (Jones) Calloway. Mr. Calloway was born Nov. 2, 1851, and attended the common schools, after which he was graduated at Mercer university, Macon, Ga. In 1881 he established the business he at present conducts. From a modest beginning he has developed it into the largest enterprise in Leesburg. Mr. Calloway is also a large planter and fruit grower, and owns a magnificent orchard, besides 4,000 acres of highly cultivated land, and a large stock farm. Mr. Calloway was united in marriage April 30, 1895, to Miss Mamie, daughter of D. T. Sawyer. Mr. Calloway is a member of the Baptist church, and Mrs. Calloway is a member of the Methodist church; and both are very popular in social circles.

PHIL COOK, JR., Leesburg, Lee Co., Ga., is the only living son of the late Gen. Phil Cook, secretary of state, a full biography of whom appears elsewhere in these Memoirs. He was born in Macon, Bibb Co., Ga., Dec. 25, 1859. The first seven years of his school life were spent under the efficient tutelage of ex-Gov. W. J. Northen. Entering the state university in 1874, he continued there two years, and then went to Georgetown college, District of Columbia, where he graduated in the classical course in 1878. Entering the office of Judge Sam Lumpkin at Lexington, Ga., as a student, he was admitted to the bar in the following year, and for two years took up the duties of the legal profession. In 1881 he left the forum and became a "knight of the grip," traveling for the York Manufacturing company of York, Pa., iron and steel goods. His sales for this firm were of such satisfactory nature that they kept him in their employ for seven years. Finding a change of occupation to his best interest, he came to Lee county and began the cultivation of his father's plantation, and is now a full-fledged agriculturist. In 1879 he was wedded to Miss Minnie Lee Shackleford, daughter of C. W. Shackleford of Charleston, S. C. They have become the parents of an interesting family of children, as follows: Sallie G., Philip, Jr., Charles A. and Arthur. Mr. Cook is a worthy son of a man whom all Georgians loved and revered.

JOHN TYLER FERGUSON, a progressive planter and representative of Lee county, Ga., postoffice Ferguson, is of Scotch extraction, and was born in Chester district, S. C., July 5, 1844. His great-grandfather was the original Scotchman, settling in North Carolina, where he reared a large family of sons and daughters. William G., one of the sons, was born in 1811, and died in 1866. He was a farmer and served quite a period as government Indian agent in Florida, where he moved in 1846, and where he died. John T. Ferguson, his son, was given such education as he could secure after crops were laid by and by walking some six miles each day, but it was limited. Being of stout frame, he was mustered into the army in 1862, in the Sixth Florida volunteers, and served till the siege of Atlanta, in 1864, during which he was captured by the enemy out on what is now Peachtree street. He was carried to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he remained until March, 1865, at which time he received his exchange and returned home. After the war he settled in Jackson county, Fla., where he farmed until 1872, thence to his present location in northeastern Lee county, where he has bought an 1,800-acre plantation, and where he still resides, engaged in farming.

and merchandising. He was married Feb. 19, 1868, to Miss Mary E., daughter of Mountville Ray of Alabama, who died in 1882, leaving four children: George Robert, born Jan. 8, 1869; John Q., born Oct. 10, 1872; Minnie B., born Feb. 1, 1876, and Edward Stanley, born May 1, 1880. Mr. Ferguson subsequently married Miss Sallie, daughter of Jacob Cobb, of Sumter county, Ga., who is the mother of the following children: Mary Helen, born Aug. 15, 1884, and Frank William, born April 11, 1891. While Mr. Ferguson is not a politician in the sense generally meant by that term, he has always evinced a deep interest in good government, and has given his voice and influence to securing good men for public office. The democratic party has found in him a strong supporter, and when, in 1892, a man was needed who could command the confidence of the country voter and hold him in the ranks of the party, Mr. Ferguson was given the honor, was triumphantly elected and served in the two following sessions with such satisfaction as to make him the logical candidate in 1894, when he was re-elected by a good majority. Mr. Ferguson is a free and accepted Mason of lodge No. 361, in which he has held various offices.

WILLIAM E. GILL, planter, Leesburg, Lee Co., Ga., is one of the oldest residents of his section, having farmed continuously in the county since 1846. He is, of course, an authority on everything pertaining to planting in southwest Georgia, the success which he has always had on his own plantation making his opinion doubly valuable. Mr. Gill is a native of Monroe county, Ala., born shortly before the state was admitted to the union, Jan. 30, 1819. The name of Gill is of Scotch-Irish origin. His grandfather, Days Gill, was a soldier in the revolutionary war, where he fought under Col. John Clark, and in the same company with the grandfather of Gen. C. A. Evans. Mr. Gill's father, Robert G., was a farmer by occupation, and died in May, 1840, in Baldwin county, Ga. William E. Gill acquired but a limited education, as he spent all of the earlier part of his life on the frontier, among the Indians. In January, 1846, he moved to Lee county, and settled near the old town of Stockville, at that time the county seat. He has always followed farming and has succeeded well. When the tocsin of war sounded in 1861 Mr. Gill enlisted as lieutenant of Company B, Eleventh Georgia regiment, but was discharged for disability a year later. He was not again in the regular army, but served for a period as captain of Company B, Fifth Georgia state troops. He has been thrice married. June 3, 1838, Harriet, daughter of Moses Morgan, became his wife. After her death, Jan. 12, 1854, he married her sister, Nancy, who died in 1871. The following year he was united to Mrs. Eliza Chillan Kersey, who still survives. Of the children born, ten are living, and all are married except one, Josephine, who is still at home. Mr. Gill is active in his interest in public life. He held the office of justice of the peace for thirteen years, and was sheriff of the county from 1858 to 1871. He has twice been elected to the legislature of his state—to the lower house in 1871, and to the state senate from the Tenth district in 1890. All of his public service has been performed with a characteristic energy and faithfulness, which has endeared him to the people of Lee county. Mr. Gill is a member of Eureka lodge No. 247, F. & A. M., and has been its worthy master for many years. As a citizen, kind and neighborly, as a public officer, obliging but firm and faithful to every trust, and as a friend, true and lasting, Mr. Gill wears his years with dignity and with honor.

CAPT. FRANCIS M. HEATH, planter, Leesburg, Lee Co., Ga. No county in southwest Georgia bears a better reputation for the fertility of its soil than Lee, and no planter among the masters in that much misunderstood art found within her bounds has a better plantation, or is more wide-awake, than the gentleman mentioned above. Capt. Heath comes honestly by his aptness in farming, his father before him, Lunaford Heath, having been one of the best planters in Putnam county for many years before the war, and where Francis M. was born in November, 1832. The boy's educational facilities were not of the best, but he managed by close application to acquire the rudiments of what is known as an English education. He made his home in Macon most of the time until 1881, since which time he has lived where he now resides. During the war Capt. Heath did his duty faithfully as a private in the Second Georgia regiment, and went through the war without a scratch until the third day before Lee's surrender, when he was unfortunate enough to lose his left arm. Returning to Macon he was, in 1866, elected tax collector of Bibb county, which responsible office he administered for the following eight years. He then engaged in the livery business, and in 1881, as before stated, removed to Leesburg. Capt. Heath fought manfully for his bachelor existence until well past the meridian, when, Jan. 1, 1884, he succumbed to the charms of womanhood, and made Mrs. Mary B. Yeaman (nee Jackson), his wife, who has presented him with four bright children: Minnie Cleveland, born Oct. 25, 1884; William B., Oct. 1, 1889; Robert Lunaford, Nov. 22, 1891, and Mary Mabel, Nov. 5, 1893. Capt. Heath takes a lively interest in politics, being chairman of the democratic executive committee of Lee county. He is an effective organizer and worker, and his efforts have been rewarded by continued democratic supremacy in his county during these troublous pouplistic times. As president of the county board of education, he wields a powerful influence for good over the educational institutions of the county. He is a popular and respected citizen and receives the just regard of a large circle of friends.

STEPHEN THOMAS JORDAN, planter, Leesburg, Lee Co., Ga., was born Dec. 27, 1841, in Washington county, Ga. His father, Cornelius Jordan, was a native of Washington county, a farmer by occupation, and died in 1870, sixty-five years of age. The early Jordans were from England, and are said to have emigrated to this country with the famous John Smith of the Jamestown colony. At the opening of the war Stephen Jordan enlisted in the First Georgia regiment, and served until the first enlistment expired, when he became a member of Evan P. Howell's battery of artillery. In February, 1863, he was transferred to the Washington rifles, Twelfth Georgia battalion. He saw active service during the whole four years of the war, and was wounded once, slightly, at the battle of Winchester. When the war closed he remained in Washington county, Ga., and attended school for a period, his earlier opportunities for acquiring an education having been rather limited. In 1869 he purchased a farm in Butler county, Ala., and removed to that place, where he farmed for four years. Returning to Georgia he took charge of two plantations for Col. Lee Jordan, in Lee county, for whom he worked for one year, in 1874. He then took charge of J. R. Price's Live Oak place, for whom he worked three years—1875-76-77. He then purchased a farm in Randolph county and lived there four years, and then purchased a farm in Terrell county, where he lived until 1892. He then bought a plantation of 2,100 acres in Lee county, where he has since resided. He was married April 28, 1869, to Miss Martha L., daughter of Dr. M. Goode, of Stewart county, Ga. He became the father of three children, all now deceased. The eldest son, Goode, was born Nov. 19, 1870, and lived to be a fine manly boy of fifteen years, dying Oct. 26, 1885; Thomas W., born Sept. 7, 1872, died Nov. 2, 1874; Eliza May, or Lila, as the fond parents were wont to call her, was born Sept. 21, 1877. She was a precocious child of most lovable disposition, and was making rapid progress as a junior at Andrew college. While at home for the vacation of 1893 she sickened, and though the most eminent physicians were in attendance, the dread reaper won the victory, and the opening bud was closed, Nov. 15, 1893. Mr. Jordan is a respected and progressive planter, and has been a Mason since he was of legal age, affiliating now with P. T. Sligh lodge, at Leesburg.

WILLIAM DAVID WELLS, Smithville, Lee Co., Ga., is the oldest railroad agent on the Central system, having held his present position continuously since 1868. He is the son of William Wells, who moved to Lee from Macon county in 1856, where he continued to reside until his death. Mr. Wells was a prominent farmer and miller, and during his lifetime accumulated a valuable property, which passed to his son, William David. The latter was born Dec. 24, 1848, given a good English education, and began merchandising in 1866 at Smithville. After two years he was appointed railroad agent, and has remained in that position to the present time. Besides his duties as agent he operates a large grist-mill left by his father. He is a business man of wide knowledge and keen foresight, and holds the confidence of his fellow-citizens in a flattering degree. He has always taken a decided interest in public affairs and has been frequently honored by his party with responsible positions. He served two years on the board of county commissioners, and in 1885-86 was treasurer of the county. He represented his county in the general assembly as a democrat during the sessions of 1889-90, and as a member of the committees on finance, penitentiary and asylums distinguished himself for faithful service. He is a blue lodge Mason and has been treasurer of his local organization for ten years. The married life of Mr. Wells began in 1868. Mrs. Wells was Miss Ella C. McAfee, of Smithville, a daughter of W. M. McAfee. Only two children have come to this union—Stella, born in 1870, married J. D. Burton, a merchant of Smithville, and Maggie, born in 1872, Mrs. C. B. McManus, her husband being an engineer on the Central railroad.

LIBERTY COUNTY.

R. W. HAMMOND, merchant-planter, Josselyn, Liberty Co., Ga., son of William H. and Julia (Allen) Hammond, was born in Horry district, S. C., in 1846. His father, of Scotch descent, was a native of Cincinnati, Ohio, was a sea captain and followed the sea until his death by drowning near the mouth of Cape Fear river in 1846. His mother, now Mrs. W. D. Hucks, is yet living, aged sixty-seven, on the old homestead. Mr. Hammond remained at home and attended school until 1862, when he enlisted in Company B, Seventh regiment, South Carolina cavalry, and served in all the engagements, important and minor, until the battle of Gettysburg, where he was severely wounded, and as soon as he was able he returned home. He commenced life after the war with nothing, but by close attention and enterprise, and exceptionally good management, he has accumulated quite a fortune. He remained in South Carolina until 1882, during which time he was county commissioner two terms, and postmaster at Hammond four years. In 1882 he came to Josselyn and bought a small stock of general merchandise, and has been postmaster at the place since 1884. In connection with the store he is conducting a large rice plantation and five turpentine stills—owning altogether 1,600 acres of land. He has been phenomenally successful in all his undertakings, is wide awake to business, intelligently enterprising, of superior managing ability, and is highly esteemed by his fellow citizens. Mr. Hammond was married in 1879 to Miss Nora, daughter of John and Mulsey (Holden) Hughes, natives of Brunswick county, N. C. Of the eight children born to them six are living: William G., John T., Nettie, Richard T., James W. and Ora. He is a Knight of Pythias and has represented his local organization in the grand lodge, and is a master Mason. Himself and wife are influential members of the Missionary Baptist church.

HENDLEY FOXWORTH HORNE, farmer, Johnston Station, Liberty Co., Ga., son of Richard and Mary Horne, was born in Beaufort district, S. C., Jan. 19, 1814. His paternal grandfather and his father followed farming all their lives, and both served in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, his grandfather losing his life in the service. In 1817 Mr. Horne's father moved to Georgia and settled in Liberty county, where he died a consistent member of the Baptist church. Mr. Horne was the youngest of three children born to his father by his second and last marriage, and was only about three years old when his father moved to Georgia. He was reared on the farm and received a fairly good education at the common schools of the county. The day he was twenty-one years of age he settled where he now lives and began home-life in a small one-room log house which is still standing and lovingly cared for. Starting out poor, but determined to better his worldly condition, he had succeeded to his own satisfaction, and besides land, had twenty slaves when the civil war began. The Federal government owed him $200 for mail service performed, which, of course, he lost. When the war closed all he had was his land and some live stock, and with these as his capital, supplemented by good health and resolute will, he commenced life anew. He has by his industry and good management acquired about 8,000 acres of land, on which he has a fine, well-improved plantation and near him four houses on his property. He has resided where he now lives more than sixty years, and at the ripe old age of eighty-one is hale, hearty and cheery. He has never sworn an oath and has always been temperate in his habits. When a young man he was justice of the peace many years, and during the war he served as justice of the inferior court. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1865, and in 1877 was elected to represent Liberty county in the general assembly. Mr. Horne is an intelligent and genial gentleman of the old school, entertaining hospitably, has hosts of friends, and while enjoying their society and the comforts secured by honest labor and good management feels prepared for and is composedly awaiting the final summons. Mr. Horne was married Oct. 2, 1832, to Miss Susan, daughter of William H. Parker, of Liberty county, who, after bearing six children, died. He then married Miss Sarah, daughter of James Smiley, of Liberty county, who died leaving two children. He contracted a third marriage with Miss Sarah, daughter of Nathaniel Lang, of Tattnall county. Eight of the children born to him—five sons and three daughters—are married, and all living in Liberty county, except one daughter who is living in Bulloch county. He has a number of grandchildren over thirty years old, and more than forty great-grandchildren. He has been a member of the Baptist church since 1834, and his wife and children are members of the same church. Though farming has been his principal pursuit, he was for a time engaged also in the timber business.

JOSEPH WILLIAM HUGHES, farmer, Johnston Station, Liberty Co., was born Aug. 19, 1848, near the place on which he now resides, and is the son of William and Sarah Elmira Hughes. His father was a planter and a prominent and influential citizen of Liberty county. He was an organizer and captain of the famous Liberty guards, and when the civil war broke out led this company to the battlefield. The company was in the campaign on the Georgia, Florida and South Carolina coasts and was in Gen. Wheeler's cavalry. Capt. Hughes served gallantly at Lookout Mountain and was at Atlanta, Jonesboro and Lovejoy station. His horse was shot from under him at Noonday church, and while crossing a bridge, in the retreat from Atlanta, near Columbia, S. C., was badly burned. He was captain of the guards after their organization, subsequent to the war, up to the time of his death. When the capital was at Milledgeville Mr. Hughes represented Liberty county in the general assembly three terms. He was surveyor of his county for several years, was a master Mason of high degree, and a member of the Methodist church. He died in 1887 in his sixty-seventh year. Mr. Hughes was a man of great worth, and was loved and respected by all who enjoyed his acquaintance. His wife is still living and is sixty-nine years old. To them were born the following children: Joseph W., Thomas D., Elizabeth L., John P., George J. (deceased), Westley Turner, Laura C., Leola A., Lee J. Joseph W. Hughes, the oldest son, was educated in the common schools of Liberty county. On account of the conditions existing in the south after the war he was obliged to leave school at an early age and help, by work in the fields, his father in the support of the family. Thus he was engaged until he was twenty-two years old, when he began farming for himself. Later he became interested in the manufacture of naval stores and in saw-milling, and by giving close attention to his business and exercising a wise discretion he has prospered and extended these interests to a wide limit. In December, 1872, he married Amanda E., daughter of Judge Hampton C. Parker. There were born to them eight children, all living: Lela May, wife of Prof. James A. Hodnett; Alice E., William A., Joseph M., T. A., David, Parker and Fannie H. The last two are twins. Mr. Hughes was married the second time, in 1889, his wife being Missouri K., daughter of Mr. Folsom. They have had three children: Alera H., Ella Lee, deceased, and William S. Mr. Hughes has been a member of the Methodist church since he was seventeen years old and his family belong to the same denomination. Mr. Hughes has been a captain of the Liberty guards, a local military organization, for five years. He has been a member for fourteen years. Though a stanch democrat, Mr. Hughes has never been an aspirant for political honors, preferring to give his time to his business and family. He is a popular citizen and a successful man in business affairs.

FREDERICK RANSOM LYONS, retired merchant and farmer, Johnston Station, Liberty Co., Ga., was born Feb. 25, 1825, the son of Frederick and Martha (Stebbins) Lyons. His parents were natives of Massachusetts, in which state he was born, and were of rugged old New England stock, the father living to the age of eighty-three, and the mother to be seventy-three years old. They were faithful members of the Baptist church, and reared a family of eleven children. Frederick, the second child born, came to Georgia in 1840, when seventeen years old. He had an uncle, Charles Stebbins, who owned a stage line from Darien to Hawkinsville, and during the first three years of his southern residence he was engaged as a driver of a stage coach. He first invested in a little store at Bell's landing, on the Altamaha river in Tattnall county, and for a few years enjoyed a good trade with the citizens of Appling county. In 1847 he moved to Riceboro, Liberty Co., and engaged in business with his uncle. This was continued with success until a few years before the war, when Mr. Lyons bought his partner out. Just prior to the war Mr. Lyons purchased a big plantation near Riceboro, and during the struggle he was postmaster of the place. After peace was concluded he resumed the mercantile business, which had been languishing, and took in his brother-in-law as a partner. His health commenced to fail and he was obliged to place his son in charge of his interests, and in 1882 he moved to Walthourville, and later moved to where he now resides, since which time his health has been fully restored. Mr. Lyons married Miss Sarah Todd, of McIntosh county, in 1848, and to them were born two children: F. S., a son, and Sarah I., deceased. Mr. Lyons has three grandchildren of his deceased daughter's and four of his son's. He is a member of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Lyons is a high type of the self-made man. As a Yankee lad he came to a strange land and hewed out of life's forest success and fortune. This was done, too, honestly, and with due respect and consideration for his neighbor. By his scrupulous honesty he established a large credit and won the regard and esteem of all who knew him. In the face of discouragements he prospered, his energy, industry and frugality overcoming all obstacles. Mr. Lyons has retired from active business and rents his farm. He has always been a democrat, as was his father before him, and when the civil war broke out he cast his fortunes with the south, his adopted home.

LINCOLN COUNTY.

T. H. REMSON, county ordinary, Lincolnton, Lincoln Co., Ga., son of Rem and Elizabeth A. (Murrah) Remson, was born in Lincoln county in 1838. His paternal grandparents, Rem and Elizabeth (Golden) Remson, were natives of Virginia, who early in life migrated to Georgia and settled in Lincolnton. He was of German descent, was a farmer and became possessed of much real estate and other property; was a justice of the inferior court many years, and represented the county in the general assembly. Mr. Remson's father was born in Lincoln county and became a successful farmer and large land owner. He finally went to Mississippi, where he died. His mother was a daughter of Thomas J. and Elizabeth (Walton) Murrah. Mr. Murrah was of Scotch lineage, a farmer and large land and property holder, and served the county as a justice of the inferior court. Mr. Remson was reared on the farm and received such education as the "old-field" schools afforded. Before Georgia seceded he enlisted in a South Carolina company, but afterward joined Company G, Capt. Lamar, Fifteenth Georgia regiment. He participated in very many important engagements, among them Yorktown, Second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Wilderness, Chickamauga, etc., and continued in the service until the close of the war, surrendering with the army at Appomattox. During his service in the army he was wounded twice, first in the battle of the Wilderness and then at Chickamauga. Mr. Remson began life as a farmer, and after the war had nothing excepting some land. To what he had then he has added by subsequent purchase until now he has about 1,500 acres, besides a considerable quantity of town property. In 1884 he was elected ordinary of the county, an office to which he has been continuously re-elected since and now fills. This fact probably demonstrates as strongly as anything can his popularity with the people and their confidence in his practical judgment, official efficiency and personal integrity. Mr. Remson was married in 1871 to Miss S. V., born in Dalton, Ga., in 1854, daughter of W. M. Bell, a prominent railroad man. Four of the children born to him by this marriage are now living: Lillian M., Thomas H., Rem, and N. P. The mother of these died in 1884, and about two years afterward he married Miss Rebecca, born in Lincoln county in 1852, daughter of William and Catharine (Parks) Tatum. Mr. Tatum was a native of Lincoln county, a prominent farmer and citizen, who served the county as a justice of the inferior court and as its representative in the general assembly. This wife, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died in 1887, leaving one child, Henry F., now living. In 1889 Mr. Remson contracted a third marriage with Miss M. J., born in Augusta, Ga., in 1852, daughter of John and Bersheba (Lockhart) Glendenning. He was a native and a prominent business man of Augusta. One of the children, Annie E., the fruit of this marriage, still survives. Mr. Remson is a member of the masonic fraternity, and his wife is a devoted member of the Baptist church.

G. S. SIMS, farmer, Leverett, Lincoln Co., Ga., son of William and Elizabeth (Frazier) Sims, was born in Lincoln county in 1836. His grandparents on his father's side were John and Rachel (Gullatt) Sims. He was of English descent and a native of South Carolina. When a young man, he came to Georgia and settled in Lincoln county. Mr. Sims' father was born in Lincoln county, was a large and prominent planter and land owner, and a leader of influence in county affairs. He was an active and working member of the Baptist church, and died in 1882. His mother was a daughter of John and Millie (Bond) Frazier. He was born in South Carolina and was an early settler in what is now Lincoln county. He was one of the first representatives of the county in the general assembly, and when he went to Milledgeville rode on horseback. Mr. Sims was reared on the farm and received but little schooling at the old-time "old-field" school. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. Combs, Tenth Georgia regiment, with which he participated in the seven days' fight around Richmond, second Manassas, Chancellorsville and Fredericksburg. At this last-named battle he was wounded and sent to the hospital, where he remained until partially recovered, when he came home. After a week's stay at home, however, he rejoined his command, and was placed on detail duty until 1864, when he was discharged. He came home from the war poor and crippled, and went to work on the farm. He worked hard, and late, and long, and has been abundantly rewarded. He now owns 1,100 acres of good land, and is comfortably enjoying the fruits of his well-directed labor and enterprise—no citizen is more respected. Mr. Sims was married in 1860 to Miss Catharine, born in Lincoln county in 1843, daughter of John W. and Maria (Gilchrist) Parks. He was a large farmer, served in the militia during the late civil war, and died in 1886. Of the children born to them nine are living: Lizzie, George L., William F., John A., L. W., Mildred M., Robert Lee, Lucy, and Albert Sidney Johnson. Mrs. Sims is an active and esteemed member of the Baptist church.

N. W. STEVENSON, farmer, Goshen, Lincoln Co., Ga., son of James and Jane (Seawright) Stevenson, was born in South Carolina in 1834. His paternal grandfather, George Stevenson, was a native of Virginia, migrated to South Carolina and settled in Anderson district, where he lived out his life as a farmer. Mr. Stevenson's father was born in Anderson district, S. C. He was a large farmer and a prominent and active member of the Baptist church. He died in his native state. His mother was a daughter of John Seawright, who was born in Virginia and moved to and settled in South Carolina. Mr. Stevenson grew to manhood on the farm, and received only such education as was obtainable at the time and locality. In 1861 he enlisted in Company G, Capt. Harnesburger, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and participated in the seven days' fight around Richmond, Williamsport, and other prominent engagements of the army of northern Virginia. He had been an overseer before the war, but the war destroyed that occupation; and after the war he went to the plow handles, and so efficiently as to be able to buy his first tract of land in 1870. Satisfied with the business and profits of good farming, he has devoted his time and attention assiduously to that occupation with pecuniary results entirely satisfactory to himself. He is now the possessor of 2,400 acres of land, has a good home and a well-equipped, productive farm. Unambitious of political prominence he has been content with the quiet and pleasurable pursuit of husbandry. Mr. Stevenson was married in 1871 to Miss Hattie, born in Lincoln county in 1846, daughter of Peyton and Elizabeth (Harvey) Norman. He was born in Lincoln county, and was a successful planter and large land owner. Late in life he moved to Habersham county, where he died. Of the children which blessed this union four are living: John, Zula, Unus, and Clifford. Mr. Stevenson is a master Mason, and his wife is a working member of the Baptist church.

JOHN ZELLERS, farmer, Lincoln, Lincoln Co., Ga., son of John and Mary (Hughley) Zellers, was born in Lincoln county, Ga., in 1840. His paternal grandfather, Jacob Zellers, was of German descent, born in Virginia, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. After independence was proclaimed he came to Georgia and settled in what is now Lincoln county, where he accumulated considerable property and attained some prominence. Mr. Zeller's father was born in Lincoln county, was a very successful planter, became rich and took a leading part and active interest in county matters. He was an ardent member, and for many years a deacon of the Baptist church. He died in 1855. His maternal grandparents, Hughley, were natives of Virginia, who, early in life migrated to Georgia. Mr. Zellers was raised on the farm and had the benefit of a fairly good education. He served in the militia a short time during the "unpleasantness." About everything he had except his land was swept away by the ravages of war, so after the surrender he started life almost anew. By dint of hard work, strict economy and good management, he is now the owner of 2,000 acres of good land, with a good farm and substantial improvements on it; and he has the respect and influence due to his business sagacity and moral worth. He served as a justice of the peace six years, also many years as clerk of the superior court, as county treasurer and as president of the board of education. Mr. Zellers was married in 1860 to Miss Mary E.—born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1843—daughter of John and Margaret (Harnesburger) Florence. They were native Virginians, and came to Georgia and settled in Lincoln county early in life. He was a prosperous farmer and an influential citizen. Of the children who blessed this union, six survive: Peter, professor John Gibson institute; Mamie, Albert, Brantley C., Maggie and Aline. Mr. Zellers and his wife are active members of the Baptist church.

J. N. ZELLERS, merchant-farmer, Goshen, Lincoln Co., Ga., son of Jacob L. and Nancy (Florence) Zellers, was born in Lincoln county in 1835. His paternal grandparents—he of German extraction—Jacob and Barbara (Fudge) Zellers, were natives of Fauquier county, whence they migrated to Georgia in 1805, and settled in Lincoln county, where he acquired a quite large estate and raised his family. Mr. Zellers' father was born in Lincoln county, was raised a farmer and continued as such as long as he lived. During the war between the states he served in the Confederate army. His mother was a daughter of Thomas Florence, a well-to-do farmer of Lincoln county, and a very active member of the Baptist church. Mr. Zellers was raised on the farm and received but a meager education at the nearby "old-field" schools. In 1861 he enlisted in Company H, Capt. J. O. Redwine, Thirtieth Georgia regiment, and remained in the service until the surrender. Among others he participated in the following battles: Jackson, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, the campaign to Atlanta and defense of the city, and then Jonesboro, Franklin, Murfreesboro and Nashville, and received his discharge at High Point, N. C. After the war he farmed, exclusively, until 1869, when in addition to farming, he started a general merchandise store at Goshen. His trade has steadily increased, and he has prospered in both his farm and mercantile interests. He has accumulated a quite large property, ranks high socially and financially, and is a solid and reliable citizen. He is an influential member of the county board of education. Mr. Zellers was married in 1876 to Miss Clara E.—born in Wilkes county in 1842—daughter of Edmond W. and Elizabeth (Tatum) Anderson. He was a son of Thomas Anderson, a native of Virginia, was a farmer, and for many years was a justice of the peace. Three of the children born to them are living: Lillie, Daisy and Pearl. Mr. Zellers is a master Mason, and his wife is an esteemed member of the Baptist church.

LOWNDES COUNTY.

CHARLES WILLIAM HICKS, the capable superintendent of the large milling interests of J. S. Betts & Co., at Ashburn, Worth Co., Ga., is a North Carolinian by birth, and was born in New Hanover county, Feb. 13, 1855. He was reared on a plantation, but early evinced a decided penchant for working with machinery. In order to give his spirit full play, he came to Augusta in 1877, and entered the Georgia railroad shops, where for two years he was engaged as a machinist. He then went to Savannah, where he worked in the machine shop of J. J. McDonald for seven years. In 1889 he superintended the building of a saw-mill plant for the Central Georgia Land & Lumber company. His connection with the present firm dates from 1890. Mr. Hicks is a man thoroughly equipped for his business, and is regarded as one of the most efficient mill-men in southern Georgia. Naturally thoughtful and studious, his mind runs somewhat in the inventive channel, though he confines his efforts to thoroughly practical subjects. His chief invention is a water circulating grate and filterer for steam boilers, the second device of the kind ever attempted. He has secured letters patent on it and will soon begin its manufacture. Its evident utility to all mill-men and users of steam boilers is assurance in advance of its successful introduction. Mr. Hicks married a South Carolina lady, Miss Annie W., a daughter of Dr. C. G. Stephens, a prominent physician. Two sons and one daughter have come to brighten their home. Mr. Hicks is a member of the Methodist church, in which he is a power for good. His qualities of head and heart are such as to make him a popular official about the mill, where he holds the confidence of the firm with whom he is engaged.

SANFORD THEODORE KINGSBERRY, lawyer, Valdosta, Lowndes Co., Ga., son of Sanford and Mary Ann (Grow) Kingsberry, was born in Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., Nov. 12, 1837. The American progenitor of this branch of the family, Henry Kingsberry, came to America in 1630 with Gov. Winthrop, settled first in Boston, Mass., where himself and wife united with the present First church, moved thence to Ipswich, Mass., where seven sons were born to them. Joseph (1st), the youngest son, moved to Haverhill, Mass., where two sons, Nathaniel and Joseph, and several daughters were born to him. Joseph (2nd) was born June

22, 1682, was married Feb. 5, 1705, to Ruth Denison, moved to Norwich, Conn., in 1708, and died there Dec. 1, 1757. He was locally and familiarly known as "Deacon Joseph." They had twelve children, the fifth of which, Joseph (3rd), was born in 1714. When grown he went to Pomfret, then to Scotland, Conn., married, and raised six children, the youngest of whom, Sanford (1st) was born in 1733, married Elizabeth Fitch, and moved to Windham, Conn., where six children were born to him. He afterward moved with his family to Claremont, N. H. About the time hostilities began between the colonies and Great Britain, King George III. granted 100,000 acres of land on the island of Cape Breton—just east of Nova Scotia—to 100 citizens of Claremont and vicinity. Mr. Kingsberry being one of the number, was appointed agent to go to the island and survey and divide the land. He laid out the city of Mira, at the head of navigation on Mira river—which the grant included—and then proceeded to survey and subdivide the remainder. About the time he completed the survey, he and his companions were arrested and imprisoned, for the purpose of extorting from them the oath of allegiance to the king of England. All his men took the oath, but he refusing, was kept in prison on bread and water several weeks. Failing to accomplish their purpose, he was released, when he returned to Claremont. The revolution being in progress, he at once volunteered in the Continental army at Norwich, Conn., under Gen. Spencer, who appointed him his aid. He was the author of the muster roll adopted by congress, was appointed muster master for the Connecticut troops, and commissioned major, retaining the rank to the end of the war. He participated in the battles of Bennington, Vt., and Ticonderoga, N. Y. After the war he resided in Claremont until his death in 1829, aged ninety-six years. His third son, Charles (1st), born in 1773, moved to Derby, in the extreme northern part of Vermont, in 1790. His first deed bears date in 1797, and upon this tract was planted the first apple orchard in the township—and it is still yielding fruit. In 1820 he moved to Derby Center, living there till he died in 1843, aged seventy years. He was the first representative from his township to the general assembly, was re-elected three times consecutively and held the office of town treasurer from 1812 to 1833 inclusive. To do right was the governing principle of his life. To him nine children were born. Of these, his third child, Sanford (2nd), whose mother maiden name was Persis Stewart, was born June 24, 1805. He came to Georgia in 1822 and located in McDonough, Henry Co., where he remained about five years, and then went to Carrollton, Carroll Co., and engaged in merchandising. His friendliness of disposition and fair dealing secured the good will and confidence of the Cherokee Indians—who were then numerous there—and he was very successful and accumulated a large property. He was married Sept. 23, 1834, to Miss Mary Ann Grow, of Vermont, by whom he had ten children. He died Dec. 24, 1869, transmitting to his children, untarnished, that rich heritage—a good name—received from his father. Mr. Kingsberry remained with his parents until he attained his majority, with the exception of three years—1849-50-51—when he attended school at Derby, Vt. He completed his education at Carrollton Masonic institute, and in 1858 began reading law under Buchanan & Wright, Newnan, Ga., and was admitted to the bar at the March term of the superior court at Newnan in 1859. Locating at Quitman, Brooks Co., Ga., he remained there until April, 1861, when he enlisted and served as a private in the Piscola volunteers until after the seven days' fight around Richmond, in which he gallantly bore a part. In 1862, just after those battles, he was elected, without his knowledge, second lieutenant of a cavalry company organized at Carrollton, to which command he was transferred, and served in Eastern North Carolina and along Black Water river in southeast

Virginia until the advance of Grant on Petersburg, when his command, the Seventh Confederate cavalry (before independent), was made part of a brigade under command of Brig.-Gen. James Dearing, with which he served until October, 1864, when his regiment was reorganized into the Tenth Georgia cavalry, under Gen. P. M. B. Young. In 1864 he was commissioned captain of Company K of the Seventh Georgia regiment, continuing as such until the surrender, when his command, under Gen. Wade Hampton, was disbanded at Greensboro, N. C. After the war he and his brothers—Joseph and Charles—met at the old homestead near Carrollton to find it almost totally destroyed, and their old father plowing in the field. These three brothers went to work, and living mainly on corn bread and sorghum syrup, made him a good crop; they then left, and each for himself commenced the battle of life anew. The two younger brothers chose a mercantile life and have won for themselves wealth and high commercial standing in Atlanta. Sanford returned to South Georgia, where he and his wife taught school during 1866, after which he resumed the practice of law at Quitman, to which he has since devoted his time and attention. During the reconstruction period he efficiently discharged the duties of secretary of the democratic county committee. In 1874 he became local attorney for the Atlantic & Gulf railway, retaining the position for that corporation and its successor until 1883, when he became assistant general counsel for the Savannah, Florida & Western and the Charleston & Savannah Railway companies, and moved his office to Savannah. In 1892, finding the labor of an exclusively corporation attorney excessive and uncongenial, he located in Valdosta, retaining his position as assistant general counsel for Georgia of the S., F. & W. Railway company, and resumed his general practice. Mr. Kingsberry ranks among the foremost in his profession and with his fellow-citizens, and enjoys a large and influential clientage. Mr. Kingsberry was married March 10, 1861, to Miss Jane Margaret Smith, daughter of Rev. John Brown Smith, formerly an eminent Presbyterian minister of North Carolina, and later in Talbot county, Ga., where he died in 1845. Mrs. Kingsberry is a lineal descendant of "Light Horse Harry" Lee, of revolutionary fame. Three children have blessed this union: James Sanford, now at Richmond, Ga.; Edwin Paschal, reading law under his father, and Helen Ann, at home. Mr. Kingsberry is a democrat, but no politician, a council Mason, and an exemplary and influential member of the Presbyterian church.

RICHARD AUGUSTIN PEEPLES, deceased, ex-judge of the county court, Lowndes county, Ga., was born in Hall county, Ga., in 1829. His father, Henry Peeples, was a farmer and merchant, who late in life removed to Lowndes county, where he died. Mr. Peeples was raised and educated in Hall county, and about the time he reached manhood he moved to Lowndes county. When his father died he assumed the management of his mercantile affairs. In 1860, when the county seat of Lowndes was changed from Troupville to Valdosta Mr. Peeples and several of his friends—W. H. Buggs, A. Converse, Moses Smith and Dr. William Ashley—selected lots and built their residences. The town was located on lands belonging to Capt. J. W. Patterson. Peeples served many years as ordinary of Berrien county, and during this period he read law and was admitted to the bar. He entered upon the practice and continued it until the county court was established, when he was appointed judge and held the office sixteen years. In 1869 he engaged in the insurance business, and in 1872 established a general insurancy agency, which he conducted with great success until he died—being ably assisted during the latter years by his son Richard, whom he had admitted to partnership. He was mayor of Valdosta several terms during his life. Mr.

Peeples was a prominent promotor of the Georgia Southern & Florida railway, and very active and efficient in securing subscriptions, donations and concessions in aid of its construction. Mr. Peeples was twice married—first to Miss Sarah J. Camp, of Jackson county, Ga., by whom he had four children, two sons, one of whom, Henry C., lives in Atlanta, and the other son and the daughters live in Valdosta. The mother of these children died July 3, 1863, and about a year afterward he married Miss Sarah Virginia Dent, of Savannah, who had refuged to Valdosta, and whose father was largely interested in the shipping interests of that city. A brother of hers, Capt. James Dent, was in the Confederate service on board the cruiser "Alabama," and when she was sunk by the "Kearsage" he jumped overboard and escaped capture by swimming to the British vessel, "Greyhound." He died afterward from the exposure and its results. By this second marriage there were born to him two daughters and three sons, all of whom are living in Valdosta. He was a captain in the Confederate service, and was stationed at and near Savannah, continuing in the service until the surrender. He died July 19, 1891. Capt. Peeples was a master Mason and a prominent and influential member of the Baptist church, of which he was an ordained minister.

CCHARLES BUNYAN PEEPLES, building material, Valdosta, Lowndes Co., Ga., son of Richard Augustin and Sarah V. (Dent) Peeples, was born in Milltown, Berrien Co., Ga., Sept. 2, 1854. He was six years old when his father moved to Valdosta, where he received a good common school education. When he was seventeen years old he went to work at bricklaying and worked at that about two years and then engaged in the sewing machine business, which he followed for about six years. He next accepted the agency at Valdosta of the Savannah, Florida & Western railway and retained it four years, when he resigned and embarked in the building material and paint business, in which he has been successful and still continues. He has served the city two years as alderman and has been chairman of the county board of commissioners of roads and revenues. Mr. Peeples was married March 11, 1890, to Miss Lila, daughter of Thomas M. and Maggie (Wisembaker) Keller.

RICHARD A. PEEPLES, general insurance agency, Valdosta, Lowndes Co., Ga., son of Richard Augustin and Sarah Virginia (Dent) Peeples, was born in Valdosta, June 17, 1867. He was educated in the schools in Valdosta, and attended college in Dawson, Terrell Co., Ga., one year. After leaving school he clerked two years in a drug store, and when eighteen years of age his father made him his partner in the general insurance business he had established, under the firm name of R. A. Peeples & Son, and practically placed him in charge of the business. Under his energetic and judicious management it has been largely increased and made very prosperous. He is a member and has been captain of the Valdosta videttes, Company B, Fourth Georgia regiment militia. After holding the captaincy for two years he returned to the ranks, but was recently elected adjutant of the regiment, with the rank of captain, an office he now holds. Capt. Peeples was married March 18, 1890, to Miss Maude Elise, daughter of Thomas C. and Eliza M. (Church) Jenkins. Her father was a large farmer and successful merchant in Madison county, Fla. Capt. and Mrs. Peeples have one child—Russell Alexander.

BENJAMIN RICHARD SAXON, physician and surgeon, Valdosta, Lowndes Co., Ga., son of Dr. Robert Harper and Laura Virginia (Johnson) Saxon, was born in Screven county, Ga., Feb. 20, 1849. His paternal grandfather, Benjamin

H. Saxon, was a native of South Carolina, a lawyer of distinction, and at one time secretary of state of South Carolina. The following pertaining to his life and services is an extract from old official documents: "Benjamin Harper Saxon was born in Laurens district, on May 10, 1772. He was admitted to the practice of law on May 26, 1794, and in the eighteenth year of the independence of the United States. He was made treasurer of the upper division of the state of South Carolina on Feb. 18, 1829, and the forty-third year of independence of the United States. He was made justice of the quorum for the district of Abbeville, April 16, 1831, in the fifty-fifth year of independence. He was elected secretary of state Feb. 18, 1835, in the fifty-ninth year of the independence of the United States. He was elected surveyor-general Feb. 18, 1838, in the sixty-third year of the independence of the United States. He was notary public Feb. 1, 1840, in the seventy-fourth year of independence. He died July 28, 1856, in Screven county, Ga., aged eighty-four years, two months and eighteen days. Dr. Saxon's maternal grandfather, Capt. Richard Johnson, was born in Barnwell district, S. C., was a wealthy planter, and a prominent, influential citizen of a family originally Virginians. Dr. Saxon's father graduated from the South Carolina Medical college, at Charleston, in 1832, came to Georgia and located in Screven county, where he established a fine professional reputation and built up an extensive and remunerative practice. He died in 1852, when the subject of this sketch was only three years old, leaving him the last male representative of the family line. Dr. Saxon's early education was such as was afforded by the common schools of the county. After preparatory reading he attended the Georgia Medical college (medical department university of Georgia), Augusta, Ga., from which he graduated in 1876. He supplemented this by a post-graduate course in the New York polyclinic, from which he graduated in 1892. Dr. Saxon is a man of fine ability, skilled in his profession, and building up an excellent reputation and patronage. Dr. Saxon was married March 30, 1890, to Miss Zulinne, daughter of Dr. William Capers and Virginia (Humphreys) Bowie, of Screven county. Dr. and Mrs. Saxon have had one child—Richard Bowie—born to them, who made his advent March 13, 1892. Dr. Saxon is a royal arch Mason.

JAMES EDWARD OGLETHORPE VARNADOE, merchant, Valdosta, Lowndes Co., Ga., son of Samuel McWhir and Caroline Bradwell (Law) Varnadoe, was born in McIntosh county, Ga., June 24, 1842. His grandfather came from South Carolina to Georgia when a young man, penniless, and settled in Liberty county. When he died in 1864 he owned 100 slaves and several plantations. He was president of the agricultural society of the county; and, although meagerly educated himself, was noted for the interest he took in education and elevation of others around him. He was a prominent member, and one of the deacons of the Midway Congregational church in Liberty county. Mr. Varnadoe's father graduated from the university of Georgia, with the second honor of his class. Early in life he twice represented Liberty county in the general assembly; and in 1856 was the nominee of the American party for congress, and was defeated by James L. Seward of Thomas county. In 1866 he founded the Valdosta institute, which he conducted with exceptional success until his death, in 1870. The school is still in existence; and hundreds of his pupils now on the stage of action revere his name and memory, and refer with pride to his work and worth. He was a man of strong religious convictions and great activity; among the foremost in promoting intellectual and moral advancement, and was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church. He left three sons and two daughters. His wife's father, Rev. Samuel Spry Law, was the son of a wealthy planter, and was born in what is now Liberty county, Ga., in 1774. When forty years of age he was converted, was received into the Baptist church, ordained a minister, and afterward devoted his time and talents gratuitously to the service of the church. Judge Law, the eminent jurist of Savannah, is a member of the same family. Mr. Varnadoe enlisted as a private in 1861 in the Liberty Independent troop, of which six months afterward he was elected corporal. Subsequently the company became a part of the Fifth Georgia cavalry, soon after which he was made sergeant, and held the position until the surrender. Preceding the last year of the war the command was on duty chiefly in Georgia, South Carolina and Florida. It was then ordered to join Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army above Kennesaw mountain, when it was assigned to Kelley's division, Wheeler's corps, and remained with the western army to the close of the war. He was in the battle at Newnan, Ga., during Gen. McCook's raid, and also participated in the battle at Noonday church, and in scores of skirmishes. He took the oath of allegiance at Macon, Ga. He then went to Decatur county, Ga., where he taught school six months, and then returned to Liberty county and engaged in farming. Two years' experience disgusted him with that on account of the disorganized condition of labor, and he went to Brooks county, Ga., and resumed teaching. He taught there a year and then, the latter part of 1867, came to Valdosta, and assisted his father in Valdosta institute, remaining something over a year. He then engaged as a clerk with W. H. Briggs, and was also express agent four years. During this time he filled the office of mayor of Valdosta. When his father died, 1870, the management offered him a large salary as an inducement for him to take charge of the institute. In 1881 he commenced merchandising for himself; but after six months became connected with J. W. Harrell & Son, continuing the partnership until 1887, when he sold out to his partners and went into business by himself. Mr. Varnadoe is now one of the largest and most prosperous and influential merchants in Valdosta—none stands higher commercially or financially. He is president of the board of trade, and in addition to having been mayor, as stated above, has been alderman a dozen years. He is also a member of the board of education. He was once nominated by his party, but declined the nomination, to represent Lowndes county in the general assembly. He was the first captain of the Valdosta videttes, now a part of the Fourth Georgia regiment, of which he is the accomplished and popular colonel. Col. Varnadoe was married May 9, 1864, to Miss Harriet Louisa, daughter of Bartholomew A. and Mary Emeline (Mallard) Busby, formerly a wealthy South Carolina planter owning one hundred slaves and a large landed property. They have three living children: David Comfort, assisting in the store, married and has one child; Sarah Louisa, wife of John Gordon Crawford; and Hallie Lois, now in school. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and an exemplary and influential member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an elder.

JOHN THOMAS WHEELER, merchant, Lake Park, Lowndes Co., Ga., youngest son of Artemus and Mary (Taylor) Wheeler, was born in Leon county, Fla., Aug. 28, 1858. Mr. Wheeler's father was a planter, and at one time owned a large number of slaves. He served as a private in the Confederate army during the late war; was wounded at Gettysburg; was for a short time in a hospital, and was captured once. His maternal grandfather, Dr. Wesley B. Taylor, was a quite prominent physician in Florida until a short time before his death, which occurred in Thomas county, Ga. Mr. Wheeler was reared on the farm, and was educated in the common schools of the county. He followed farming until 1892, when he opened a general merchandise store in Lake Park, Lowndes Co., and has now a well stocked store, and is doing a large business.

Mr. Wheeler was married Feb. 26, 1886, to Miss Nealy Ruskin, daughter of Lee Ruskin, a farmer of much prominence and influence in the community in which he lives. Mr. Wheeler is ranked as one of the staunchest of democrats. His marriage has been blessed by the birth of three children.

LUMPKIN COUNTY.

MARION G. BOYD, lawyer, Dahlonega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of Wier and Sarah J. (Sitton) Boyd, was born in Lumpkin (now Dawson) county, Jan. 9, 1850. His father was born in Gwinnett county, Ga., Sept. 14, 1821. He grew up on the farm, and received such common school education as was afforded by the locality and period. When only sixteen years of age he went as a soldier to the Florida war. In 1850 he moved to Dahlonega, which was ever afterward his home. He studied law and was admitted to the bar. He entered with energy and enthusiasm into the practice of his profession, and soon gained a clientage and a reputation not surpassed in his own and adjoining circuits. He was a man of great ability and rare tact; a hard student and worker, and whatever he undertook to do he did with all his might. He was broad-minded, of liberal views, progressive, and aggressive, and of great force of character. His influence was wide and great, and invariably and unswervingly exercised in behalf of law and order, morality and Christianity. When the war between the states was begun he enlisted in and was commissioned colonel of the Fifty-second Georgia regiment, and served throughout the Tennessee and Kentucky campaigns. With his command he was a gallant participant in the battles of Tazewell, Frankfort, Lexington and Cumberland Gap, and in numerous skirmishes. His health breaking down he was compelled to retire from the service and return home. He represented Lumpkin county two terms, and the Thirty-second senatorial district two terms in the general assembly. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1865, and, also, of that of 1877, meeting the responsibilities, and discharging the duties of these public trusts with the same independence and fidelity manifested in all others. Few men have lived in Lumpkin county who so completely gained and lastingly retained the entire confidence of the people. Col. Boyd was married Feb. 14, 1842, to Miss Sarah J., daughter of Joseph Sitton, of what is now White county, Ga., who bore him seven children: Augustus F., who, as captain of a company at the age of eighteen, was killed at the head of his command at the battle of Baker's Creek; Fannie, deceased wife of Judge A. Rudolph, Hall county; Marion G., the subject of this sketch; Mrs. B. P. Gaillard, Dahlonega, Ga.; Mrs. Emma Witt, Atlanta; Mrs. Ida Stanton, Atlanta, and J. W., professor at Young Harris institute, McTyeire, Towns Co., Ga. He was an active and prominent and exemplary member of the Methodist church, was many times a delegate to the annual conference, and a delegate to the general conference at Nashville. He died suddenly at Dahlonega, Nov. 8, 1893, truly lamented by a large circle of admiring friends. His widow is still living, and makes her home with the subject of this sketch. Mr. Boyd's father moved to Dahlonega soon after his birth, where he received his primary and preparatory education, and afterward entered Emory college at Oxford, Ga., from which he graduated in 1869. He read law under his father, and, after an unusually creditable examination, was admitted to the bar at the August term, 1870, of the superior court of Lumpkin county, Judge David B. Harrell, presiding. He at once located in Dahlonega, where he has lived ever since, and has established a large practice in the northeastern and Blue ridge circuits, and in the supreme court of Georgia. A well-read and sound lawyer and safe counselor, he has secured a well-paying and influential clientage, and no member goes before the court with more carefully prepared cases, or one who conducts them with more vigor and skill. He has been remarkably successful in both civil and criminal cases, and been connected with some of the most important litigation in northeast Georgia. In 1877, when only twenty-seven years of age, he was elected to represent the Thirty-second senatorial district in the general assembly, and was the youngest member of that body. He was placed on the committees on judiciary, penitentiary, education and local and special bills, and the special committee on judicial circuits. He declined further public service until 1894, when, in compliance with the pressing solicitation of friends he consented to become a candidate to represent the senatorial district in the general assembly, and was elected by a large majority. Mr. Boyd is a royal arch Mason; a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church, and is a delegate from his quarterly conference to the North Georgia annual conference.

WILLIAM R. CRISSON, ex-miner, Dahlonega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of Elijah and Nettie C. (Brown) Crisson, was born on the Tugalo river, Habersham county, in 1818. His father, of German extraction, was born in North Carolina, and died early in the 20's in Texas. His maternal grandfather was Joseph Brown, was of Scotch-German descent, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolution. Soon after his birth his parents moved to what is now Lumpkin county, and settled near where Dahlonega now stands. In 1829, when he was in his twelfth year, about the time gold was discovered, the family moved to the site now occupied by the city, which has since been his home. The settlement was originally known as "Head Quarters." But when the county was laid out in 1832, a contest for the county seat occurred between "Head Quarters" and "Knucklesville," which resulted in favor of the first-named, and the town was laid out, and in January, 1833, it was organized. A patient and interested inquiry into the true etymology of the Indian term by Mr. Crisson convinced him that it means "yellow money," or gold. His mother being left a widow he began work in the mines at an early age, and that has been the principal pursuit of his life. For two years, however, he worked on the first railway built in Georgia, and taught school two years in North Carolina. He returned to Dahlonega and remained, mining until 1852, he left for the gold fields of California, going by way of Nicaragua and landing in San Francisco about the first of the following April. After three years' experience in California mining, he came back to his old home, where he has been content to live since. He was in the service of the state during the war, and actively participated in the battle of Kennesaw Mountain, in the great battle of July 22, 1864, at Atlanta, and in many skirmishes and other engagements in defense of Atlanta during the siege of that city. After the war he re-engaged in mining, and in addition has conducted a farm. He is a real pioneer, lived in the country when the Indians indulged in their "green corn" and "war" dances, and held their councils around campfires; lived through the rough period and sometimes bloody encounters of the miners, and that of development and the establishment of schools and colleges and other institutions consequent upon advancing civilization. He has a vivid recollection of a bloody fight between the miners, which gave the name of "Battle Branch" to a stream in the county, in which several were shot, one dead and many wounded. He also often met the distinguished South Carolina statesman, John C. Calhoun when visiting his extensive mining properties, and enjoyed his acquaintance many years. His reminiscences of pioneer and miner life are interesting and attractive. He is looked upon as one of the landmarks, and enjoys the respect and esteem, almost veneration, of the people. Mr. Crisson was married in 1843 to Miss Arrenia Yarbrough, daughter of Wilson Yarbrough, of Lumpkin county, formerly of North Carolina, and one of the first discoverers of gold in that state. To them three children were born: Mack W.; Nettie Jemima, wife of Andrew J. Maguess; Ebenezer E., Dahlonga. In early life Mr. Crisson was an uncompromising Henry Clay whig, but since the unpleasantness he has acted with the democratic party. For half a century he has been a member of the Baptist church, and for thirty years a deacon of it.

FRANK WAYLAND HALL, miner and merchant. Dahlonga, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of Lyman Caleb and Marinda (Curch) Hall, was born in Jericho, Vt., April 18, 1845. His paternal grandfather, Asher Hall, was born in Vermont, June 25, 1783, and was a well-to-do farmer. He married Miss Hopa Lyman, born Jan. 30, 1791, Oct. 18, 1815, by whom he had ten children: William Harrison, Asher Smith, Mary Ann, Lyman Caleb, George (who died young), Martha Maria, George, second, Laura, Harmon, and Albert Warren. Mr. Hall's father was born in Jericho, Vt., Feb. 21, 1818, and married Marinda Curch Dec. 18, 1840, also born in Jericho, Vt., Jan. 16, 1818, daughter of William and Sallie (Ford) Curch, who bore him one child, Frank Wayland, the subject of this sketch. He died in Jericho, Vt., July 30, 1883, but she is still living, and makes her home with her son in Dahlonga. The father of his grandmother—Hopa (Lyman) Hall—Noah Lyman, was born in Jericho, Vt., Jan. 10, 1758, and married Hopa Bunn, born March 13, 1765. To them eight children were born: Stephen, Caleb, Hopa, Noah J., Harry, Elisha, Eli, and Chloe. His maternal great-grandparents were Abraham and Sarah (Ingalls) Ford. He was born in Connecticut May 16, 1764, and she was born Dec. 18, 1766. They were married Jan. 22, 1788, and to them the following children were born: Alvin, Warren, Milton, Sallie, Allethiah, Harry, Chloe, Sophia, and Amanda. His maternal grandfather, William Curch, was born at Chelsea, Vt., Oct. 31, 1791, and was married to Sallie Ford—born in Pomfret, Conn., Jan. 11, 1796, and died March 31, 1885—March 1, 1815, and to them two children were born, who now reside in Randolph, Vt.; Melvin, and Marinda, Mr. Hall's mother. Her paternal grandfather, Asa Curch, was born at Mansfield, Conn., May 16, 1766. His wife, Juliette, was born at Winchester, N. H., May 26, 1762. They were married Oct. 22, 1789; she died June 30, 1845, and he died Sept. 11, 1847. Mr. Hall grew to manhood and was educated in his native town. In 1868 he came to Dahlonga as a millwright, and as the representative of a Boston, Mass., company to superintend the erection of gold mills and machinery. After completing his work he returned north, but soon afterward was invited to assume the management of the mills. He came to Dahlonga, and from that time until now he has thoroughly identified himself with the interests of Georgia, especially, that part of it where his home is. His best judgment and unflagging energies have been directed to the encouragement of capitalists and investors to come to this section and aid in developing its wonderfully varied and valuable—practically inexhaustible—natural resources, in regard to which his information is extensive, and his enthusiasm intensive and irrespressible. Trained to habits of industry and thrift, and possessing a self-reliant spirit, he was quick to adapt himself to his new surroundings, and, while zealously and faithfully discharging his obligations to those who had entrusted their interests to him, was equally quick to avail himself of some of the many opportunities offered to make profitable investments in his own behalf. His strict business methods and integrity of character have enabled him to conduct the large interests of those he represents very profitably, and, consequently, satisfactorily to them; while they have won for him the very highest financial and social positions. He holds titles to vast tracts of wild lands and mining properties in North Georgia, and conducts the leading general merchandise store in that portion of the state—known as “The Frank W. Hall Merchandise company,” the first establishment of the kind organized and operated under a charter. Fortune has indeed smiled upon his untiring energy, his daring enterprise, and that unflagging persistence which knows no such word as fail—and crowned his efforts with phenomenal success. In 1888, in compliance with the earnest solicitation of appreciative friends, he became a candidate to represent the county in the general assembly, and was elected by a large majority. He at once became prominent and influential for progressive and good legislation, doing efficient service for his immediate constituency and for the general interests of the state. He was made chairman of the committee on mines and mining, and placed on the committees on education, appropriation, enrolled bills, and auditing; and served as chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill for establishing the state geological survey—in formulating which his services were invaluable. He had control in the house of the bill providing for the sale of the Okefenokee swamp lands, which brought into the state treasury more than $100,000. In 1888 he was elected mayor of the city and served one term. As might be expected, Mr. Hall takes a deep interest in all educational movements, particularly such as promise the elevation and advancement of North Georgia. For many years he has been a member of the board of trustees of the North Georgia Agricultural college, at Dahlonega, is now its treasurer, and is enthusiastically devoted to its interests and welfare. Mr. Hall was married in 1867 to Miss Eleanor Agnes, daughter of Jonas and Eunice Wheeler, Essex, N. Y. They have no children. He is a member of Webster lodge, F. A. & A. M., Winooski, Vt., and Mount Zion royal arch chapter, No. 16, Atlanta, Ga.

NICHOLAS F. HOWARD, physician and surgeon, Dahlonega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of John and Sallie (Fain) Howard, was born in Buncombe county, N. C., Nov. 24, 1821. His paternal grandfather, Philip Howard, was born in Baltimore, Md., where he grew to manhood, and subsequently migrated to North Carolina and settled in Surry county. Dr. Howard's father was born in Surry county, N. C., in 1781. He married Miss Sallie, daughter of Ebenezer Fain, of Buncombe county, by whom he had nine children: Mary M., widow of George McClure, North Carolina; William B., deceased; Samuel P. C., California; Nicholas F., the subject of this sketch; Lafayette and Pulaski, both in North Carolina; John H., Missouri; Sarah Elizabeth, wife of Robert Roane, Illinois; Susan R., Macon county, N. C., widow of Hannibal Norton, who died while a prisoner during the war, at Johnson's island. His father died in Macon county, N. C., in 1857, and his mother in 1878, aged eighty-two years. Dr. Howard's parents moved the year after his birth from Buncombe to Macon county, N. C., where he was raised to maturity, and received an education as good as was obtainable in the then pioneer condition of the country. He, however, availed himself of every opportunity to add to his education, and increase his stock of knowledge. In 1848 he moved to Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., and began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. William J. Rusk, an eminent physician, and the following year attended lectures at the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, from which he graduated in the spring of 1851. Without loss of time he located in Dahlonega, which for more than forty years has principally been his home—there having been two intervals of interruption, one, a trip to California, and the other

during the war. He received encouraging patronage at once, and success was assured. In 1852 he went to California, and, while engaged in mining, practiced his profession. On his trip he was the only physician among the passengers, and was placed in charge of the sick. Late in the spring of 1854 he returned home and resumed his practice, and continued it until 1862, when he was appointed surgeon of the Fifty-second Georgia regiment, and served to the end of the conflict, for many months prior to which he was transferred to hospital service at Madison, and at Augusta, Ga., where he was at the time of the surrender. He saw much active and very arduous service; was at Vicksburg during the siege, at the battle of Champion hill, was on duty as field surgeon at Cumberland gap and Missionary ridge, and in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaigns. In 1865 he was elected to represent Lumpkin county in the general assembly, and faithfully and fearlessly performed his duty—a difficult task in the then troubled and uncertain condition of political affairs. He was placed on several important committees, and worked zealously and earnestly for such legislation as he believed would restore prosperity to the state. In 1885 he was appointed postmaster at Dahlongega, and held the office during President Cleveland's administration, conducting its affairs with his usual business-like promptitude and accuracy. In 1892 he was complimented by the citizens of Dahlongega by election to the mayoralty. While doing a general practice, he has given particular attention to, and been very successful in, the treatment of affections of the lungs and types of fever peculiar to the section. His practice has extended over Lumpkin and adjoining counties, and he enjoys an enviable reputation with those who know him best. Few citizens so fully and so universally have bestowed upon them the esteem, and so unreservedly enjoy the confidence of his fellow-citizens—all deserved. He speaks of his army service as having been of inestimable value to him in his after-practice. He has been the active and zealous promoter and worker in behalf of every movement calculated to improve public and private morals. Hence, he is a staunch and uncompromising temperance advocate and exemplar, and does all in his power to advance the temperance cause and Christian work. He was one of the original incorporators of the North Georgia Agricultural college, and is vice-president of the board of trustees. Dr. Howard was happily married June 12, 1854, to Miss Almeda A., daughter of Alexander and Milley (Dickin) Awtry, by whom he has had two children: John Alexander and Florence. John Alexander was educated at the North Georgia Agricultural college and served eight years as assistant postmaster at Dahlongega, during the administration of Presidents Cleveland and Harrison, and is at present in the employ of the government. Dr. Howard's wife died in 1884. The doctor was made a master Mason in 1850, was worshipful master of the lodge for many years, and was present in the Grand lodge when it was decided to build the Masonic Temple in Macon. For more than fifty years he has been an exemplary, working and faithful member of the Methodist church, south, of which he is an ordained local minister. In him Dahlongega has a citizen of rare usefulness.

WILLIAM STANLEY HUFF, lawyer, Dahlongega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of John and Louisa (Harris) Huff, was born in Dahlongega, Jan. 13, 1869. His paternal grandfather, Henry Huff, was born in Anderson district, S. C., early in this century, and married Miss Martha Rives, of Virginia, who bore him seven children: William, in Pentz, Cal.; John, Dahlongega; Thomas, who died in 1849 while on the way to California; Andrew Jackson, who went to China after the late war; Eliza, Mrs. Davis, Lumpkin county; Susan, Mrs. Satterfield, Ball Ground, Cherokee Co., Ga.; Elijah M., Tennessee. Mr. Huff's father was born in Hall county, Ga., March 22, 1832, and was married Dec. 29, 1854, to Miss

Louisa, daughter of John Harris, of Lumpkin county, and a niece of Gen. Harrison W. Riley, who represented the county in both branches of the general assembly for many years, and who, in his day, exercised a potential influence in the gold region. Early in life Mr. Huff's father went to California, where he remained a number of years engaged in mining, an industry to which he has devoted nearly all his life. For eighteen years he has been superintendent of the Hand and Barlow Mining company at Dahlonega, and is recognized as a man of superior business judgment and capacity; and is highly esteemed as a citizen. During the late "unpleasantness" he served as a lieutenant on Gov. Brown's staff, and for many years was a justice of the inferior court of the county. The maternal grandfather of the subject of this sketch, John Harris, was born in Tennessee, and came to what is now Lumpkin county about 1830. He was a soldier during the war with Mexico, and died at New Orleans while on his way home. Of the children born to Mr. Huff's parents the following survive: Henry Harrison, Alfred Holt, William Stanley, the subject of this sketch; James Burnsides, Martha Elizabeth, Frank Augustus, Susan Lamentina and Mary Josephine. Those deceased are Alphonso, Florence, Francis, Howard and John Calhoun. Mr. Huff was reared in Dahlonega, and received his primary and preparatory education at the excellent schools in the town. In 1888 he entered the North Georgia Agricultural college, where he completed his literary studies and graduated in 1890. He immediately began the study of law under the able preceptorship of Hon. William P. Price, one of the most eminent lawyers in the circuit, widely-known and highly esteemed, professionally and as a citizen, by everybody. Having passed an exceptionally rigid examination on all branches of the profession with great credit he was admitted to the bar at the October term, 1891, of the superior court of Lumpkin county, Judge C. J. Wellborn, presiding. Entering upon the practice at once in his native place, he has already laid the foundation for a large and influential and remunerative clientage in the northeastern circuit. Few young men in his profession have started under more favorable auspices, and in so short a time achieved such success. His studiousness and his industry, his superior natural endowments and professional attainments, for one so young, give promise of distinction at the bar and in the political arena. Mr. Huff was married April 5, 1893, to Miss India M., daughter of Joseph A. and Louisa Garner, of Hall county, Ga., who has borne him one child, John Garner, born Dec. 29, 1893. He is a master Mason and secretary of the local lodge, and a member of the Methodist church. His wife is an exemplary member of the Baptist church.

ARCHIBALD G. WIMPY, ex-merchant, Dahlonega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of Archibald and Elizabeth (Henly) Wimpy, was born in Pendleton district, S. C., in 1814. His paternal grandfather, William Wimpy, was a native of Ireland, whence he emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, and settled in South Carolina. There, about 1762, Mr. Wimpy's father was born, reared a farmer and married. In 1824 he moved with his family to Georgia, and settled in Franklin county, where three years later his wife died, and in 1838 he died in Hall county. To them nine children were born: Nancy, who married Joseph A. Cooper; Susan, who married John Brownlow; Eliza, who married Willis Prince; Isaac M.; Obed; Larkin C.; Annie, who married James F. Foster; Archibald G., the subject of this sketch, and Thomas H. The maternal great-grandfather of Mr. Wimpy was a native of Germany, and a physician, who, emigrating to America, settled first in Pennsylvania, and later moved to South Carolina. Himself and three sons were soldiers in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Wimpy was about ten years of age when his parents moved to Franklin county, Ga., where he grew to manhood on the farm and received such education as the schools of the locality and period afforded. After teaching school three years he went to Dahlonega, where in 1837 he engaged in a general merchandise business, continued it fifty-two years and accumulated a quite valuable estate. In 1839 he was appointed postmaster, and held the office until 1849, when he resigned. Many public offices have been tendered him, but he has invariably and persistently declined, having no ambition beyond success in his business, and being useful as a private citizen. During the civil war he served with efficiency in the home guard within the boundaries of the state. There is now no actual resident of the town who can claim to be an older inhabitant than he, and his mind is well-stored with incidents and reminiscences of frontier life and the busy mining times of that part of Georgia. He is yet in good health and active for his age, and as buoyant in spirit as when younger. During his life he has come in contact with mining speculators, and with men eminent in scientific and political circles, remembers much about them, and entertains friends pleasantly by recalling occurrences of half a century ago. Mr. Wimpy was married in February, 1841, to Miss Nancy W. Whelchel, daughter of Francis Whelchel, of Hall county. Himself and wife have been active and exemplary members of the Methodist church for nearly half a century, and among the foremost and most useful in all church work. Mr. Wimpy has been superintendent of the Sunday school for forty-two years. Mr. and Mrs. Wimpy have no children of their own, but have reared ten children of relatives and friends.

WILLIAM JASPER WORLEY, ex-editor and farmer, Dahlonega, Lumpkin Co., Ga., son of James H. and Millie (Donelson) Worley, was born in Dahlonega, May 29, 1837. His paternal grandfather, William Worley, of English extraction, was a native of Rockingham county, Va., married a Miss Eaton, and migrated to Georgia and died in Cherokee county, where, also, two of his brothers, Thomas and Pleasant, died. Capt. Worley's father was born in Spartanburg, S. C., Sept. 10, 1807, where he received his education and grew to manhood, and in 1828 came to Georgia and settled in what is now Lumpkin county near where Dahlonega stands. He was the first justice of the peace in Dahlonega, was sheriff of Lumpkin county two terms and clerk of the superior court of the county fourteen years. He served a year as first lieutenant of his company in the Seminole war. His maternal grandfather, William Donelson, was of Scotch descent. Capt. Worley's parents raised six children: Martin V.; William Jasper, the subject of this sketch; Columbus W.; Timothy H.; Roxanna E., and James H. He died April 1, 1869, and his wife, born in Pickens district, S. C., Oct. 14, 1812, died Aug. 29, 1880. Capt. Worley grew to manhood in Dahlonega, where he received an academical education, and then engaged in farming, which he followed until the occurrence of the war between the states, when he enlisted as a private in Company D, First Georgia regiment state line. A month later he was promoted to a lieutenantcy, and soon afterward commissioned as a captain of the company and served through the war. His regiment was assigned to Stovall's brigade, Stewart's division, Johnston's corps, and was first ordered to Savannah. Afterward it was ordered to Chickamauga, and participated in the battles at Dalton, Resaca, Cass Station, New Hope Church and Kennesaw Mountain, and that of July 22, 1864, and the defense of Atlanta during the siege. His regiment then proceeded to Savannah, via Jonesboro, and during a part of the time on the way he commanded the left wing of the regiment. From Savannah his command was ordered to Augusta, where he was granted a thirty days' furlough to visit his sick wife, during which Gens. Lee and Johnston surrendered.

After four years' arduous, faithful service, to which he had given the prime of his manhood, he returned to the peaceful pursuit of agriculture. During his service he had many thrilling experiences. On one occasion when the regiment was waiting in reserve in front of the enemy's trenches, expecting every moment to be ordered into battle, he was sitting on a log when a shell struck the ground in the rear, and passing under the log and coming out in front, upheaved the log and earth and threw him several yards away burying him under a huge mass of earth. He was soon extricated by the soldiers, and about the time he regained his feet Maj. Brown (brother of the late lamented ex-governor) rushed up and asked: "Captain, are you hurt?" "No, I think not," he replied. "Thank the Lord; sit down on this log," said the major. "No thank you," the captain replied, "I prefer standing; I was sitting on that log when that ugly shell came along hunting for me." In the great battle near Atlanta, July 22, 1864, while his command was advancing on the enemy's works, two color-bearers were shot down in succession causing the soldiers to falter, perceiving which Capt. Worley, following the intrepid example of his illustrious namesake, William Jasper, of revolutionary fame, grasped the flag, and, followed by his command, triumphantly planted it on the earthworks of the enemy. One night after a day of hard skirmish fighting, when the company was marching through rain and mud, a voice called out, "Close up, Company D." Col. Galt riding by at the time asked, "Who is in command of Company D?" "Capt. Worley," one of the soldiers replied. "That can't be," said the colonel, "I had Capt. Worley buried this afternoon in the rear of my quarters." "There is something wrong about that," said the captain, advancing, "I am glad to say I am still on duty." The colonel rode up to the captain and threw his arms around him, and the two officers wept like children. After the war Capt. Worley moved to Cherokee county, but two years later returned to Dahlonega, and in 1868 was elected clerk of the superior court, and being successively re-elected, held the office eight years. In 1878 he became senior editor of the Dahlonega "Signal" newspaper, continuing for some years, and during this period read law under the preceptorship of Hon. Wier Boyd, of Dahlonega. In 1881 he was admitted to the bar in Lumpkin superior court, Judge J. B. Estes presiding. Later, he was elected justice of the peace, and held the office eight years, when he was appointed notary public and ex-officio justice of the peace. In 1888 he prospected extensively for gold and other mineral products, and became largely interested in mining properties. In 1889 he purchased the Buford (Gwinnett county) "Gazette," and placing his son, Claude H., then only in his fourteenth year in charge of its local department, conducted it as a mining and agricultural journal. This enterprise was suddenly and sadly terminated by the death of his son by a railway accident Aug. 7, 1891, he having been his main reliance in conducting the paper. This event preyed upon Capt. Worley's mind to such an extent that he sold his interest in the paper and returned to Dahlonega. He is a citizen of high character and excellent standing, as may be inferred by his fellow-citizens electing him continuously to office; and as one would say he deserved to be, when it is stated that he never drank intoxicating liquors and never played cards. Capt. Worley was married at Blairsville, Union Co., Ga., in 1859, to Miss Georgia Victoria, daughter of Thomas Goodram, by whom he has had seven children: Thomas Jefferson, died Aug. 24, 1862; Mildred Caroline, wife of E. S. Copeland, Nelson, Pickens county, Ga.; James Edward, Atlanta, was manager of the Anniston Lime & Coal Co., of Atlanta; (sometime since he left that company and is now bookkeeper for the Blue Ridge Marble company, at Nelson); William F., timekeeper for the Blue Ridge Marble company, at Nelson, Ga.; Lee Anna, teacher, Dahlonega;

Claude Howard, deceased, and Victoria Maude, at home. He is a charter member of the North Georgia Agricultural college, and for seventeen years has been secretary of the board of trustees. He is a royal arch Mason and past high priest, and has been an exemplary member of the Methodist church nearly half a century, his parents being among the members who organized the church in Dahlonega.

MADISON COUNTY.

R. H. BULLOCK, farmer, Danielsville, Madison Co., Ga., was born in Oglethorpe county in 1810, and is now one of the oldest residents of this county. This branch of the family descended from an Englishman and one of the early settlers of Virginia. Nathaniel Bullock, the grandfather of the subject of this memoir, was born in North Carolina, and marrying Mary Hawkins, moved to Georgia during the time of the revolutionary war. A son, Hawkins Bullock, entered in the patriot ranks at the age of sixteen years under Capt. Twitty and in Gen. Greene's command. He was born in North Carolina, and after the war of independence located in Wilkes county, Ga., and subsequently moved to Madison county, where he died. He married Frances R. Gordon, a daughter of Capt. Alexander Gordon. Mr. Gordon was a revolutionary soldier and attained the rank of captain, moved to Wilkes county soon after the war, and later to Oglethorpe county where he died. Mr. R. H. Bullock was a farmer from youth, and in 1836 was married to Mary H. Griffith, daughter of James Griffith, a native and life-long resident of Madison county. Mr. and Mrs. Bullock are members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Bullock has been active in politics during his long life, and has been frequently asked to hold official positions. He was elected clerk of the inferior court, then a member of the court and then served as ordinary for twenty years. He was a member of the legislature when the capital was at Milledgeville for four terms, and for four years represented his district in the state senate at Atlanta. Mr. Bullock is familiarly known as Major, this title being bestowed on him in youth, when he was major in the state militia and fighting Mr. King George's men. He owns a fine farm near Danielsville and a big mill on the South Broad river, and is more than comfortably fixed in this world's goods. Though way up in years Mr. Bullock still enjoys good health and possesses a powerful intellect, which is still as active as ever.

JAMES F. COLBERT, farmer, Danielsville, was born in Madison county in 1839. About the beginning of this century Philip Colbert, a son of a Virginia planter, with his wife, Sarah Garr, came to Georgia and located on a farm in Oglethorpe county. His son, S. W. Colbert, was born there, and on reaching manhood, moved to Madison county about 1838. Here he wedded Margaret, a daughter of James and Jane (Thompson) Nutt. Mr. Nutt was born in South Carolina, and was a hatter by trade. Finding no employment in that line, he turned to farming for a vocation, and moved to Georgia and settled on a tract of land in Madison county. Mr. S. W. Colbert represented Madison county in the legislature for several terms, and is a well-known figure in the history of the county for the first twenty-five years of its existence. He died on his farm. Mr. James F. Colbert was a farmer boy, but was given an excellent education, considering the educational advantages then afforded, and in 1861, responding to the bugle call for volunteers, joined Company E, Thirty-ninth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Ghaston. In 1864 he married M. L. Arnold, daughter of Hugh and Nancy (Fambrough) Arnold. The father was a native of Madison county, but late in life moved to Coweta county, where he died. Mr. James Daniel was a native of the same county, and a big farmer and political leader, representing Madison county in the legislature. He served as a captain in the war with the Creek Indians, and died in Macon in 1859. Mr. George C. Daniel's grandparents were Allen and Mary (Allen) Daniel, the father being born in Virginia, and was captain of the Eighth Virginia infantry in the revolutionary war. He was also general of the state militia, and after the war came to Georgia, where he became a leading citizen. He donated the site of the county public buildings of Madison county, and was one of the organizers of the courts. He represented it in the legislature, and at one time was sheriff of Elbert county. The mother of Mr. George C. Daniel was a daughter of James and Elizabeth Jones. Mr. Jones was a native of Franklin county, Ga., and died in Chattooga county. Mr. George C. Daniel spent his early days on the farm, and his education was picked up from reading and study after the day's labor was finished. In 1861 he enlisted in the late war, in Company K, Third Georgia regiment, under Capt. E. C. Billups, subsequently being commanded by David B. Langston, later by L. D. Mitchell. He fought in the battles of South mills, Malvern hill, second Manassas, Bristow's station, Sharpsburg, and, in the latter engagement, was wounded and sent to the hospital. He was sent home for three months and then returned to his command. He was then detached for hospital duty. In 1859 Mr. Daniel began to read medicine under Dr. Long, and then took a course of lectures at Philadelphia, and was graduated during his service in the hospital. After receiving his diploma he was commissioned assistant surgeon in the Confederate navy, being assigned to his duty on the ironclad "Chicora," and remained there until Charleston was evacuated. He marched from Charleston to Raleigh, thence to Drury Bluff, where he did his last service. In 1865 he married Louisa E. Watson, daughter of Samuel and Harriet (Jones) Watson. Mr. Watson was a native of South Carolina and moved to Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., where he died. They have had born to them several children, of whom three are living: Clara, James D., Charles Y. The mother of the children was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1844. Husband and wife are earnest workers in the Presbyterian church, and Mr. Daniel is a Mason. In 1865, Mr. Daniel began the practice of medicine in Madison county and continued until 1873, when he was elected ordinary, and re-elected every term since. After returning from the war Mr. Daniel was obliged to begin life over again, but with untiring energy he has succeeded in getting together considerable property, and is a prosperous citizen.

His paternal grandparents, William and Cassandra (McGruder) Drane, were of English descent, and born in Maryland. He was recruited in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and was within sixteen miles of Yorktown at the time of Cornwallis' surrender. He migrated to Georgia and settled in Columbia county in 1790, where he farmed and reared his family, and died in 1845. Mr. Drane's father was born in Columbia county in 1800. After receiving preparatory education, Dr. Drane attended medical lectures at Bellevue hospital, New York city, and in 1832 located in Talbot county, where he practiced his profession until 1846. Smallpox was very prevalent in his section during a part of the time he was in practice, and he gained a wide-spread reputation for his successful treatment of it. He was in the army a short time during the Indian war of 1836. During the late war he did nearly all the smallpox practice in his own and adjoining counties. He was an ardent and influential politician, and represented Talbot county in the general assembly eight years—after which he retired to the shades of private life. He owned large tracts of land, and a great number of slaves; and was an elder in the local Presbyterian church. Mr. Drane's maternal grandparents, Jesse and Fannie (Spencer) Winfrey, were native Virginians. He was of French extraction and migrated from Virginia to Georgia soon after the revolutionary war, in which he had been a soldier in the patriot army, settled in Columbia county, and died about 1810. He was considered to be one of the wealthiest men in Georgia—as may be inferred from the fact that on one occasion he went to Savannah and bought twenty-five slaves from a vessel just arrived from Africa. Mr. Drane, when twenty-years of age, engaged in a general merchandise business, continuing it until war between the states was inaugurated. In 1861 he enlisted in Company H, of which he was made captain, Fifty-ninth Georgia regiment. Among other important battles he participated in were those of Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania court-house, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, etc. In the battle at Gettysburg he was wounded three times, but did not leave the field. Having been elected justice of the inferior court, he returned home in February, 1865. He came out of the war without anything. In 1868 he purchased a small tract of land, to which he has gradually added until now he has over 600 acres of good farming land, partly well improved and productive, on which he has a comfortable home. He is a very successful farmer, and an influential citizen. Mr. Drane was happily married in 1859 to Miss Eugenia N. Brown, born in Crawford county, Ga., in 1839, daughter of William M. and Amanda (Gray) Brown. Mr. Brown was born in Greene county, Ga., and during boyhood and youth was deprived of educational advantages. When grown he moved to Crawford county, which he afterward represented in the general assembly a number of times. Subsequently he removed to Marion county, which he also represented in the general assembly a number of years. He was in the Creek Indian war, in which he served as major. He was an "old-line whig," and about 1848 came within one or two votes of being nominated for congress, and was subsequently appointed United States marshal under President Taylor. He was elected as an anti-secessionist to the convention in 1860-61, and was one of the few who signed a protest against it. He possessed large planting interests, kept "open house," and entertained lavishly; the humblest of his guests received the same considerate attention as the rich and distinguished—all were welcome and all alike shared his hospitality. After the war he gave thousands of bushels of corn to the soldiers, and soldiers' families. He was brave and courageous, and, like such, generous and magnanimous—a born leader. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Drane has been blessed with six children: Albert, in the war department, Washington city; William; Minnie; Eugene; Walter, and Bertie. Mr. Drane is a master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Presbyterian church.

JOE J. DUNHAM, county ordinary, Buena Vista, Marion Co., Ga., son of J. H. and M. E. (Wood) Dunham, was born in Marion county in 1859. Mr. Dunham's grandfather on his father's side was William Dunham. He was a native North Carolinian, migrated to Georgia and settled, first, in Savannah; afterward went to Liberty county, where he made a permanent home. He owned a large plantation and many slaves, and was very wealthy. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Dunham's father was born in Liberty county in 1819, received a good education, and was prepared for college by Prof. Pinchen. He then entered the university of Georgia, at Athens, and after his graduation taught school two years at Longstreet, Pulaski Co., Ga. He next taught in Twiggs county a number of years, whence he went to Houston county and taught until 1848, when he removed to Buena Vista and taught until impaired health caused him to abandon the profession and retire to the farm. At the end of twelve years he resumed teaching, and taught a number of years. He served as a justice of the inferior court a number of terms, and also in the state militia, or home guard, during the late war. He was a very prominent man in the county, and took a deep and active interest in its development, and died in 1885. Mr. Dunham's grandparents, on his mother's side, were Elijah and Elizabeth (Burgen) Wood. He was an attorney at law, went early in life to Milledgeville, and was private secretary for Gov. George M. Troup. Mr. Dunham was reared on the farm, and received a limited education—in the old log school-house. He started in life working on the farm; he then bought cotton and read law, and commenced the practice in 1892, with Butt & Lumpkin—a partnership dating from the time he entered upon the study. In 1889 he was elected ordinary of the county, and was re-elected in 1893, for a second term. He has been a member of the city council for ten years, and is at this writing a candidate for the general assembly. In the congressional election two years ago he was defeated by Congressman Charles Moses. Mr. Dunham has large landed interests, and is much respected.

H. T. HOLLIS, farmer, Buena Vista, Marion Co., Ga., son of John F. and Susan M. (Cherry) Hollis, was born in Marion county in 1841. His grandparents, on his father's side, Thomas and Nancy (Taylor) Hollis, were of English descent, and were born in South Carolina. He migrated early in life to Georgia, and settled in Monroe county, where he reared his family and closed his earthly career. He followed farming through life; owning and operating a farm. He served in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Hollis' father was born and reared in Monroe county, went to Marion county when nineteen years old and began a farmer's life, became possessed of much land and many slaves, and left a valuable estate. Mr. Hollis' grandparents, on his mother's side, were Howell and Mary (Howell) Cherry. He was born in North Carolina, came to Georgia when a young man and settled in Twiggs county. He afterward moved to Monroe county, where he was living at the time of his death. Mr. Hollis was reared and worked on the farm, and had limited educational advantages—such only as the old log school-house afforded. In 1862 he enlisted in Company H, Forty-sixth Georgia regiment, under Capt. E. Taylor, and served until the surrender. He was in the battles of Jackson and Chickamauga, and all the way from there to Atlanta. He was wounded in the battles of Kennesaw and Nashville; came, and remained at home until he recovered, and then returned to the army. Like nearly all ex-Confederate soldiers, he started after the war very poor—but went to farming. He purchased his first land in 1869, and since then has known little save success and prosperity; he owns now about 4,000 acres of good land, and ranks among the rich men of the county. Mr. Hollis was married in 1872 to Miss Blanford Stevens—born in Marion county in 1851—daughter of Richardson and Frances M. (Blanford) Stevens. Mr. Stevens was born in Warren county, Ga., whence he came to Marion county and settled. To Mr. and Mrs. Hollis the following children have been born, of whom five are living: Mart B., Howell C., Mary L., Thomas B., and Annie C. Mrs. Hollis—an exemplary member of the Missionary Baptist church—died in 1887. In 1886 he was elected to represent Marion county in the general assembly, and was placed on the following committees: Finance, agriculture, education, and the John Winfree investigating committee. Mr. Hollis is a member of the people's, or populist, party and a master Mason. He is one of Marion county's substantial citizens.

W. B. JOSSEY, farmer, Buena Vista, Marion Co., Ga., son of Henry and Mary (Mimms) Jossey, was born in Stewart county, Ga., in 1843. His paternal grandfather, Lewis Jossey, of Irish descent, was a native of South Carolina, and early in life came to Georgia. Mr. Jossey's father was born in South Carolina, moved to Georgia when a young man, and settled in what is now Marion county. He was reared and lived a farmer; but for a number of years served as a justice of the peace. His maternal grandfather, Floyd Mimms, was an early settler of Sumter county. He was a farmer—a pursuit he followed all his life. Mr. Jossey's early life was spent on the farm, and the teacher at the old log school-house imparted to him the little education he received. In 1862 he enlisted in Company G, Capt. Melton Brown, Fifty-ninth Georgia regiment. Among the battles, in which he participated, were: Gettysburg, Funkston, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania court-house, Richmond and Petersburg; he remained in the service until the surrender, when he came home penniless. He began farming and worked hard, early and late, and saved money. In 1867 he bought his first land, and now owns 600 acres of good farming land, and is prospering. Mr. Jossey was married in 1871 to Miss Savinia A. Jordan—born in Marion county, in 1854—daughter of Nicholas and Ann (Dukes) Jordan. Mr. Jordan was a native Georgian, was an early settler in Marion county, where he died. Nine children have been born of this union: Mattie, Edna H., William, Thomas, Leroy, Annie, Emmett, Clinton, and Erva. Mrs. Jossey is a member of the Methodist church.

CHARLES KNOWLTON, farmer and miller, Doyle, Marion Co., Ga., son of Hiram and Anna J. (Swindell) Knowlton, was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1841. His paternal great-grandfather was born in Scotland, and came to America long before the revolutionary war. He was a soldier in the old Indian wars, and during the war for independence was a soldier in the patriot army. He used to relate as an incident of his life that on one occasion when the enemy's marksman was aiming at Gen. Washington he struck his horse a blow to make him jump and thus saved the general's life. His grandfather was born in New York and was a farmer. Mr. Knowlton's father was born in New York state in 1807, and came to Georgia and settled in Augusta in 1828. He was a skilled and experienced mechanic, and constructed the first waterworks which conveyed the water from Turknnett spring to Augusta. Later in life he removed to Talbot county, where he followed his trade, and left a quite large landed estate at his death in 1875. His maternal grandfather, Swindell, was of Irish lineage, the family having been early settlers in North Carolina. When Mr. Swindell migrated from that state to Georgia he settled in Greene county and remained there all his life. Mr. Knowlton grew to manhood on the farm and was trained as a mechanic by his father. Being a mechanic he was exempt from military service, and was largely employed in the early part of the war in the making of shoe pegs for the army. In 1863, however, he enlisted in Company D, Seventh Georgia, afterward in the Tenth Confederate cavalry. At one time during his service, when making a charge, he rode through a troop of Union cavalry, not hearing the command to halt; they let him pass unharmed, supposing him to be a prisoner going to the rear. Discovering his mistake and dilemma, he escaped to a near-by friendly swamp. He closed his war service at the battle of Bentonville, N. C. After the war his trade was all he had to rely on, so he went to work at it, and made and saved some money. In 1881 he purchased a mill on McCalee creek, which is now in perfect running order, and very desirable, valuable property. In connection with it he owns some excellent farming land and conducts a farm. In 1865 Mr. Knowlton was married to Miss Julia A. Drane, born in Talbot county in 1845, daughter of Hiram and Eleanor (McGruder) Drane. Mr. Drane was born in Columbia county, Ga., and on entering life for himself removed to Taylor county, where he settled for life. At one time he represented the county in the general assembly. Eight children, living, have blessed this union: Eleanor, Homer, Lizzie, Hiram, Edgar, Minnie, Jackson and Beulah. Mr. Knowlton is a royal arch Mason, and his wife is an exemplary member of the Methodist church. He is enjoying the prosperity and comfort consequent upon an industrious and honorable life.

JAMES M. LOWE, merchant and capitalist, Buena Vista, Marion Co., Ga., son of William H. and Carrie (Boswell) Lowe, was born in Crawford county, Ga., in 1839. His paternal grandparents, John and Patience Lowe, were native North Carolinians, migrated to Georgia in 1780, and settled for life in what is now Jones county. He was a planter, owned a great many slaves, and during the revolutionary war was a soldier in the patriot army. Mr. Lowe's father was born in 1803 in what is now Jones county (organized in 1807). He was reared a farmer, and early in life removed to what is now Taylor county. He was a large slave owner, and for a number of years was a justice of the inferior court. Politically he was an uncompromising democrat, and in religion a devoted Baptist. Mr.

Lowe was reared on the farm, and received a good common school education. In 1860 he read law and was admitted to the bar, but he practiced only a short time. In 1861 he enlisted in Company I, Capt. E. M. Butt, Second Georgia regiment. On the reorganization of the regiment Capt. Butt was promoted to the colonelcy and Mr. Lowe was made orderly sergeant. He participated in the battles of Yorktown, Richmond and Second Manassas. He was wounded at the battle of Richmond, and was sent home on a furlough, remaining forty days. At the battle of Second Manassas he had a limb shot off, and returned home. In 1864 he was elected ordinary of the county, and by re-election held the office for twenty-five years. Were other evidence lacking this would settle the question of Mr. Lowe's ability, capacity and popularity. Under the firm name of Lowe & Rushin, in 1866, he engaged in a general merchandise business in Buena Vista, in which, as in everything else he had undertaken, he has been eminently successful. He was the projector and principal promoter of the Buena Vista & Ellaville railway, was elected president, and continued as such until it was sold to the Central Railway company. In 1890 he organized the Buena Vista Loan and Savings bank, of which he was president until 1894, sustaining to it now the relation of vice-president. His uniform phenomenal success in these several various public and private offices and businesses evinces great capacity and unusual planning, financial and executive ability. In 1859 Mr. Lowe was married to Miss Eva Rushin, born in Marion county in 1841, daughter of Joel F. and Elizabeth (Brooks) Rushin. Mr. Rushin was born in Bibb county, Ga., was a farmer, and moved to Marion county in 1835. He represented the county in the general assembly several times. Of the offspring of this marriage five are living: Gussie, who married R. H. Stokes; Blanche, who married R. H. Peacock; Clifford, married W. H. Lowe; Carrie, who married V. L. McMichael, and Lucille. Mrs. Lowe, who was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, died in 1885. In 1886 Mr. Lowe contracted a second marriage with Mrs. Carrie (nee Evans) Smith, born in Alabama in 1840, daughter of Thomas Evans. Mr. Evans was an early settler in Muscogee county, Ga., but moved to La Grange, Troup Co., Ga. He was a general of militia in the Indian war of 1836. His life occupation was farming. Mr. Lowe is a master Mason, and himself and wife are exemplary and useful members of the Methodist church. Mr. Lowe is a public-spirited and progressive citizen, and one of the foremost in all movements promising to add to the general advancement of the community. He owned many slaves and had a large plantation. Mr. McCall's father was born and reared in Screven county, and was a large slave and land owner, farmer and merchant, was a justice of the inferior court many years, and also represented the county in the house and in the senate of the general assembly. He moved from Screven to Marion county in 1844, and lived there the remainder of his days. In early life he was an ardent, active member of the Missionary Baptist church, in which he was ordained a preacher after he was eighty years of age. Mr. McCall's maternal grandfather was Jeremiah Allen Thorp. He was a farmer, and one of the early settlers in Twiggs county, in which he closed his life. Mr. McCall was reared on the farm, and after receiving a good common school education, took a thorough course at the Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) Business college. For the last seven years he has been engaged in a general merchandise business; and in 1888 he organized the Buena Vista Loan and Savings bank, of which he has recently been elected president. In addition to the above he organized the Buena Vista Improvement company for the encouragement of manufacturing and general improvement purposes. Besides being an active worker in all these laudable progressive enterprises, he is interested in and manages large farming interests. These large and extensive plans promotive of progress and prosperity evince great mental and physical activity, and their success evidences unusual public spirit and financial sagacity and ability. Mr. McCall was married in 1882 to Miss Willie Miller, born in Buena Vista in 1864, daughter of Maj. E. W. and Sallie (Jones) Miller. He was for many years a practicing attorney, was a major in the army during the late war, and has several times represented the county in the general assembly. He is an exceedingly moral man, and is held in the very highest esteem by his fellow-citizens. Mr. Peacock's maternal grandparents, Samuel and Mary (Lumsden) Thompson, were native Virginians of Scotch-Irish descent, his father having been born in Ireland. Coming to Georgia he settled near Covington, Newton Co. He was a planter and large slave-owner, and reared his family in Newton county, where he remained until he died. Mr. Sims' maternal grandfather, Benjamin Harris, was an early settler of Warren county, where he remained during life. Mr. Sims spent his boyhood on the farm, attended school at the log school house so common at that time and followed farming all his life. He began life as an overseer and having saved some money made his first land purchase in 1846, and has added to it until now he has an excellent body of nearly 500 acres of land with a good farm and home on it. He now owns about 1,800 acres of good farming land, including a well-improved farm. Mr. Smith was married in 1877 to Miss Willie A. Bell, born in Stewart county in 1859, daughter of Charles and Susan (Singer) Bell. Mr. Bell was a native Georgian and a teacher by profession. M'DUFFIE COUNTY.

ISAAC A. GIBSON, principal high school, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of Dr. Cicero and Mary H. (Adkins) Gibson, was born on the old family plantation in Warren county, Ga., June 30, 1861. He was the sixth of nine children (eight sons and one daughter) six of whom survive. Raised on the plantation, Prof. Gibson received during his boyhood and youth only such schooling as could be obtained at the country common school. Ambitious of a higher education, when he was eighteen years of age he taught school a term of months to earn the money to help him through college. He then entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., and at the end of three years graduated with the degree of A. B. Three years later his alma mater paid him the distinguished compliment of conferring upon him the degree of A. M.—an honor he very highly appreciates. After graduating he taught school a year to earn the money wherewith to pay for further literary and scientific advancement. He then went to Louisville, Ky., where he first graduated from Woody's school in microscopy and chemistry, and then attended a course at the medical college of Kentucky. Having, by this time, depleted his exchequer, he came home and taught school another year, and then attended Atlanta Medical college, from which he graduated in 1885. Returning to Warren county, he resumed his vocation in the room where he first taught, and remained there three years, gaining valuable experience and professional reputation. Six years ago he came to Thomson, where he is now principal of the high school, and where he has continuously added to his reputation and extended his influence. So assiduous has he been in the discharge of his duties, and so solicitous for the moral and intellectual elevation of those entrusted to his care, that it is claimed for him by the citizens of Thomson that he has done more good in helping young and old to obtain an education than all the schools for miles around—testimony that any one might be proud of. Prof. Gibson was married Feb. 25, 1886, to Miss Mamie L., daughter of William Gross, of McDuffie county, by whom he has had two children—a son, seven years, and a daughter, five years old. The professor is a royal arch Mason, and an exemplary member of the Methodist church. His valuable services are highly appreciated by the people of the prosperous little city and county, so that his continuance in his present position will depend on his own choice.

E. S. HARRISON, surgeon, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of E. S. and Eugenia E. (Jones) Harrison, was born on the old family plantation in Columbia county, Ga., Dec. 2, 1849. His father's family was among the first settlers of Columbia county, and his mother was a daughter of the first Jones that settled there. They raised seven children—four boys and three girls—and of the parents and children there are now living the father and all the children, excepting one girl. During his boyhood and youth Dr. Harrison pursued his studies at home, a plain, common school course, and at the age of seventeen entered the university of Georgia, at Athens. There he took a full course, and was graduated with the degree of A. B. In his class were the following, who have since risen to political and judicial distinction: United States District Judge Emory Speer; William Beane, who shared the first honor with Judge Speer; Judge Howard Van Epps, Atlanta; Ben H. Hill, Jr., ex-United States district attorney; Charles A. Collier, president Capital City bank and Cotton States and International exposition; Ed. Hammond, leading lawyer, Atlanta bar, and Hon. James

Edwards, and others. After reading medicine a year he attended the medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, from which he graduated with distinction. Soon afterward he located at Thomson, where he has since remained. During the war between the states he went with the Georgia Cadets from Marietta to Milledgeville, and saw active service when only fifteen years of age. Having made a specialty of surgery, he has acquired an enviable state-wide reputation for superior skill and ability and continuous success. He is frequently sent for from distant localities for consultation and to assist in operative surgery in delicate and difficult cases. He has been sent for to go to Augusta, and the medical profession of that and other cities have importuned him to permanently settle among them, that a larger portion of the people, particularly of suffering humanity, could have the benefit of what they regard his superior scientific attainments and practical skill in surgery. But no inducements have been offered, and, seemingly, none can be, strong enough to draw him from the quiet and delightful home-life now his in his happy domestic circle. These have charms for him far outweighing the wealth and honor that might be his. Notwithstanding this, the question may yet reach his mind and conscience, as to whether he has the moral right to withhold his great abilities from suffering humanity—to “hide his light under a bushel.” Dr. Harrison was married Dec. 4, 1879, to Miss Fanny Hamilton, of Thomson, who has borne him six children—three sons and three daughters.

ELIAS W. HAWES, sheriff, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of Dr. E. C. and Amanda (Wilson) Hawes, was born in Wrightsborough, McDuffie Co., Nov. 13, 1854. His mother was a daughter of Elias Wilson, McDuffie county. From the time he became of school age until he was fifteen years old, he attended the common schools of the county. When nineteen he commenced farming on his own account, and made it a life pursuit until 1889, when he was elected sheriff of the county. He has been continuously re-elected since, and as he has proved himself to be one of the best sheriffs in the state, he will be likely, unless he voluntarily retires, to hold the office as long as he lives. Determined and cool, courageous almost to recklessness—knowing no fear—he executes the law, and is a terror to evil-doers. But like all truly brave men, Sheriff Hawes is humane—a characteristic which came near costing him his life since his incumbency of the sheriffalty. In response to this sentiment, he had put all the prisoners in the county jail in one large room in the spring of 1894, where a fire could be made for their comfort. They planned an escape. Having detached a portion of a balluster rail, one of them struck him a powerful blow over the head as he was going up the steps to feed them, fracturing his skull and nearly killing him; but by his determined, obstinate courage, he baffled them in their attempt, and put down the uprising. He was very seriously injured; but, sustained by a good constitution and a strong will, he pulled through, and bids fair to live long to serve as the fearless, faithful sheriff of McDuffie county. At present he is the county's unanimous choice. Sheriff Hawes was married in Warrenton, Ga., Dec. 10, 1885, to Mrs. Adella (nee Heath) Wilder—widow of A. Wilder, and daughter of Richard Heath, Warrenton—by whom he has had six children, two sons and four daughters, of whom two daughters have died. Sheriff Hawes is a master Mason, and commands the respect and confidence of all classes of his fellow-citizens.

JOHAN L. HOLZENDORF, merchant, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., was born on the plantation of Mrs. William Casey, Camden county, Ga., July 27, 1848. He went to school in St. Mary's, Ga., until he was ten years of age, when he went to his grandmother, at King's Ferry, Fla., where he remained until 1860. He then came to Thomson and went to school until 1862. In the latter part of 1864 he enlisted in a company organized at Augusta, Ga., a part of the Twentieth Georgia battalion, which command was assigned to Gen. Wade Hampton's corps in Virginia. While in this service he was an active participant in every battle in which his command was engaged—was never off duty or suffered a day's sickness. As evidence of the high appreciation in which this brave and meritorious young "soldier boy" was held, his commander told him that, but for the fact of his youth he would be honored by promotion; as an expression of the estimation in which he was held by his comrades, the corps presented him with a new overcoat, and an entire suit of Confederate gray. In 1865 he was sent to Georgia for a horse, and when at Augusta was pressed into service by Gen. Fry and placed under the command of Kolb, at Macon, Ga. From there he was sent to Montezuma, Ga., but without arms; and the surrender occurred before he could be supplied. After that event he walked from Montezuma to his home. Engaging with his father, he clerked for him until 1869, when he went into business for himself. He has built up a large and eminently prosperous business, and is one of the most successful and popular citizens of Thomson. Mr. Holzendorf was a member of the council three years, and then, immediately succeeding that service, he was elected mayor. So satisfactory to the people, and so beneficial to the city has his administration been, that he is credited with being the best mayor Thomson ever had, and has been successively re-elected five years—with a probability of being continued. He is an enthusiastic Mason, and has been exalted to the royal arch degree. His religious views tend to Universalism.

HERCULES JOHNSON, lawyer, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of William H. and Priscilla (Finch) Johnson, was born in Columbia county, Ga. (in that part set off to McDuffie), Sept. 22, 1861. He attended school in the county, teaching a portion of the time until he was eighteen years of age. After clerking in Thomson one winter he went to work on his father's farm, and continued there until 1884, when he returned to Thomson and entered upon the study of law under his brother. After one year's reading he was admitted to the bar. When admitted Mr. Johnson had just twenty-five cents in his pocket; obtained his license on a credit, and was already considerably in debt. He immediately opened an office in Thomson and entered upon the practice of his profession. He has worked up a large and remunerative clientage, attained to marked prominence, and, although young, is regarded as one of the leaders of the Thomson bar. He affords another and a strong and encouraging illustration of what can be accomplished under the adverse circumstances of a meager education, and the absence of money and influence. That Mr. Johnson has a brilliant future before him cannot be doubted. He is a member and secretary of Thomson council, Royal Arcunum, No. 1161.

ROBERT H. PEARCE, county treasurer, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of James H. and Ann M. (Saunders) Pearce, was born in Marion, S. C., July 23, 1834. His mother was the daughter of John Saunders, Darlington, S. C. Until he was seventeen years of age he attended the old-time, "old-field" schools, and then went to a preparatory school in Spartanburg, S. C. After that he attended Furman's university at Greenville, S. C., where he remained three and one-half years and graduated with the degree of A. B. He then took a two-years' literary course and received certificates of proficiency entitling him to the degree of A. M. Thus equipped he taught school in Darlington, S. C., five months. After that he traveled for a time, taught school in Florida a year, and in December, 1856, returned to South Carolina. He then taught school at Horn's Creek, Edgefield district, S. C., awhile, when he was appointed railway and express agent at Marion, S. C., and in 1859 he was transferred to Marr's Bluff, where he was railway and express agent and postmaster. In addition to the above he was elected principal of the Jeffries Creek, S. C., school. In 1861, when the war between the states began, he enlisted in Company H, Eighth South Carolina regiment, was ordered at once to Richmond, Va., and went from there to Manassas Junction, when the regiment became a part of the First brigade, First division, army of northern Virginia. Detailed as regiment commissary sergeant, he was under fire two hours at the battle of First Manassas. Going from there to the peninsula he participated in the battle of Seven Pines and then in the seven days' fight around Richmond. He had now become so broken down in health that he was discharged, and returned home. As soon as he was well enough he began teaching again, but it was not long before he was called into the state service and sent with a body of troops to guard Cambahee river bridge in South Carolina. But when Gen. Sherman's army approached, not being strong enough to attack, they followed him through the northern part of the state until Spartanburg was reached, where they were stationed. Just before the surrender the command was ordered to disperse, return home, and await further orders. On reaching home, and hearing of Potter's raiders (a roaming negro regiment on a round of devastation), Mr. Pearce joined a mounted company of disorganized and furloughed soldiers and pursued the marauders. When they overtook them they engaged them in a skirmish and drove them out of that part of the state. Returning to Marr's Bluff, he taught school there until the latter part of 1866, when he removed to Thomson, then in Columbia county, and taught school there and in the surrounding country in 1867-68. In 1870 he was chosen principal of the Columbia institute, Thomson. In 1871, the county of McDuffie having been organized, he was elected clerk of the superior court and county treasurer, one of which he has continuously held until the present time. In 1875 Mr. Pearce was elected county school commissioner, which he held until 1890, when a law was passed forbidding the holding of two county offices at the same time. Such are his peculiar qualifications he is elected secretary and treasurer, or both, of every society or club or other organization in McDuffie county. Mr. Pearce was married in Columbia county Dec. 18, 1872, to Miss Mary H., daughter of Virgil M. Barnes, of that county, who has borne him six children, four boys and two girls, all of whom are living. The oldest daughter, Lulu M., is secretary and treasurer of the people's (or populist) party paper, the "Daily Press," Atlanta, and though not so in name is actually business manager. Mr. Pearce is a Knight of Honor, and an active, exemplary member of the Baptist church. He is certainly a very useful, and it would seem, an indispensable member of the community he so admirably serves.

JOHAN F. SHIELDS, merchant, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of E. A. and Susan (Brinckley) Shields, was born in Columbia county, July 23, 1854. His parents were natives respectively of Columbia and Warren counties, and had five children born to them, four boys and one girl, of whom our subject was the second child. He began going to school when ten years old, and when seventeen left school and engaged in clerking for Shields & Coldwell, Thomson. He remained in the store for two years, and then farmed two years, after which he opened a general merchandise store in Thomson, which he has continued ever since. Mr. Shields is one of the original settlers and business men of Thomson, and by his enterprise and energy has not only built up a large and prosperous business for himself, but has been largely instrumental in bringing Thomson to its present commercial prominence. When he began business here the entire country around traded in Augusta, but now Thomson not only controls the business of McDuffie county but largely that of adjoining counties. He is a wide-awake, pushing merchant, and a public-spirited and valuable citizen. Mr. Shields was married Sept. 24, 1879, to Miss Eppie M., daughter of William A. Shields, of Morgan county, Ga., who has borne him seven children, five boys and two girls, of which two boys and two girls are living. Mr. Shields is a royal arch Mason, also a R. A., a member of the I. O. O. F., and an influential member of the Methodist church.

JOHN T. WEST, lawyer, Thomson, McDuffie Co., Ga., son of Rev. Thomas B. and Mildred (West) West, daughter of Maj. George W. West, Cedartown, Ga., was born in Columbia (in what is now part of McDuffie) county, Feb. 28, 1859. His early education was obtained in the common country schools; later he went to school in Thomson to Prof. E. A. Stead (afterward a professor at Mercer university, Macon, Ga.) and T. M. Stead. After they resigned he continued his studies under Rev. J. W. Ellington. For two or three years of the latter part of the time he attended this school he worked on the farm during the summer and attended the school in the fall. Completing there his preparatory studies, he entered the sophomore class at Mercer university in 1878, and was graduated the latter part of 1881. In the spring of this year his father was taken seriously ill, and he left college and returned home to nurse him and superintend the farm. But he continued his studies at home, and in a short time returned to college, stood his examination, and received the degree of A. B. The next three years he managed the farm, in the meantime reading law under the direction of Maj. Joseph A. Blance. In January, 1884, he went to Cedartown, Ga., and studied directly under Maj. Blance, and the following March was admitted to the bar. Returning to Thomson he located and immediately entered upon the practice. Mr. West has been eminently successful, and has built up a practice valuable as to amount and extent. He ranks high with the profession, and is regarded as one of the soundest and ablest lawyers at the McDuffie bar. He is popular with the people, has their confidence, and is considered as one of the solidest men in the county in business and finance. He has accumulated a nice property, and was one of the original incorporators of the bank of Thomson, and is now a director in said bank and the attorney for the same. Some years ago he assumed the management of the McDuffie "Enterprise" newspaper, then nearing suspension, and not only restored it to life, but made it one of the best county papers in the state. Mr. West was happily married May 13, 1884, to Miss Laura F. Hawes, daughter of Dr. E. C. Hawes, of McDuffie county, who has borne him two children, a son, now nine, and a daughter six years of age. Mr. West is a royal arch Mason, and a past master of the blue lodge. Being a comparatively young man, and having accomplished so much already, it may be safely assumed that a brilliant future awaits him. He has never been a candidate for any political office, but has devoted himself closely to the calls of his profession.

M'INTOSH COUNTY.

ATWOOD. This is the name of a pioneer family of McIntosh county, Ga., distinguished by reason of its aristocratic lineage, the pre-eminently valuable services rendered by its members in the cause of freedom during the revolutionary war, and by the high standing of its living representatives. It belongs to a pioneer family of New England, which early in the present century became connected with that of one of the most illustrious of the pioneer families of Georgia. The following Attwood family genealogy is from Cothren's History of Ancient Woodbury, Conn.: "This has been a name of some consequence on the other side of the water. Sixteen different families have entered their coats of arms in the herald's office. It has been a numerous family on both sides of the Atlantic. Ten of the name have graduated at different colleges prior to 1853. The name of Attwood appears in Massachusetts, then in Connecticut. John Attwood, gentleman, from London, brought over a large estate; was made a freeman in 1636, and was assistant in the Plymouth colony in 1636, and died in 1644. Capt. Thomas Attwood, of Weathersfield, Conn., tradition says, was a captain of a company under Oliver Cromwell. He was a physician of some note, and died in 1682. He married Abigail and had four children. His son, Dr. Jonathan, emigrated to Woodbury, and was one of the early settlers." Dr. Jonathan Attwood, Woodbury, Conn., married Sarah Terrell, Nov. 5, 1701; his son, Oliver, married Lois Wheeler, Nov. 2, 1740; his son, Elisha, married Mary, daughter of Dr. Henry Skilton; his son, Henry Skilton Attwood, of Watertown, Conn., married Ruth Guernsey. His son, Henry Skilton Atwood (he dropped one of the t's), was born in Watertown, Conn., and came to Savannah, Ga., when a lad of fourteen, where he began his career as a clerk in the establishment of an uncle. He was married in 1825 to Miss Ann M., daughter of John Lachlan McIntosh, a descendant of the clans McCoy, McKenzie and McIntosh, those noble bands of Highlanders who settled that portion of Georgia now known as McIntosh county. They passed their married life at Cedar Point plantation, and reared the following family: Ruth Ann; Jane Margaret; Sarah Alice, deceased; William Henry; James Alfred; Matilda Alethia, deceased; George Elliott, John McIntosh. Henry S. Atwood lived to a good old age, and became one of the wealthiest planters in eastern Georgia. Capt. W. H. Atwood was born Oct. 11, 1836, on Cedar Point plantation, and was married Aug. 15, 1867, to Miss Catharine G., daughter of James R. and Mary L. (Polhill) Butts. One child blessed this union, the mother dying in 1870. Capt. Atwood, Oct. 17, 1871, married her sister, Tallulah E., who is the mother of six children: Henry G., Maud A., James R., Jane C., Elliott Mc., and Sibyl J. These children are the sixth generation who have lived at Cedar Point, and Capt. Atwood still holds the original grant to his ancestors from King George III. of England. Mr. and Mrs. Butts were natives, respectively, of Canterbury, Conn., and Georgia. The latter's father, John G. Polhill, was a judge of the superior court of Georgia, and died at Scottsboro, near Milledgeville. James R. Butts, who became surgeon-general of the state of Georgia, was the great-grandson of Josiah and Elizabeth Butts, who were the parents of fourteen children. At one period of the revolutionary war they had seven sons and eight grandsons in the patriot army. Capt. Atwood is a man of great popularity, and is very public-spirited as will be seen by a brief statement of his public work and positions. He represented his county in the lower house of the legislature in 1876-77, and in the senate in 1886-87; is now serving his second term as county commissioner; is a member of the democratic executive committee of the county; has for twenty years been a trustee of McIntosh county asylum; is president of a camp of Confederate veterans, and of the county agricultural society; is a member of the county board of education, and is chairman of the Union church society, which has built at Crescent one of the prettiest churches to be found in a country district. Capt. Atwood entered the army in 1861 as a private. After six months the company was reorganized and he was elected first lieutenant, and a year later was promoted to the captaincy for efficiency and gallant conduct as a soldier.

He served with his command in Florida, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia, and was mustered out at Hillsboro, N. C., under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. Capt. Atwood and his estimable wife live in a beautiful country residence at Cedar Point plantation, where friends and strangers are always regally entertained. The residence fronts a harbor, which, according to the United States coast survey, can be entered by boats drawing twenty-eight feet of water, a fact which will no doubt be utilized some day in the establishment of a port of entry.

J. A. ATWOOD, farmer, Darien, McIntosh Co., Ga., is a brother of Capt. W. H. Atwood, and was born in McIntosh county, Jan. 29, 1840. He was married in 1867 to Miss Ann Livingston, a daughter of Nicholas and Eliza Bayard. This is the same family to which ex-Secretary of State Bayard belongs. Her father was a resident of New York city in his earlier days, and served on the board of aldermen. To Mr. and Mrs. Atwood have been born Elise Barrington, Alfred Livingston, Bayard McIntosh, Isabella Quintard, Ruth Marguerite, Annie Rosalee, Sarah Alice, James Kenneth, and Mabelle. Mrs. Atwood and the children are members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Atwood enlisted in 1861 in the McIntosh dragoons, and served in the ranks until 1863, when he was detailed for special service by the secretary of war. He was paroled in Green county, Ga. He began life in moderate circumstances, but later inherited a share of his father's estate—$150,000. Mr. Atwood, like his brother, is one of the leading men of his county, he and his family being in social touch with the best citizens.

CHARLES H. HOPKINS, farmer, Darien, McIntosh Co., Ga., son of Charles H. and May (Givens) Hopkins, and was born Oct. 24, 1842, at Belleville, McIntosh Co., Ga., in the same room in which his father before him first saw the light. The mother was a native of Beaufort, S. C. The Hopkins family is an old and much-respected one of English descent. Stephen Hopkins, the great-grandfather of the above-named gentleman, was a rear admiral in the British navy, his wife being a Miss Angelo, of Charleston, S. C., and of Italian lineage. Her father, Fillippo Martino Angelo, was a native of Italy, and her mother was a Miss Rurledge, of South Carolina. Their son, Gen. Francis Hopkins, was born near Bluffton, S. C., in 1772. His wife was Rebecca Sayre, of Hilton Head, S. C. He was a man of some prominence in his time, having served six terms in the general assembly from McIntosh county. Mr. C. H. Hopkins, the subject of this sketch, was elected to the legislature in 1892, and was chairman of the committee on military affairs, his father having served in that body in 1838, and in the senate the following year. It will be noticed that each of the three generations has had a representative in the legislature, a fact which shows the very high appreciation in which the members of this family have been held by the citizens of the county. The plantation on which they now live has been in possession of the Hopkins family for three generations, since 1805. At the opening of the war, in 1861, Mr. Hopkins enlisted as lieutenant, and served to the close of the war. He was appointed by Gov. A. H. Stephens a member of his personal staff, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He has occupied numerous positions of public trust in his county, having served ten years as county ordinary, and as city marshal of Darien for eleven years. He was also jailer of McIntosh county for eleven years, during which time he never had an escape, something exceedingly unusual for such a length of time. He was married Dec. 4, 1867, to Miss Matilda A., daughter of Henry Atwood, of Putnam county. Mrs. Hopkins died in March, 1869, and her remains are interred in Laurel Grove cemetery, Savannah, Ga. A member of the masonic fraternity, he is past master of that organization at Darien, and represented his lodge in the Grand lodge of 1883 and 1884. He is also past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, of Inverness lodge, No. 29. He was made captain of the McIntosh Light Dragoons, and accompanied them to Griffin in 1892. These few brief facts will set forth some of the interesting points in the history of one of the most prominent families of old McIntosh county, and will serve to show to succeeding generations the high regard in which its earlier members were held in their day.

DR. SPALDING KENAN, a physician of fine ability and large practice at Darien, McIntosh Co., Ga., is a native of that old historic city, Milledgeville, where he was born in 1836. The principal part of his education was received at the Georgia Military institute, at Marietta. For a year he clerked in a cotton warehouse at Savannah, and then went to Philadelphia, where he took a course of lectures in Jefferson Medical college, graduating from that institution in 1859. His first practice was at Eufaula, Ala. After a year he removed to Darien, and was shortly afterward appointed assistant physician of the State Insane asylum. Here he served two years, then entered the army as assistant surgeon, Forty-fifth Georgia regiment. Returning home at the end of six months, he was appointed assistant surgeon of the conscript department, where he served till the close of the war. In 1866 he returned to Darien, where he has since lived. He has held the office of acting assistant surgeon, United States marine hospital service for a number of years at this point. He is now mayor of Darien, and has served a number of terms in that capacity. Dr. Kenan was united in marriage to Miss Evelyn E., daughter of Louis and Elizabeth (Bass) Livingston, of Columbus, Ga., and to them were born eight children: M. J., L. L., Randolph S., Spalding, Evey, Elizabeth, Kate, and Aurie. Dr. Kenan is the son of Michael J. and Catharine (Spalding) Kenan, the mother being a daughter of Thomas and Sarah (Leake) Spalding. Mr. Spalding was a man of much prominence in Darien, and well-known throughout the state. He was in congress from his district in 1805-06, was president of the Darien bank for years, served in the legislature, and was chairman of the gubernatorial convention that nominated Howell Cobb. He was awarded by the English Mercantile association a solid silver cup for the first Sea Island cotton raised in Georgia. The Kenans came from Duplin, county Antrim, Ireland, and settled originally in North Carolina, Kenansville, of that state, taking its name from the family. Dr. Kenan is distantly related to the McIntosh family, prominent in Georgia, in early days. He is a type of the old respected family physician, and wears his fifty-nine years with dignity and honor.

MERIWETHER COUNTY.

W. H. ALBRIGHT, one of the most successful business men of the county of Meriwether, was born in Sumpter, Ga., in 1840, the son of Oswald and Sarah A. (Wheless) Albright. His father was born Feb. 29, 1819, in Franklin county, Ga., of which county his parents, Jacob and Mary (Dixon) Albright, who were natives of North Carolina, were among the earliest settlers. He, Oswald Albright, in 1836, ran away from home to serve in the Indian war. His wife was the daughter of Abb and Polly (Tindall) Wheless, natives of Virginia, who made Georgia their home at an early date. Although born in Georgia, young Albright

(W. H.) passed his boyhood and youth on a farm in Russell county, Ala., and returned to this state in 1858. He received such education as the country schools could afford, supplemented by one term at college, and also taught seven terms. Then, as did many of his comrades, he laid aside his high hopes, and responded to the call of duty, enlisting in 1861, in a company under Capt. Dubose, attached to the Fifth North Carolina battalion. But on account of his disabilities, the young man was discharged in 1862, and returned home the next year broken in health and without a cent wherewith to make a start in life. He, however, possessed superior qualifications, which fitted him for a business career, and he embarked in the mercantile trade, in which his success has been marvelous. By industry, integrity and persistent application to business he has amassed a fortune, and is one of the most honored citizens of this county. His wife was Miss Sarah Humphries, born in Meriwether county in 1844, the daughter of Charles F. and Elizabeth (Sewell) Humphries, the former born in South Carolina in 1814, and an early settler of Georgia. Mr. and Mrs. Albright have been blessed with seven children, four of whom are living: William A., John O., Thomas D., and James C. The parents are both faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mr. Albright is also a prominent Mason. He traces with pride the genealogy of his family to the day of the pilgrim fathers, when, in 1620, the first Albright landed in America. This man, named Jacob, was the father of four sons, and through them rose the families of that name throughout America. Two counties of North Carolina—Guilford and Alamance—were named for members of the Albright family, who were noteworthy and popular.

VIRGIL BIGGERS, a successful farmer, is a native of Columbus, Ga., where he was born in 1850. His grandfather, Joseph Biggers, a revolutionary soldier, brought his wife, Mary (Countryman) Biggers, and son, F. M. Biggers, from South Carolina, their native state, to settle in Columbus, Ga. The son developed excellent business talent, and carried on an extensive trade in Columbus for a number of years. His wife, Miss Louisa Gaston, was a daughter of Judge Alexander and Louisa (Blair) Gaston, of South Carolina, who in 1802 came to Georgia, where for many years Judge Gaston held a prominent position in political affairs, as well as in those pertaining to the church, in which he was very active. Virgil, the son of F. M. and Louisa Biggers, having been reared upon the farm, where he had but limited educational advantages, developed a fondness, as well as an aptitude for agricultural pursuits, to which he has devoted himself, and with very great success. He has a large and fine farm of 700 acres, in an excellent state of cultivation, and is a man generally liked and respected. In 1876 Mr. Biggers married Miss Alice McClinan, a native of the county, born in 1860; she is the daughter of Freeman and Anna (Hammock) McClinan, the former a native of this county, and long a leading and influential citizen. Mr. and Mrs. Biggers have four children: Pierce, Marion, Clarence and Willis. The parents are earnest and faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mr. Biggers belongs, also, to the masonic fraternity.

JOHN G. BROWN, who carries on an extensive farm in Meriwether county, of which he is a native, was born in 1835, and is the son of William and Mary (Owen) Brown. The former, a native of Jones county, was born in 1810, and settled in Meriwether county in 1832. His parents, John and Millie (Miller) Brown, were early settlers of Baldwin county, to which Mr. Brown, whose father, Moses Brown, was a revolutionary soldier, came from South Carolina. William Brown's wife was the daughter of George Owen, a Virginian who settled in Meriwether county in 1830. John G. Brown passed his early years on the farm, securing such education as was attainable in the old log school house. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, of the Thirteenth Georgia militia, under Capt. Henry Baker. He served throughout the war, was in the battle of Atlanta, from July 19 to July 22, 1864, and other fights. He returned with empty pockets to make a new start in life. By prudence and economy, as well as diligence, his means rapidly increased, and he has added from time to time to his farm, and is now the owner of a vast plantation in a fine state of cultivation; he also runs a saw-mill and is a man of wealth and influence. He is an honored member of the order of masonry. In 1859 Mr. Brown married Miss Sarah Riggins, born in Upson county in 1838, daughter of Joshua H. and Winnie (Alford) Riggins. Mr. and Mrs. Brown have been blessed with twelve children: Mary A. E., John G., Lou D., Charity E., Julius C., James T., Julia A., Jacob V., Jesse E. (deceased), Joshua W. (deceased), Anna M. and Esley C.

CYPRIAN BULLOCH, JR., a wealthy farmer and active man of business of Meriwether county, in which he was born in 1848, is the son of Cyprian and Lucinda (Grey) Bulloch, North Carolinians, who were among the first settlers of Burke county, Ga. Mr. Bulloch was born in 1802 and died in 1892; his parents were Stephen and Mary (Bussey) Bulloch, of North Carolina, the father a soldier in the war of the revolution. The mother of Cyprian Bulloch, Jr., was a daughter of Samuel Grey, a South Carolinian who served in the war of 1812, and having drawn some land in Georgia, came and settled upon it, at a time when the country was very sparsely settled. The young Cyprian passed his early years on the farm with but a limited education. He developed a talent for agriculture, and in 1876 made his first investment in land, to which he had added at intervals since until he now has an immense plantation of some 1,200 acres of fine land. Besides his farming interests Mr. Bulloch is engaged in various mercantile enterprises in connection with the firm known as Bulloch, Bussey & Co. In 1872 Mr. Bulloch married Miss Julia Parkman, who was born in this county in 1853, and is a daughter of Henry and Mary (Glanten) Parkman, South Carolinians, who moved to Georgia in 1846; Mr. Parkman served in the late war. Mr. and Mrs. Bulloch have been blessed with seven children: Henry, Mattie, Julia, Minnie, Andrew, Ira G. and Samuel T. The parents are both members of the Baptist church; Mr. Bulloch is also a member of the masonic fraternity.

N. C. CAMPBELL, M. D., is a man distinguished among the citizens of Meriwether county, not only as a successful physician, but as a man of influence in political and general affairs. His grandfather, John Campbell, a Virginian, served in the war of the revolution and in 1800 moved to Georgia. His son, Catlett, born in Virginia in 1797, having spent his early years in Morgan county, Ga., settled on a farm in Meriwether county just after it was formed, and was one of the most prosperous planters in that county during his day. Mr. Campbell died in 1862; he had married Miss Susan Harris, whose parents, John and Agnes Harris, were also Virginians who early made Georgia their home. Mr. Harris had also been a soldier in the war of the revolution. The son of Catlett and Susan (Harris) Campbell, N. C. Campbell, was born in Meriwether county in 1838, and after receiving an elementary education in the country schools near his home he completed his general course of study at Collinsworth institute. He then took up the study of medicine, reading at first under the tutelage of Dr. F. O. Danially; this was followed by a course in medicine at the university of New York, from which he graduated in 1860. He also enjoyed the advantages of hospital practice at Bellevue hospital, which was very helpful to him. In 1861 the young physician went into the army, enlisting in Company B, Second Georgia regiment, under Capt. William Harris. He passed through many battles: Mason's and Munson's hills, Yorktown, Seven Pines, serving throughout the war, to return at its close to establish himself in practice. In this Dr. Campbell has been very successful, having a large and lucrative practice, and is widely known and respected. He represented his county in the legislature of 1890 and 1891. He is a well-known member of the order of Masons. In 1863 Dr. Campbell married Miss Mary E. Howard, born in Talbot county in 1842, a daughter of John and Martha (Birch) Howard, the former a son of Nicholas and Judith (Campbell) Howard, Virginians who settled in Columbus when their son John was quite young. The mother of Mrs. Campbell was born in Danville, Va., in 1818. She was the daughter of John Neville Birch and Ann (Dilworth) Birch, Virginians who moved to Georgia in 1820. Dr. N. C. Campbell and Mary (Howard) Campbell are the parents of three children: Eloise, Susie Howard and Mary Eugenia. The parents are efficient members of the Methodist Episcopal church south.

GEORGE CALDWELL, a progressive farmer of Meriwether county, is one of the pioneers of the county, and of Irish ancestry, his grandparents, James and Mary Caldwell, and also his grandfather, McAlace, being natives of Ireland. James Caldwell was a soldier of the revolutionary war. These all settled in South Carolina, in which state their children, Robert and Jeanette (McAlace) Caldwell, were born, and also the son of the latter pair, George Caldwell, born in 1816. The lad's home was on the farm, his school privileges being limited to attendance in the old log school house of his district. On reaching manhood in 1837, his parents moved to Georgia, and he accompanied them. He made his home on a farm, and by his prudence, industry and economy has developed it into one of the valuable properties of the county, and has won a high standing in the community. His wife was Miss Eliza Connally, a daughter of Abner and Lucy (Bagley) Connally, old pioneers of the state; she was reared on a farm in Elbert county. Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell were married in 1837 and have six children: Missouri, Bethuel, Mary, William, John W. and Rebecca. Mr. Caldwell is a Lutheran, while his wife is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

W. J. CLARK is another of the respected citizens of Meriwether county who devotes himself to the cultivation of the soil. His grandfather, Thomas Clark, was born in England, and coming to the United States, settled in South Carolina, where he married. In 1824 he migrated to Georgia and settled first in what is now Meriwether county, whence not long afterward he moved to Coweta county, where he lived three years. He then moved to what is now Cherokee county, but after staying there a year he moved back to Meriwether county, where he made his permanent home. Henry G. Clark, Mr. Clark's father, was born in South Carolina in 1818, and was only six years old when his father moved to Georgia, and grew to manhood in Meriwether county. He married Miss Nancy J., daughter of George A. and Rebecca Ray, who were early settlers of Meriwether county. It was in this county, in 1848, that their son, W. J. Clark, was born and passed his early years upon the farm, with the limited school privileges of those days. His chief interest has always centered in agriculture, and to that he has devoted himself, and with great success, as is evident from the fact that though he started out in life with nothing, he has already acquired a competence, has a pleasant home and a fine farm of 500 acres near Oakland. His wife, whom he married in 1872, was Miss Lucy A. Estes, who was born in this county in 1845, and is the daughter of John W. and Lucy Estes, natives of South Carolina, but among Georgia's early settlers. To the union of Mr. and Mrs. Clark seven children have been born: Mattie J., Josie S., Mary L., Lizzie Etta, James W., Henry J. and Lewis C. Mr. and Mrs. Clark and daughters are members of the Missionary Baptist church. Mr. Clark is a Mason and also a member of the Farmers' alliance.

W. B. CLARK, one of the active and successful business men of Meriwether county, is a native of this county, born in 1858; his parents, Henry G. and Nancy J. (Ray) Clark, were among the first settlers of this county, the father being a native of Virginia and a son of Samuel and Susan (Drake) Clark. Samuel Clark was of Irish nativity, and having emigrated to this country in his early years, served in the war of 1812, and later came to Georgia. His son Henry's wife, Nancy, was a daughter of George R. and Nancy Ray, who were also early settlers of this county. W. B. Clark spent his early years, until he reached the age of twenty-one, upon the farm, making the most of such education as he could obtain in the country schools of his neighborhood. He then came to Rocky Mount and engaged as clerk with J. H. Salmon (a Scotchman who came to this country in 1878). After five years young Clark bought out his employer's business, which he continued to carry on with great success, and has acquired a considerable fortune by his own industry and economy. In 1890 he married Ann Braswell, a native of Meriwether county, born in 1873, and the daughter of Hugh and Fannie (Roe) Braswell, old settlers of the state, the father a soldier in the late war.

R. S. COLE is a grandson of Robert and Elizabeth (Fambrel) Cole, Virginians, who were among the early settlers of Newton county, Ga., and later moved to Coweta county, where, in Newnan, Mr. Cole died. Their son, Jesse, who had accompanied his parents from Virginia to Newton county, married Miss Elizabeth Crawford, a daughter of William T. and Elizabeth (Shanklin) Crawford, natives of South Carolina, who were among the early settlers of Henry county, Ga. One son, Taylor Crawford, served in the Mexican war under Gen. Taylor. R. S. Cole, the son of Jesse and Elizabeth Cole, was born in 1820, in Newton county, and reared on the farm in Henry county, coming to Meriwether county in 1842. His educational opportunities had been very limited, and he began life for himself with but very little to start with; but by determined effort and persistent industry he has acquired wealth and influence. His large farm consists of 1,500 acres of land, in splendid condition. He has a beautiful home, and he and his family enjoy the respect of all who know them. His wife, whom he married in 1841, was Miss Nancy Ward, born in Meriwether county in 1819. She is a daughter of Obadiah and Susan (Fambrel) Ward, the former a native and constant resident of Meriwether county. Mr. Cole belongs to the masonic fraternity, and he and Mrs. Cole are both faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They are the parents of six children: William T., Franklin, Elisa, John, Jesse, and Sallie.

MONROE DAVIDSON, one of the well-to-do farmers of Meriwether county, is a native of Putnam county, born in 1832. His grandfather, William Davidson, a Virginia soldier of the revolutionary war, came to this state not long after that war, and his son Oliver, the father of Monroe, was born in Warren county. He served in the Indian war of 1836, and his wife was Miss Harriet A. Davenport, a daughter of John and Nancy (Davis) Davenport, Virginians, who settled first in Greene county, Ga, and afterward in Harris county. Young Monroe passed his early years on a farm in Harris county, with the common privileges of the country school. In 1862 he enlisted, joining Company H of the Thirty-first Georgia regiment, under Capt. Murphey, and was in many battles, among them those of Griswoldville and of Cold Harbor, in the latter of which he was badly wounded and unable to serve any further. He returned home, and after recovering from his wound devoted himself to the cultivation of his farm, in which he has been well prospered. At the time of the war Mr. Davidson sold his negroes, receiving in payment Confederate money. He has that money yet. In 1859 Mr. Davidson married Miss Regina Park, the daughter of Dr. Andrew and Alethia (Burren) Park, the former a native of South Carolina, who came to this state in 1828. The daughter, Mrs. Davidson, was born in Meriwether county in 1838. To Mr. Davidson and his wife three children have been born: Alethia A., Anna M., and Regina P. The parents are both worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

JOHAN T. DIXON, M. D., a physician of note in Meriwether county, and a man of fine business ability, is a native of the county, born in 1837, the son of John L. and Elizabeth (Gorley) Dixon. The former was a native of Hancock county, but an early settler of Meriwether county, where he died in January, 1892. His parents were Harry and Ann (Hines) Dixon, Virginians, who early settled in Georgia. Mr. Dixon served in the war of 1812. The father of Dr. Dixon's mother was also an early settler of the state. Dr. Dixon himself passed his early years on the farm, obtaining his early training in the old log school house of his district; then he attended the Greeneville school, and finally the Colinsworth institute. In 1861 he enlisted in Company E of the Twenty-eighth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Moore. In the battle of Seven Pines Mr. Dixon was badly wounded and returned home to recruit. During the twelve months he was away from the army he took a course of medical study in the Virginia Medical college, at Richmond, and then went into the hospital service for the remainder of the war. He then entered the medical college in Atlanta, from which he graduated in 1866. Having received his degree, Dr. Dixon returned to Meriwether county, and established himself in the practice of his profession at Woodbury, in which he has had great success, his practice being widely extended and very lucrative, and he is highly esteemed throughout the community. Dr. Dixon was married in 1865, his wife being Miss Celeste E. Hussey, a daughter of Hiram and Sarah (Edwards) Hussey, of Meriwether county, where Mrs. Dixon was born, in 1844. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, and died in 1891, leaving her husband with seven children: Sallie, Mary I., Emmett E., John L., Harry, Joel T., and Nellie. In 1892 Mr. Dixon married Mrs. H. H. Hinton, who was born in Meriwether county in 1838, and is the daughter of Brown Fuller. Dr. and Mrs. Dixon are both faithful and consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

D. C. DUNLAP, a prosperous farmer and active business man of this county, is a native of Lincoln county, Tenn., born in 1823. His parents were James and Sarah (Massey) Dunlap, the former born in South Carolina in 1790, and served in the Indian war; the latter a daughter of James Massey, a native of Ireland, who was an early settler in Giles county, Tenn. James Dunlap's parents were David and Polly Dunlap, who early moved from South Carolina to Alabama, being among the very first settlers of Tuscaloosa, in that state. Mr. Dunlap had been one of the soldiers of the revolution. Young Dunlap spent his boyhood in the place of his birth, the farm in Lincoln county, Tenn., with very restricted educational privileges. In 1843 he went to Tuscaloosa, Ala., where he spent three years. In 1850 he came to Georgia and built a large mill at White Sulphur Springs, in the southern part of Meriwether county, and in 1854 he moved to his present home, near Rocky Mount. Here, in 1875, he built a large public gin and machine shops, his being the first steam gin erected in this county. In 1877 it was destroyed by fire, two men, a white and a negro, being the incendiaries; the latter died in prison. By this fire Mr. Dunlap lost $6,200; but, nevertheless, this loss did not discourage him, and he has been quite prosperous in later years. His unbounded energy and steady industry have been the foundation of his success, and he has always been highly respected wherever known. He served with honor to himself in the late war, enlisting in 1862 in the Twenty-sixth Georgia battalion, under Capt. Robert Heard, taking part in the battles of Resaca and Missionary ridge, and others, and doing his part until the declaration of peace. The marriage of Mr. Dunlap took place in 1852, his wife being Miss Francina Brittain, born in Clark county, Ga., Sept. 18, 1832, a daughter of William and Mary (Harris) Brittain, the former also a native of Clark county, born in 1804. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dunlap, of whom the eldest, Sarah, E., wife of Barney Almon, died in 1882. The others are: Mary E., Louisa, James D., John H., and Robert R. The parents are faithful members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Dunlap is a member of the order of Masons. He was also for some years justice of the peace, from 1866 through 1868.

J. D. DUNN, a prosperous farmer, and a man of remarkable mechanical talent and skill, is a native of Meriwether county, in which he was born in 1828; his parents, William and Beddy (Johnston) Dunn, having settled in this county the preceding year. Here his father, who was born in Jones county, Ga., in 1800, built what is known as the Greeneville road. He was the son of Alexander and Beddy (O'Neal) Dunn, the former a native of Maryland and a soldier of the revolutionary war, who, after residing in Jones county for a considerable time, removed to Chambers county, Ala., where he passed the closing years of his life. The wife of William Dunn was the daughter of David Johnston, an early settler of Jasper county, Ga. The son, J. D. Dunn, was reared upon the farm, with the few advantages for education of that early period. In 1850 he moved into Woodbury, Meriwether Co., where he, having learned the trade of carriage and buggy making, engaged in that business. In 1861 he enlisted in the militia under Capt. Frank Strozier, and was elected adjutant. After the war Mr. Dunn returned to his business in Woodbury, and has a large establishment and thriving trade—carriage building. He is also a skillful house carpenter, and has done some marvelously fine work in that line. The Robert E. Lee institute at Thomaston, Upson Co., now a college of considerable note, is a monument of his mechanical skill. Mr. Dunn is a man of varied talents; he has been justice of the peace for eighteen years, winning the esteem of all with whom he has been concerned; has been a member of the democratic executive committee for the past two years, and withal has found time to oversee the affairs of his large and beautiful farm in the vicinity of Woodbury, and prove himself a practical farmer. He is a member of the Odd Fellows and the masonic fraternity. In 1848 Mr. Dunn married Miss Catherine F. Findley, daughter of Riley and Catherine (Oliver) Findley, who were early settlers of this county, in which Mrs. Dunn was born Dec. 14, 1831. Mr. Dunn and his wife are both active members of the Missionary Baptist church; they were blessed with two children: John D. and Kittie P. On Jan. 5, 1891, Mr. Dunn was bereft of his wife by death.

WILLIAM R. EDGE, a prosperous citizen of this county, has passed through many vicissitudes in the years of his life. He is the son of Joseph and Margaret (Flint) Edge, the former born in Wilkes county in 1803, and died in Meriwether county in 1886; his father, Nehemiah Edge, a South Carolinian, was one of the earliest settlers of Wilkes county. Here in 1826 William R. was born and here he passed his boyhood, obtaining such education as he was able to do in his country home. Later he began working for himself at the rate of seven dollars per month, at which rate he worked for three years; then he was overseer for a time, after which he went into the milling business. He fell a victim to the "gold fever," and spent some time in California in search of that much-sought mineral. He served also through the war, enlisting in 1862 in Company B, First Georgia cavalry, under Capt. J. W. Trammell; he was in the battle at Philadelphia and was in all the engagements during the memorable "march to the sea," being in those forces before Sherman all the way. Since the war he has been engaged in several different kinds of business, but has been especially successful in farming, as his large and beautiful and well-kept plantation on the Flint river bears witness. Mr. Edge married in 1855 his wife, Miss Catherine Boyd, being the daughter of Milton and Jane (Douglass) Boyd, of South Carolina, who came to Georgia in 1830. One daughter, Emma C., was born to Mr. and Mrs. Edge; she is now the wife of W. P. Lovelace. Mrs. Edge died in 1875 and in 1877 Mr. Edge married Mrs. Amanda (Miller) Knowles, a daughter of Jacob and Mary (Lovelace) Miller, of Wilkes county. Mrs. Edge is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church; her husband is a member of the masonic fraternity.

LEWIS EDWARDS, a well-known and esteemed farmer of Meriwether county, is of Virginian ancestry, his grandfather, Henry Edwards, being a native of Virginia and a soldier, a sharpshooter, during the revolutionary war. Soon after the war he migrated with his family to Georgia and settled in Clarke county. His wife was Mary Woodson, an orphaned English girl who, on account of the harsh laws and cruelly severe penalties of those days, was obliged to leave the country for the simple act of plucking a bunch of grapes. Their son, Lewis H. Edwards, was born in 1812 and died in 1884. He married Mildred Lane, a daughter of Benjamin and Sarah Lane, also natives of Virginia, and old residents of Georgia. In 1837 Mr. Edwards moved to Meriwether county, where in 1848 his son Lewis was born, and reared upon the homestead farm. His early privileges of education were limited to those of the common country school, and these were much impaired by the onset of the war. With the return of peace he too returned to his Georgia home, and in the peaceful pursuits of agriculture soon forgot the toils and dangers of war. He has made a success of his calling, owning now a beautiful and well cultivated farm of 260 acres and enjoying the respect of the entire community. His fellow citizens have thrown on him the responsibilities of the position of justice of the peace. In 1872 Mr. Edwards married Miss Mary Estes, a daughter of John W. and Martha (Fuller) Estes, the former a native of South Carolina, who came to Georgia many years ago, where, in Meriwether county, he is a prominent farmer. Mrs. Edwards was born in this county in 1844, and she is a member of the Missionary Baptist church. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Edwards has been blessed with three children: John L., Lucy and Marietta.

W. F. FLORENCE, one of the prosperous agriculturists of this county, is of Virginia stock, both his grandfathers, who had served with bravery in the revolutionary war, having settled in Georgia the early part of this century. His father, William Florence, was born in Washington county, Aug. 11, 1805, and his mother, Millie A. (Arnett) Florence, was born in Virginia, Jan. 2, 1808. In 1838 their son, W. F. Florence, was born in Wilkes county, and the next year the family moved to Meriwether county, which became their permanent home. Mr. Florence is now occupying the house his father built for his family the years preceding the removal. In those days educational opportunities were very limited, but young Florence made the best of such as fell to his lot. In 1861 he enlisted in the army, enlisting in Company B, Second Georgia regiment, under Capt. W. T. Harris. He took part in a number of the most important engagements of the war, Manassas, seven days before Richmond, Fredericksburg, Harper's Ferry, Hagerstown and Gettysburg. He buried Col. Harris, who was killed at Gettysburg; he himself was wounded at the battle of Seven Pines and was carried bleeding off the field; at Shepherdstown he received a wound in the arm—in fact was wounded at four different times during the war; in the battle of Chickamauga his arm was badly shattered, but he heroically held out to the end of the war in 1865, and returned home to begin life for himself, and with no money. By energy and industry Mr. Florence soon began to win his way and accumulate money, buying his first land in 1867, to which he had been able to add since, so that he now owns a large and productive farm and is comfortably established, possessing also the true respect of all who know him; has been for some time bailiff of his district. Oct. 30, 1873, he married Miss Mary J. Russell, whose parents, John and Mary A. (Cappleman) Russell, natives of South Carolina, were among the early settlers of the state. Mrs. Florence was born in this county in December, 1846. She is a worthy member of the Baptist church, while her husband is a Presbyterian. He also belongs to the Masonic fraternity. Mr. and Mrs. Florence have five children: Lottie, Hugh, Lena, James and Dosia.

DAVID FREEMAN is another of the tillers of the soil of Meriwether county, who by industry and uprightness have attained prosperity. He is a grandson of James and Rebecca (Rymes) Freeman, the former a native of Tennessee, but who passed the greater part of his life in the city of Rome, Ga. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. His son, J. C., was born in Clinton, Jones Co., Ga., in 1819, and married Miss Amanda Neal, a daughter of James and Mary (Rucker) Neal, the former a native of Warren county, Ga., and a soldier of the revolution. Mr. Freeman moved to Meriwether county in 1848; he served during the late war in the state militia, and has represented his district, Griffin district, in congress. His son, David Freeman, was born in Zebulon, Pike Co., in 1847; he has passed not only his early years, but those of manhood also, on the farm in Meriwether county, still residing in the old homestead, and within sight of one of the first houses built in the county, which is a part of his property. The Flint river, on whose borders his plantation lies, is here somewhat shallow, which gives the place its name, "Flat Shoals." In the old Flat Shoals college young Freeman obtained a part of his education, which he completed in Griffin. He has been more fortunate than many in the respect of excellent educational opportunities. As a farmer and a man of business he has been prospered and is well respected by all.

W. F. GAY is one of those citizens of Meriwether county who may point with pride to patriotic ancestry, two of his great-grandfathers having served with valor in the revolutionary struggle. Some time after the war the son of one of these men, Benjamin Gay, brought his wife, Mrs. Ann (Gay) Gay, from their native state, North Carolina, to settle in Georgia. Their son, Columbus Gay, married Miss Martha Sasser, a daughter of William and Elizabeth (Beverly) Sasser. The father of the former served through the revolution under Gen. Washington, and to the day of his death bore on his head the scars of several wounds received in that war. This family was also of North Carolina nativity, but William Sasser came to Georgia early in the century and settled in Monroe county. The move being made in mid-winter, with the ground frozen, and the settlement in the woods, much suffering and privation was entailed upon the settlers while, with the aid of kind neighbors, they constructed a home. Mr. Sasser served in the war of 1812, and in 1829 transferred his family to Meriwether county and again created a home in the wilderness. In these days of comfort, with the countless conveniences of modern life, it is hard to realize what our predecessors of one or two generations had to endure. Around this lonely home towered the primeval forest, in whose shadows lurked the timid deer and the ravenous wolf. Many a night were the slumbers of the pioneer family broken, and their hearts filled with fear, by the hideous and terrifying howls of the wolves. Many a morning saw their stock of sheep, pigs or calves diminished as the result of these marauding visits. Neighbors were distant and privileges few. For years they rode fifteen miles for the purpose of attending church. Mr. Sasser, desiring to increase the educational facilities for his own and his neighbor's children, gave two acres of land for the purpose of erecting an academy. The son of Columbus and Martha (Sasser) Gay, W. F. Gay, was born here in 1850. He passed his early years on the farm, but received a good education, and has developed a very fine business talent, as well as cultivating his farm with great success. For twelve years he has resided at Gay, carrying on a thriving mercantile trade. The respect in which he is held by his fellow-citizens is evinced by the responsibilities they have laid upon him. He has been county bailiff, justice of the peace, and for the last six years county commissioner. His wife was Miss Anna Culpepper, daughter of Charles and Jane (English) Culpepper, old settlers of Coweta county, and natives of South Carolina. Mr. Culpepper was a soldier in the late war. Mrs. Gay was born in Coweta county in 1849, and is a member of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. and Mrs. Gay were married in 1869, and their union has been blessed with eleven children: John, Emma, Lula, Mattie, Henry, Leila, Joe, Dallie, Ben, Bessie and Iva.

COL. HENRY P. HARRIS, one of Georgia's illustrious sons, is of Scotch-Irish ancestry, descended from one of the seven brothers who came to America early in the history of the colonies, and who were the progenitors of this family in this country. His grandfather, Absalom Harris, was born in Virginia, and in 1795 removed with his family to Georgia, settling in Hancock county. His son, Henry, born in Virginia in 1781, married Miss Mary Sasnett, daughter of Richard Sasnett, an early settler of Georgia from North Carolina, and a lineal descendant of Gov. Borden, the colonial governor of North Carolina. Henry R., the son of Henry and Mary (Sasnett) Harris, was born in Hancock county in 1828, and in 1830 his father removed with his family to Meriwether county and settled on a plantation near Greenville. Here young Harris grew to manhood, receiving his primary education in the school at Greenville. One of his first teachers was Hon. Lyman Trumbull, later member of congress, and now at the head of the bar in Chicago. Later Mr. Harris completed a successful course at Emory college, and is one of the most accomplished among the graduates of that noble institution, where he fitted himself for the distinguished positions he has since been called upon to fill. In 1872 he was elected to represent his district in congress, in which office he was continued for six years, the last two of which he was a member of the ways and means committee. In 1884 he was elected for another term, and was appointed by John G. Carlisle to the same important committee—ways and means. At the close of this term of office he was appointed third assistant postmaster-general, under President Cleveland, and discharged the duties of this office with honor and fidelity. Since his return from Washington Col. Harris has lived in comparative retirement upon his plantation, engaged in his private affairs, and in thoughtful consideration and earnest effort for the interests of the Wesleyan Female college and La Grange Female college—he being a member of the board of trustees of each of these institutions. The positions of responsibility and influence to which Mr. Harris has been called are indicative of the respect in which he is held, and he is equally well liked by all who know him. Early in life, in 1847, Mr. Harris married Miss Eliza Gresham, whose parents, Albert Y. and (Wells) Gresham, natives of Virginia, were early settlers of Clarke county, Ga., where Mrs. Harris was born in 1830. Mrs. Harris, a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, died in 1880, leaving her husband with six children: Mary, Henry R., Ella, Fannie, Lena, and Albert Y. In 1886 Col. Harris married Miss Kate Moses, whose parents, S. Preston and Lizzie (Tucker) Moses, natives of South Carolina, were for a long period residents of Washington, D. C., where Mr. Moses died in 1883, and where his widow still resides. Mrs. Harris was born in 1854, in Olympia, Wash., where her father was collector of customs. Col. and Mrs. Harris are both active workers of the Methodist Episcopal church south, of which they are worthy members. Col. Harris is also an honored member of the masonic fraternity.

HIRAM WARNER HILL is a native of this county, in which his father, Alexander Franklin Hill, a successful planter, was for many years a resident. The family are among the pioneers of the state, to which Mr. Hill's grandparents came from North Carolina, in the latter part of the last century. Wiley Hill settled in Wilkes county, and there in 1800 their son, Burwell P., was born; he married Martha Pope Johnson, and their son, Alexander Franklin Hill, was born in the same county in 1831; he died in 1888. His wife was Miss Mary J. Warner, a daughter of Hiram and Sarah (Abercrobie) Warner, the former eminent, not only among the citizens of his own state, but of his country, occupying as he did, the elevated and responsible office of chief justice of Georgia. He was born in the state of Massachusetts in 1802, his parents being Obadiah and Jane Warner, natives of that state, the former a son of Joshua Warner, the latter a daughter of Capt. Coffin of Martha's Vineyard. From this patriotic and honorable ancestry was descended Judge Warner, who in his early manhood, in 1821, made a home in Georgia, where his death occurred in 1881. His grandson and namesake, Hiram Warner Hill, was born in 1858 of this brave and honorable race. During his boyhood, passed on the farm, he attended the schools of Greenville, Ga., and afterward Emory college, later taking a law course at Harvard university, from which he received his degree in 1881, and returned home to begin the practice of his profession. In this he has been very successful and is highly esteemed; he has for eight successive years (since 1886) been elected to represent his county in the state legislature, which responsibility he has borne with honor to himself and satisfaction to his constituency. During four years of this time he was chairman of the general judiciary committee of the house. In 1884 Mr. Hill married Miss Lena Harris, a daughter of Henry R. and Eliza A. (Gresham) Harris. Hr. Harris, a native of Hancock county, has been a very influential man in his state, for which he served during the late war as colonel. He was for six years a member of congress, and three years third assistant postmaster-general of the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Hill are both active and faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and Mr. Hill is an honored member of the masonic fraternity. They have been blessed with six children: H. W., Jr.; Eliza; A. F.; Lena; Mary, and Henry R. Lena died in 1893, and Henry in 1895.

A. J. HINTON, one of the well-known and esteemed citizens of Meriwether county, of which he is a native, was born in August, 1841. His grandfather, John Hinton, a soldier of the revolution, shortly after that war came with his wife, Huldah, from North Carolina, their native state, to Georgia. Here in Wilkes county, where they had settled, their son Jesse was born in 1802, and spent his early years, marrying Miss Clara Wells, a daughter of William and Sallie Wells, natives of the same county. Mr. Hinton was an industrious and energetic man, and a prosperous farmer, and his son A. J. has inherited those valuable qualities. His early years were passed upon the farm, his first steps in the pathway to knowledge being made by the way of the old log school house of his district, after which he attended Griffin college. Before he had attained his majority the war broke out, and in 1862 he enlisted in Company K, Fifty-fifth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Milton P. Tucker. During the time that he was connected with this regiment he was not in any battle, but, his term of enlistment having expired, he returned home, and then re-enlisted, going out as captain of Company B, Ninth Georgia regiment. In this company he was in many battles, among them Atlanta and the fall of Savannah. Capt. Hinton shared in the poverty of his men, and the southern forces in general, and returned penniless from the war, and for several years engaged in farming. In 1873 he was elected clerk of the court, and, therefore, moved into Greeneville; he served two terms as clerk, and in 1877 was elected ordinary, to which office he has been re-elected every term since, which fact has well attested his faithfulness and efficiency in the duties of his office. Capt. Hinton married in 1859 Miss Sudie Findley, the daughter of Emanuel and Elizabeth (McLaughlin) Findley, the former a native of Jasper county, who came to this county in 1833. Mrs. Hinton was born in this county in 1843 and died in 1875, leaving to her husband two children, Laurena and Jesse L. In 1887 he married Miss Palma Walker, born in Upson county in 1855. Her parents, Hudson and Frances (Dardin) Walker, some years ago moved from Georgia to Texas, and later Mr. Walker returning to make a visit to his daughter, was taken with the yellow fever in New Orleans and died. Mr. and Mrs. Hinton are faithful and consistent Christians, the former a member of the Missionary Baptist church, the latter belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Hinton is also an honored member of the masonic order.

W. S. HOWELL, an attorney of distinguished ability of Meriwether county, belongs to one of the pioneer families of the state, to which his great-grandfather with five brothers came from North Carolina in the last century. Four of the brothers drifted on with the tide of emigration, but one other remained in Georgia. He was McKinney Howell, one of the earliest settlers of Greene county. His wife was Mary Johnson, and their son, Matthew C. Howell, was born in Greene county in 1812. He married Sarah Simonton, and they also made their home in Greene county, as did their son, Samuel A. Howell. The latter married Georgia Ely, a daughter of John W. and Virginia (Baugh) Ely, also residents of Greene county. Mr. Ely was born in North Carolina in 1799. His father, Michael Ely, came to Greene county, Ga., in 1814, where for many years he kept a public inn. The son served in the war of 1836, fought under Gen. Scott, and died in 1885. W. S. Howell, the son of Samuel A. and Georgia (Ely) Howell, was born in Greene county, Jan. 11, 1859, and being reared upon the farm, obtained his first training in the country school; he added to this a course at Dawson institute, White Plains, and finally graduated from Mercer university, Macon, Ga., in 1882. He went to Greeneville and taught for four years, beginning the study of law, to which he devoted himself under the wise supervision of Maj. J. W. Parks, and in 1889 was admitted to the bar. The young attorney has continued in the practice of his profession ever since with ever increasing success. He also carries on a thriving farm, and is a man of high standing among his fellow-citizens. In 1885 Mr. Howell married Miss Hattie Kilpatrick, born in White Plains in 1862, daughter of J. H. and Cornelia (Hall) Kilpatrick; the father was a minister, and president of the Baptist convention of 1894. One child, Cornelia H., was given to Mr. and Mrs. Howell; the latter died in 1886. In 1889 Mr. Howell married Miss Annie Davidson, daughter of Monroe and Reginia (Park) Davidson; the father served in the late war under Gen. Evans. Mrs. Howell was born in Meriwether county in 1866; she is a graduate of Mary Sharp college, Winchester, Tenn. She and Mr. Howell are both members of the Missionary Baptist church. Two children have blessed this union: Samuel M. and William S.

JOHN R. JONES, one of the oldest and a very highly esteemed citizen of Meriwether county, Ga., son of John and Catharine (Dunn) Jones, was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1800. His grandfather was a native of Virginia and his father was born in that state, where he came to Georgia and settled in Columbia county late in the last century, where he ended his days. His maternal grandfather, Richard Dunn, was a native of Virginia, was a soldier during the revolutionary war, was a farmer and came to Georgia, becoming one of the early settlers of Columbia county. Mr. Jones was given such an education as was afforded by the schools of the locality of the time, and was raised a farmer, a vocation he has followed all his life, realizing a fortune. No citizen in Meriwether county is held in higher esteem by its citizens, in fact is revered by them so estimable is his character. Mr. Jones was married in 1828 to Miss Elizabeth, born in Jasper county, Ga., April 5, 1811, daughter of James and Ondia Davis. He was a native of Virginia, came to Georgia when a young man, married and raised a family, was a captain in the Indian war, and died in Harris county. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Jones, four survive: Charles G., Catharine, William C. and Harriet. Mrs. Jones was an exemplary member of the Missionary Baptist church, and died Dec. 28, 1882. Mr. Jones has been a remarkably industrious man; has always been a generous giver to the poor and to religious organizations, and is now living with his children. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and of the Missionary Baptist church.

JOHN O. JONES, an enterprising farmer of Meriwether county, is one of those who may look back with pride upon a brave and patriotic ancestry; both of his grandfathers having served in the revolution. His grandparents, John and Agnes (Ready) Jones, were Virginians who settled in this state early in the century, where, in Morgan county, their son, A. J. Jones, was born. They afterward removed to Mississippi, and there, in 1852, Mr. Jones died, full of years and honors. The wife of A. J. Jones was Miss Mary Dark, whose parents were early settlers of Meriwether county, in which county her son, John O. Jones, was born in 1841, and reared upon the farm, receiving only the limited education common in those days in the country schools. In 1861 he enlisted in Company D, Capt. Howard, Eighth Georgia regiment, and was in the first battle of Manassas, and afterward in many others. As was the common lot of most of the Georgian troops, Mr. Jones returned from the war with empty pockets, and to a region made desolate by the passage of hostile armies, to begin life anew. But with the natural courage and resolution of his character he at once set to work at the first thing which presented itself—hauling lumber from Senoia to Atlanta, and with the money thus earned laid the foundation of his present fortune—purchasing land and developing his fine and valuable farm. In 1865 Mr. Jones married Miss Lizzie Glass, a native of Meriwether county, born in 1843; she is the daughter of James B. and Mary (Clower) Glass, the former a native of Jasper county, who came to this county in his boyhood, where he died in 1862. Mr. and Mrs. Jones are both members of the Missionary Baptist church. They have five children: James A., John H., William R., R. A. and Alma M., and the family is well known and esteemed in the community.

D. M. LASSETTER belongs to the pioneer stock of this section, his parents, Hardy and Elizabeth (Keith) Lassetter being both natives of the state, the former born in 1780, in the wilderness where at that early date his privileges were but few, his hardships many. Mrs. Lassetter's father, David Keith, was also a pioneer of the state and a soldier of the war of 1812. D. M. Lassetter was born in Monroe county, Oct. 27, 1830, and in 1836 came with his parents to Meriwether county. His schooling was limited to that obtainable in the little log school-house of those early days. In 1862 Mr. Lassetter enlisted in Company B of the Thirteenth Georgia regiment, under Capt. McCalley, and was wounded June 27, 1862, in the seven days' fight at Cold Harbor; he was sent home to recover and there took the smallpox, which left him blind for a time, and, indeed, he only regained the sight of one eye; as soon as he could see somewhat he went back to the army, but was rejected for active service, and given post duty, at which he served until the surrender. Upon the return of Mr. Lassetter from the war he undertook farming in Coweta county, having nothing to start with, but was unsuccessful; his natural abilities seemed more to fit him for a business career, and in 1866 he engaged in the mercantile business at Luthersville with Nat Teagle; in 1878 he purchased Mr. Teagle's interest, since which time he has carried on the business alone, constantly increasing his trade, which has become very large and lucrative. Mr. Lassetter is a member of the masonic order and a man of desirable position in the community where he is widely known and respected. In 1870 Mr. Lassetter married Miss Sallie F. Norris, daughter of William P. and Narcissa (Respass) Norris, early settlers of Meriwether county. Her death occurred a few years after; she was a member of the Primitive Baptist church. In 1881 Mr. Lassetter married Miss Carrie Nall, born in this county in 1852, a daughter of J. W. and Martha (Worthan) Nall, and a member of the Missionary church.

H. B. LEVERETT is a citizen of wealth and influence of this county, of which he is a native, born in 1845. He is the grandson of a revolutionary soldier, Robert Leverett, whose wife was Sidney Bailey, and who moved from Maryland, his native state, to South Carolina, where his son, Manuel, was born. In 1825 he moved to Wilkes county, Ga., and later to Alabama, which he made his final home. Manuel Leverett, who served in the late war, married Miss Cynthia Lanier, whose father, Jas. Lanier, a native of Maryland, was also a revolutionary soldier, and with his wife, Mary Lanier, settled in Jasper county, Ga. H. B. Leverett passed his boyhood on the farm with the limited educational advantages of those days, and while yet a youth, in March, 1862, enlisted for the war. He entered company K of the Thirty-fourth Alabama regiment under Capt. Crowder and fought in many battles: Munfordville, Ky.; Danville, Ky.; Murfreesboro; Tul-

Iahoma; Kennesaw Mountain; Columbia; Dalton; Atlanta; Jonesboro; Chickamauga; Chattanooga; Missionary Ridge; Resaca; Franklin; Nashville; Kingston and Bentonville. In the last named engagement he was badly wounded, being shot through the shoulder. Mr. Leverett returned from the war not only without a cent of money, but to find himself without a home, his parents being both dead. For some time he sought employment, and at last was engaged by Mr. Hannah to aid in the construction of a mill. In 1866 he rented a farm and soon, by unflagging energy, by diligence and economy, was on the highway to success, and he is now the owner of a large and fine plantation, and in possession of the esteem of all who know him. In December, 1866, Mr. Leverett married Miss Joyce Hutchinson, the daughter of Raymond R. and Lucinda (Lankford) Hutchinson, formerly of Marion county, later of Upson county, but now of Meriwether county. Mr. Hutchinson served in the late war. Mrs. Leverett was born in Marion county in 1846, and in 1861 moved to this county with her father. Mr. and Mrs. Leverett have three children: Lavonia, Annie May and Joyce H. The parents are both devoted members of the Missionary Baptist church. Mr. Leverett is also a member of the order of Masons.

W. P. LOVELACE, a successful agriculturist of this region, is a Georgian by birth, born in Troup county in 1849. His parents were John and Martha (Embry) Lovelace, the former a native of North Carolina, born in 1826, who came to Georgia in 1841; he served through the late war with the state militia; he was a son of Amos and Tabitha (Tomlinson) Lovelace, North Carolinians, the father a soldier in the revolutionary war. Mrs. Lovelace was a daughter of Hezekiah Embry, a pioneer of Wilkes county. W. P. Lovelace, owing to the restricted opportunities of his boyhood, obtained but a limited education, of which, however, he has made excellent use. Although but a mere lad he served during the latter part of the war under Capt. Sledge. Mr. Lovelace is a man of remarkable energy and persistence of character, as is evident from the story of his life. He was master of the shoe business, but after a time established himself in the mercantile business, at Rome, Ga., and carried this on for several years, but in the panic of 1874 he was driven to the wall, and failed. Not discouraged, he at once went to work again, and was soon carrying on a large tannery worth some $16,000; but this was at length destroyed by fire; yet again, undismayed, he went bravely to work and has for the third time accumulated a fortune, carrying on a fine and well cultivated farm in this county, to which he came in 1882. In 1872 Mr. Lovelace married Miss Emma C. Edge, a native of Meriwether county, born in 1855; she is a daughter of William and Catherine (Boyd) Edge, the former an early settler of the state who served through the war. Mr. and Mrs. Lovelace are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and their union has been blessed with seven children: John W., Lewis E., Mattie B., Thomas E., Nellie M., Lillian C. and Lois C.

O. W. M'GEHEE is a well-known and very successful farmer of this county, where he was born in 1843. He belongs to one of the pioneer families of the state, his grandparents, Samuel and Nancy (Tate) McGehee, natives of Virginia, having been among the earliest settlers of Elbert county, Ga. Here their son, Thomas L., was born, who settled in Meriwether county in 1827; his wife was Miss Sarah K. Martin, a daughter of Marshall and Jennie (Oliver) Martin, natives of Wilkes county, who came to this county in 1828, where Mr. Martin died in 1856. Mr. Martin was a man of wealth and of a prominent family, his father, George Martin, having served with honor in the war of the revolution. The son of Thomas L. and Sarah K. McGehee, O. W. McGehee, in his boyhood on the farm had but limited educational opportunities, of which, however, he made good use. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F of the Forty-first Georgia regiment, under Capt. S. D. Clemmens, and served with bravery in many battles: Perryville, Murfreesboro, siege of Vicksburg, and the battles around Atlanta. In 1863 Mr. McGehee was discharged and returned to his Georgian home to make his own way in the world. He engaged at once in the tillage of the soil, to which pursuit he has ever since devoted himself, and has been duly prospered. He is a man of large wealth and influence, who commands the respect of all who know him. In 1868 Mr. McGehee married Miss Ophelia E. Hall, a daughter of Alexander and Elizabeth (Brown) Hall, the father a very prominent citizen of this county, but a native of Virginia. Mrs. McGehee is a native of this county, born in 1845, and she and Mr. McGehee are both devoted and consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal church. He is also a member of the order of Masons. They have four children: Sarah, Lena, Joseph T. A., and John O.

W. M. McLUDEN, a prosperous farmer of Meriwether county, in which he was born in 1843, is the son of William and Judith (Fuller) McLuden. His father was born in Wilkes county in 1808, whence he moved to Alabama, and then returned to Georgia, and after a brief residence in Talbot county made his permanent home in Meriwether county. His parents were Frank and Judith (Burford) McLuden, the former an early pioneer of the state, and a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. McLuden's mother was the daughter of Green Fuller, also a pioneer of the state, and a soldier in the war of 1812, and in the Indian war of 1836. Young McLuden passed his boyhood on the farm, with but few opportunities of obtaining an education—only such as were afforded in the old log school-house. When his state joined the Confederacy, the young man, with boyish enthusiasm, was the first to run up a Confederate flag on its staff in Meriwether county. Although not out of his teens he hastened to enlist in 1861, entering the Eight Georgia regiment, Company D. He had a remarkable series of adventures and some narrow escapes, as may be presumed from the fact that seven bullets passed through his clothing during the battles in which he was engaged; he fought in the first battle of Manassas, at Fredericksburg, and at Gettysburg. In the last memorable conflict he lost one of his legs. He was captured but retaken by his own forces. On being captured a second time he was not so fortunate, and was a prisoner fifteen months. Returning home penniless he worked for two years at carriage building, and with the money saved bought his first land in 1868; he has since then given his exclusive attention to the cultivation of his farm, which is in a thriving condition, giving evidence of hard work and diligent care. In 1883 Mr. McLuden married Miss Alice Thompson, a native of Pike county, the daughter of John C. and Margaret (Burt) Thompson, natives of the state, the former a soldier in the late war. Mr. and Mrs. McLuden have been blessed with three children: Leon, Irene, and Amerot. Mr. McLuden is a member of the Missionary Baptist church.

C. F. McWILLIAMS, one of the foremost business men of Luthersville, was born in Coweta county, Jan. 31, 1861. He is the son of Andrew J. and Incy (Walthal) McWilliams, and a grandson of Andrew E. and Sarah E. (McGowen) McWilliams, who emigrated to America from Dublin, Ireland, and the former of whom served in the war of 1812, in which he was slain. He left a large family, one of whom, a daughter, still resides in the old home which he built, where her mother carried on the practice of medicine after the old fashion, in which pursuit she was engaged until her death at the age of ninety-eight years, and has done much to alleviate the ills of suffering humanity, especially of the feminine portion thereof. She is one of two sisters and eight brothers. One brother, John McWilliams, assisted in landing the cotton in New Orleans from which Gen. Andrew Jackson's famous breastworks were built. The maternal grandparent of C. F. McWilliams was John H. Walthal, who married a Miss Morgan. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Young McWilliams was reared on the farm in Coweta county, and received a fair common school education, completing his course in the schools of Luthersville in 1879. The next year he engaged as clerk for Nat Teagle of Luthersville, and after eight years of faithful service was able to buy out Mr. Teagle's business, and has ever since carried the business on for himself at the same place, and by steady application he has gone on to prosperity. Mr. McWilliams married, Nov. 21, 1887, Miss Ada Teagle, born in 1871, in Meriwether county. She is the daughter of Nat and Fannie (Darde) Teagle, who were warmly devoted adherents of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Teagle was chairman of the building committee of that church in Luthersville, and for more than a score of years the largest contributor to its financial support, long before he was a member of it. Mr. Teagle was a soldier in the late war and died in 1889. Mr. and Mrs. McWilliams are also faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They have two daughters: Irene and Ruby.

J. C. MAFFETT, an honored citizen of Meriwether county, of which he is a native, was born in 1845. He is of Scotch ancestry, his grandfather having been a native of Scotland, who settled in South Carolina, and served his adopted country in the revolutionary war. His son, Ephraim C., left his native state, South Carolina, and settled in Meriwether county when that county was but two years old. His wife, Sarah (Blair) Maffett, was a daughter of a pioneer of Tennessee, George Blair. J. C. Maffett is the son of Ephraim C. and Sarah Maffett, and passed his youth on the farm, but received a good education. In 1864, with the ardor of his years, he enlisted, joining Company B, First Georgia cavalry, under Capt. J. W. Trammell; he took part in a number of engagements: Resaca, Macon, Kingston and Aiken. After his return at the close of the war Mr. Maffett being without money, began work for himself on the farm, to which employment he gave himself with his natural energy, and prospered accordingly. But his fellow-citizens demanded of him special service and elected him to the office of sheriff, which by continued re-election he has held ever since—fourteen years in all—an evidence of his peculiar fitness for the position and the faithful fulfillment of his duties. He is a man widely known throughout this part of Georgia, and as well esteemed as known. In 1872 Mr. Maffett married Miss Antoinette Blalock, daughter of John and Elizabeth (Leverett) Blalock of Georgia; Mr. Blalock had served as sheriff of the county during the war. Mrs. Maffett was a member of the Presbyterian church. She was born in this county in 1848 and died in 1884, leaving to her husband three little daughters: Lillian, Mary and Alice K. Mr. Maffett married in 1884 Mrs. Ida (Floyd) Nelson, daughter of Dr. A. G. and Mary (Slaughter) Floyd. Dr. Floyd was a very prominent figure in the business and political affairs of this region for many years, and for fourteen years was clerk of the courts. The second Mrs. Maffett died in 1890, leaving her husband a son, Robert P. Mr. and Mrs. Maffett were both worthy members of the Presbyterian church; Mr. Maffett is also a member of the masonic order.

L. J. MILAM, a prosperous Meriwether county farmer, is a native of Lawrence county, S. C., born in 1825, a son of John and Sallie (Fuller) Milam. The father was a Virginian, who came to South Carolina at the age of twenty-one; he served in the war of 1812, during which period he took the yellow fever at Charleston, but he recovered and lived to a ripe old age. His parents were also Virginians, who made the home of their later years in South Carolina. Mrs. Sallie (Fuller) Milam was a daughter of Isam Fuller, a native of North Carolina, who settled in South Carolina. Young L. J. Milam was reared on the South Carolina farm and enjoyed but meager school privileges. The school house of logs, as was then common, not only was floorless, but also without chimney. Consequently, as the fire was built in the middle of the house, after the fashion of an Indian wigwam, the pupils were often almost suffocated by the smoke. Mr. Milam made agriculture his chosen calling and by assiduity in its pursuit has made it a success. Some years ago he came to Meriwether county, Ga., and established himself upon a farm near Jones' Mill, in which place for twelve years he also carried on a profitable mercantile establishment, but though successful in this, his chief interest has always centered in his farm. During the war he served for a short time in the state militia. Mr. Milam is one who by his steadfast uprightness in all the relations of life wins the true respect of all who come to know him. His marriage occurred in January, 1846, his wife being Miss Mary J. Workman, a daughter of Hugh and Mary (Taylor) Workman, both of South Carolina, but of Irish parentage. Mrs. Milam was born Aug. 29, 1827, and was reared upon the farm in South Carolina, where her parents lived and died. Both she and her husband were honored members of the Methodist Episcopal church. She died on Oct. 9, 1890. Mr. and Mrs. Milam were blessed with ten children: Oscar L., Mary A., Sarah J., Robert H., Irena, Emilia A., Irvin and Margaret A. Oscar L., the first child born, and Ferril A., the third, died in South Carolina, and the fourth, Lafayette L., was murdered in Arkansas, Sept. 9, 1893. Mr. Milam was married the second time, July 24, 1894, to Lucretia G. McCrary, a daughter of Willis and Maria L. (Gary) Wallis, of Lawrence, S. C.

J. C. NORRIS is one of the progressive farmers and a native of Meriwether county, Ga. He was born in 1843, and his parents, W. P. and Narcissa (Respass) Norris, belonged to the pioneer stock of Georgia; the father settled in this county in 1828, his parents having come from Virginia; and Mrs. Norris' father, Churchwell Respass, also was an early settler. To the son, J. C. Norris, who was reared upon the farm, only such privileges of education were afforded as were to be obtained in the common country schools of that day. When the war broke out in 1861, though not yet out of his teens, he responded to the call for volunteers and enlisted in Company B, Thirteenth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Walter Ector. He served in many of the most important engagements of the war, as Savannah, second battle of Manassas, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Winchester, Sharpsburg and Harper's Ferry. In the battle of Sharpsburg he was wounded. In 1864 he married Miss Sallie F. Perdue, daughter of Lindsay and Parmelia (Perdue) Perdue, who are old settlers of the state, natives of Virginia. The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Norris, a number of whom are living: Lorena, Sallie, Joca, Annie, Claudie L., Laura K., Ravie, Garrouch and Azie L. Mr. and Mrs. Norris are members of the Primitive Baptist church, and are well known and highly respected members of the community.

J. F. OGLETREE, an agriculturist of Meriwether county whose success has been almost phenomenal, and whose life has been full of vicissitudes, is a native of the county, born in 1840, and is the son of Philemon and Eliza A. (Glynn) Ogletree. The former was born in Wilkes county in 1792, served in the Indian war of 1836, and moved to Meriwether county in 1839. He was an earnest preacher of the gospel as well as a successful farmer, and was of Scotch descent, his father, William Ogletree, having accompanied his own father, William Ogletree, the elder, when he came from Scotland to America in 1750. They settled first in Virginia, but soon made their home in Wilkes county, Ga., being among the earliest pioneers, not only of the county, but of the state. The younger William served in the war of the revolution and married Miss Elizabeth Bird. The wife of Philemon Ogletree was a daughter of William and Elizabeth (Crawford) Glynn, the latter a sister of William H. Crawford, a man eminent in the early annals of the state, and indeed throughout the south, being upheld throughout this region as the presidential candidate in the exciting election of 1824, when, because no candidate had a majority of the electoral votes, the choice of president was referred to the house of representatives, and John Quincy Adams was chosen. J. F. Ogletree received his early training in the country school, but later attended Bowdon institute, from which he was obliged to return because of his father's failing health. In June, 1862, Mr. Ogletree enlisted in Company F, Forty-first Georgia regiment, under Capt. A. D. Abraham, and later with Capt. S. D. Clemens. His service during the war was irregular. It was at this period of his life that misfortunes came most thickly upon Mr. Ogletree. The war not only freed his negroes, but through it he lost three-fourths of his large estate; he had been considered the wealthiest man in the county, and about this time every building upon his place was blown down by a violent gale. Nevertheless by vigorous and persistent effort he has been able to recover himself, and is again one of the wealthiest and most highly esteemed men in this region. He engaged in mercantile business at La Grange in 1870, but after two years returned to his farm; this is an immense plantation of some 2,000 acres of rich and highly cultivated land surrounding his lovely country residence. Beside this he owns a large stock farm of some 8,000 acres in southwest Georgia, on the Flint river. A part of this large tract he has devoted to horticulture, in which he is greatly interested, having a thriving peach orchard of 10,000 trees. In 1862 Mr. Ogletree married Miss Caroline Stinson, a daughter of J. W. and M. L. (Jackson) Stinson, the former a North Carolinian who settled in Meriwether county in 1820, where, in 1842, his daughter Caroline was born. She was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and she died Jan. 19, 1870. In 1871 Mr. Ogletree married Miss L. E. Stinson, whose parents were M. F. and M. A. (Hardaway) Stinson. Mr. Stinson came from his native state, North Carolina, to settle in Baker county early in the century, and his wife was a daughter of G. W. Hardaway, of Warren county, Ga., a Virginian by birth, who was a second cousin of George Washington. Mrs. Ogletree was born in Troup county in 1852. Mr. and Mrs. Ogletree are the parents of five children: Philemon, James F., Caroline M., George S. and Paul H. The parents are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church south and the family holds a position of influence and honor in the community. Mr. Ogletree is also a well-known Mason.

C. D. PHILLIPS is a prominent farmer of Meriwether county, in which he was born in 1849. He is of Virginian stock, his grandfather, William D. Phillips, having come from that state to Georgia at an early date. His father, William A. J. Phillips, was born in Morgan county in 1828, and served through the late war with the state militia. His wife, Miss Mary M. Smith, was a daughter of Thomas Smith, also a Virginian, who was among Georgia's first settlers. C. D. Phillips spent his early years upon the farm in Meriwether county and obtained such schooling as the country schools afforded. He has devoted himself to the science of agriculture and his fine farm, in all its parts brought to the highest state of perfection, bears witness to his aptness in his business. His wife, whom he married in 1867, was Miss Emma Sewell, a native of Meriwether county, born June 10, 1847, the daughter of John P. and Elizabeth (Wideman) Sewell, who were old settlers of the county, to which they came from Morgan county. Mr. and Mrs. Phillips are the parents of ten children: William A., Estella, Mary, Thomas H., John H., Albert P., Calvin A., Cleopatra, Edna E. and Iverson B. Mrs. Phillips is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church; her husband is a member of the Alliance and is the president of the county organization in Meriwether county. The family is well esteemed by all who know them.

G. W. PINKSTON, M. D., is one of the chief citizens of Meriwether county, and an honored physician, born in Columbus in 1832; his parents, G. B. and Adeline (Chatfield) Pinkston, were early settlers of Wilkes county; the father, born in 1808 and a soldier in the Indian war, was of New England parentage, his parents having come from Connecticut to settle in Georgia early in the century; the mother's parents, George and Mary (Coats) Chatfield, were also among Wilkes county's early settlers. Young Pinkston passed his early years upon the farm, and his school privileges were therefore very limited. He improved them, however, to the best of his ability and in 1853 began the study of medicine with Dr. John B. Chatfield. In 1854 he attended his first course in medicine at Augusta, Ga., and completed his course at Atlanta in 1856. Since then he has practiced his profession with diligence and great success, until within a few years he has retired from active practice and devoted himself to the cultivation of the farm. In 1859 Dr. Pinkston married Miss C. J. Dreury, a daughter of Edwin and Eliza (Williams) Dreury, natives of Virginia, who early selected Georgia as their home. Mrs. Pinkston was born in 1841, and was reared in Spalding county. Both the doctor and his wife are active members of the Methodist Episcopal church south. They have five children: John W., W. L., Frances H., wife of Dr. W. R. McCrary, of Senoia, Ga., N. D. and Arthur R. The eldest son, John W., has succeeded to his father's practice, which he worthily carries on, and the family have the respect and good will of the entire community.

J. S. RADCLIFFE, a progressive farmer and substantial business man of Meriwether county, was born in Stinson in 1855, and is the son of George W. and Anna E. (Stinson) Radcliffe. His father was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1827, and for a long period was a leading business man in Talbotton, and later, for a number of years in Columbus, and retired from business in 1877. During the war he had charge of important Confederate interests. He is of Irish ancestry, a great-grandson of Lord Radcliffe, whose son George came to the state of New York in his boyhood and there made his home. His son, Samuel G., born in New York, whose wife was Jacqueline Davis, settled in Talbotton, Ga., among its early settlers. The wife of George W. Radcliffe was a daughter of Dr. James W. and Martha J. (Jackson) Stinson, the father being a well-known physician of Stinson, in this county, where for many years he enjoyed a very large and successful practice. He was by birth a North Carolinian, an early settler of Putnam county, for several years a successful school teacher, and took his course in medicine at the medical college of Georgia, Augusta. J. S. Radcliffe received an excellent education in the schools of Columbus, where he resided during his early years, taking an advanced course at Hillwood institute of Columbus. For eight years Mr. Radcliffe was engaged in business in Columbus, after which he moved to Alabama and engaged in farming, then returned to Georgia, and has been engaged in various commercial enterprises since. Two years he was in Augusta, and three years in Rome, Ga., but since 1885 his home has been in Stinson, where, in addition to the mercantile business, he carries on a large plantation. In 1877 Mr. Radcliffe married Miss Mary Hawkins, born in 1857 in Americus, Ga. She was a graduate of the Americus college, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal church south. Her parents were Judge Willis A. and Mary (Finn) Hawkins, the former one of the best criminal lawyers in the state, and for two years judge of the supreme court; he was a native of Sumter county. Mrs. Radcliffe died Jan. 6, 1879, leaving her husband with one child—George Willis. Feb. 1, 1883, Mr. Radcliffe married Miss Emma E. Smith, a native of Alabama, born in 1859. Her parents, Col. Robert H. and Helen (Herndon) Smith, were also natives of Alabama. Her father was a prominent lawyer in Mobile, Ala., for many years. Mr. and Mrs. Radcliffe are the parents of four children: Robert H., James S., Lillie and Lulu. Mrs. Radcliffe is a member of the Episcopalian church, while her husband is a Methodist. The family is one held in high esteem by all who know them.

H. H. REVILL, one of Meriwether county's prosperous farmers, is of English descent, his grandfather having come from England at an early day and settled in North Carolina. He served with bravery in the war of the revolution. His son, Harrison Revill, was born in North Carolina in 1796, and in 1817 settled in Jasper county, Ga. He married Miss Nancy Caldwell, a daughter of David and Elizabeth (Tanner) Caldwell, native Virginians, but among the early settlers of the state. Mr. Caldwell had also served in the war of the revolution. H. H. Revill, the son of Harrison and Nancy (Caldwell) Revill, was born in Jasper county in 1824, and passed his childhood on the farm, with but few educational advantages. On reaching manhood he engaged in farming, and soon accumulated considerable property. In 1863 he enlisted in Company D of the Second Georgia state troops, under Capt. Worrell, and fought in many battles, among them Powder Springs, Atlanta, Jonesboro. At the close of the war he returned home with no money to resume operations on his farm, and for some time met with many discouragements in his battle with the world; but his determination of purpose and courageous efforts won success, and he is now one of the solid farmers of the county, a man thoroughly respected by all who know him. In 1842 he married Nancy Caldwell, daughter of Matthew and Mornan (Satiwhite) Caldwell, Virginians, who had settled in Georgia, where in Jones county Mrs. Revill was born in 1820. One child, Nancy A., was born of this union, but has since died. The mother died in 1843. In 1847 Mr. Revill married Miss Mary A. Gresham, born in Lincoln county in 1822, the daughter of Pleasant and Matilda (McKinney) Gresham. She is a member of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. and Mrs. Revill have one child, Isabel.

J. B. REYNOLDS, one of the successful agriculturists of Meriwether county, is a native of South Carolina, born in Edgefield district in 1843. His father, Wiley Reynolds, was a son of Thomas and Nancy (Harris) Reynolds; and his mother, Dolly (Burton) Reynolds, was the daughter of Nathaniel and Susan (Aswell) Burton, all South Carolinians by birth. In 1846, when the boy, J. B. Reynolds, was but three years old, his parents came to Georgia and settled on a farm in Meriwether county, where he was reared, and received such school privileges as were afforded in the little log school house of the district. He enlisted in 1862, joining Company F of the Fifty-fifth regiment, under Capt. Henry Baker. Although he served faithfully to the end of the war he had the singular good fortune not only to escape being wounded or captured, but even to escape being in battle. Upon his return from the war Mr. Reynolds received from his father eight hundred acres of land, on which to make his home, and this, well improved, and added to, has been the foundation of the competence which he now possesses. In 1864 Mr. Reynolds married Miss Amanda Glisson, a native of Crawford county, born in 1849. She is the daughter of Brinkley and Amy (Riglan) Glisson, natives of this state; her father served both in the Indian war of 1836, and in the Mexican war. Both Mr. Reynolds and his wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church. They have six children: Anna, Dida, Henry W., J. B., Lillie and Emmett.

JAMES H. ROBERTS, one of the most successful farmers of this region, is a native of Meriwether county, born in 1852, and the son of James and Sarah (Miller) Roberts. The father came with his parents from South Carolina, their native state, to settle in Georgia, in the early part of the century. His wife was a daughter of Haymond Miller, also a South Carolinian, who came to Georgia in 1806. Young James H. Roberts was reared on the farm in his native county, and made the most of his meager school privileges, which were still further diminished by the deprivations and desolations of the war. In 1875 he married Miss Maria O'Neill, a native of this county, born in 1852, the daughter of Atley and Angeline (Brown) O'Neill, old settlers of Meriwether county. Both Mr. and Mrs. Roberts are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and esteemed members of the community. Mr. Roberts belongs also to the masonic fraternity.

JAMES A. ROWE, a successful farmer and well-known and honored soldier of Meriwether county, is a grandson of William Rowe, a native of South Carolina, who was one of the pioneers of what is now Monroe county, where he settled in 1804. His son, James, born in South Carolina, married Miss Narcissa Lewis, daughter of a revolutionary soldier, a native of South Carolina. Their son, James A. Rowe, was born in Monroe county in 1824, and passed his early years on the farm in that county, coming to Meriwether county in 1836. His early advantages were confined to such as were obtainable in the old log school house in the country. His natural energy of character has enabled him to make his way in the world. In 1861 Mr. Rowe enlisted in the Meriwether revengers under Capt. Hall. In 1862 they reorganized and Mr. Rowe was made captain of Company E, Twenty-eighth Georgia regiment. Capt. Rowe took part in fifty-two battles, many of them being among the most important and fiercest engagements of the war; such as Seven Pines, seven days at Richmond, Wilderness, Ocean Pond, Fort Sumter, James Island, Fort Fisher, John's Island, battle of Winchester, and many more. It was not to be expected that he would go unscathed through so many direful encounters; he received eleven wounds during the war. After the declaration of peace he returned home to make a new start in life. He has devoted himself to farm work and has succeeded in making for himself and family a competence and a pleasant and comfortable home. He married in 1848, his wife, Miss Nancy A. Malcolm, being a native of Walton county, born March 23, 1832; her parents, Alexander and Mahala (Nelson) Malcolm, were early settlers of that county. Capt. and Mrs. Rowe have eight children living: Thomas B., Milton, Walter, Allen J., Alfred C., Virginia, Harriet and Mary.

ALLEN J. ROWE, a prosperous and respected citizen of Meriwether county, is a son of James and Narcissa (Lewis) Rowe, and a brother of Capt. James A. Rowe. His paternal grandparents were William and Mary Rowe, those on the mother's side were William and Mary Lewis, all natives of South Carolina and among the early settlers of Georgia. Young Allen was born in Monroe county in 1835 and early transferred to Meriwether county, where he passed his childhood and youth upon the farm, gaining such education as he could with his scant opportunities. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B of the First Georgia cavalry, under Capt. Strickland. He fought in many of the hardest battles of the war: Big Hill, Murfreesboro, Perrysville, Chickamauga, Philadelphia, and was in the force that surrendered at Salisbury, N. C. After the surrender he returned to his home on the farm, to the careful and wise management of which he has ever since devoted himself. Mr. Rowe has worked with energy and planned with care, and has thus acquired wealth and enlarged and greatly increased the value of his broad and beautiful plantation, and is a man to whom all give the esteem he merits. He has a large and promising family. His wife was Miss Harriet Malcolm, daughter of Alexander and Mahala (Nelson) Malcolm, the former a native of Walton county, in which he died in 1859. Mrs. Rowe was born in Meriwether county in 1840, and is a member of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. Rowe belongs to the masonic fraternity. They were married in 1855 and have been blessed with thirteen children: Alice, Ella, William, Lewis, Hattie, Savannah, Alexander, James, Nannie, Stella, Mattie J., Henry C. and Jackson.

DR. J. W. TAYLOR, a successful physician and prominent citizen of Meriwether county, was born in Lexington district, S. C., in 1833. In 1839 his parents, William and Rebecca (Corley) Taylor, left their native state, South Carolina, to settle in Georgia, dwelling for a year in Monroe county, and then moving to Coweta county. Here young J. W. passed his boyhood, obtaining as good an education as the common schools afforded. In 1854 he began the study of medicine with his brother, Dr. J. P. Taylor, of Haralson, and in 1858 he entered the Atlanta Medical college at Atlanta; the coming on of the war hindered the completion of his medical studies at that time. In 1861, on the organization of Company B, First Georgia cavalry, he was appointed first lieutenant, but they were not mustered in until March 4, 1862, and he had associated himself with a squad of young men who agreed to remain together throughout the war. That he might fulfill this pledge he repeatedly refused promotion; even his unanimous election as major of his regiment he would not accept. The medical and surgical knowledge he had gained he made of constant use, not only to his own company, but to any of his regiment who needed it. Many incidents are related illustrating not only his skill but also his shrewdness. As, for instance, when on one occasion a soldier came to him with the pretense of being ill, the doctor, detecting the trick, compelled him to swallow a very large dose of castor oil, which cured him of ever again undertaking such a fraud. At another time, at Stegall's ferry, Ky., in the midst of a rain of shell, he dismounted from his horse and with the assistance of two ladies calmly amputated and dressed a soldier's arm, having for implements only a common bistoury and a carpenter's tenon-saw; and the soldier completely recovered. Dr. Taylor served throughout the war, taking part in many of the hardest battles, Murfreesboro, Loudon, Ky.; Big Hill, Ky., and the second battle of Murfreesboro being some of them. He had the honor of planting the flag at Franklin, Ky., was with Gen. Johnston in front of Sherman all the way to Atlanta, taking part also in that memorable conflict, and when Johnston was relieved by Hood he, at the head of his company, opened the way for Hood's charge on the Union army. He returned to Georgia at the close of the war and began practice at Luthersville. After a year or two he again went to Atlanta and completed his medical studies, receiving his degree in 1867. Among his classmates were several of the most prominent men of his profession: Dr. A. G. Thomas, G. G. Crawford, Haden, Houston and many others. In 1876 Dr.

J. W. TAYLOR.

Taylor was elected to represent Meriwether county in the state legislature among many noted men of that time: Gov. Northen, J. D. Stewart, A. D. Candler, H. H. Carlton, Judge H. G. Turner, Judge Allen Fort, A. L. Miller, Judge Pratt Adams, the youngest there, and others. Dr. Taylor was appointed by Gov. Northen as trustee for the school for the deaf at Cave Springs, Ga. He is one of the leading men of the county, where he is liked and respected by all. He is especially well known throughout the state, and in fact all through the south by the members of the masonic order, among whom he holds very high rank. For nine years he has held the office of grand high priest, at the beginning of his term there being but twenty-four contributing chapters, while now there are between ninety and a hundred. He is past deputy grand master of the state, is chairman of the financial committee, and general grand king of the general grand lodge chapter of the United States, being now the ranking officer of the grand chapter living in the state. In 1854 Dr. Taylor was married to Miss Amelia Jane Wilson, daughter of James and Leah D. (Johnson) Wilson. She was born in 1836, and is of Scotch ancestry, her grandfather being one of the clergymen who, for conscience' sake, seceded from the Presbyterian church of Scotland at the time of the dissensions in that body. Mrs. Taylor died in October, 1892. She was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal church, as is also Dr. Taylor. They had but one child, a son, John W., who is also a practicing physician in Luthersville.

HOPE TIGNER, a valued citizen and prosperous farmer of Meriwether county, of which he is a native, is of Scotch ancestry, his great-grandfather, William Tigner, with two brothers, having come from Scotland during the last century. They were the ancestors of the Tigner families in this country. William Tigner settled in Elbert county, where his son Hope was born, who married Miss Eliza Glenn, and many years ago settled in Meriwether county, and erected the first frame house built in the county. Their son, W. S., born in Monroe county, married Miss Mary J. Baldwin, a daughter of James and Mary (Scott) Baldwin, natives of Virginia, who settled in Hancock county in 1824, and later moved to Upson county. Mr. Baldwin, who commanded a regiment in the war of 1812, was the son of George and Rachel Baldwin, of Virginia, the former a soldier during the revolutionary war. Hope Tigner, the son of W. S. and Mary J. (Baldwin) Tigner, was born in 1852, and passed his early years upon the farm. He attended the school at White Sulphur Springs, and also enjoyed and profited by a year at Bowdon college. Mr. Tigner's chosen vocation is the tillage of the soil, and this he has pursued with the ardor and determination which compels success. His country home is a most delightful one, in the midst of his large and beautiful plantation. He has given considerable attention to horticulture, and has four and a half acres devoted to the culture of grapes, which are in fine condition. Mr. Tigner is a man of estimable character, and truly respected by all. In 1876 Mr. Tigner married Miss Carrie Pitts, whose parents, Lewis and Martha (Marshall) Pitts, Georgians by birth, afterward removed to Alabama. Mrs. Tigner was born in Russell county, Ala., in 1854. Both Mr. Tigner and his wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal church south. They have two children, W. S. and Mary A.

BENSON F. TIGNER, a successful farmer of this county, belongs to a family of considerable prominence in the state during the last century. His grandfather, William Tigner, of Scotch nativity, was a pioneer of Elbert county; his son, Hope H. Tigner, married Miss Eliza Glenn, and was the first settler of Meriwether county, where he built the first frame house ever erected in that county, which was for many years noted through an extensive region of country as the Tigner homestead. Mr. Tigner was a man of large influence and greatly liked, and he organized a company to serve in the Indian war, but his health broke down and he died before the time came to go. His wife was the daughter of William and Elizabeth (Crawford) Glenn, early settlers of Monroe county, Ga. Mrs. Glenn was a sister of Hon. William H. Crawford, so long distinguished among the eminent citizens of the state, and this gentleman took charge of the education of the niece, Mrs. Tigner, which under such direction was of unusual excellence. Benson F., the son of Hope H. and Eliza (Glenn) Tigner, was born in Meriwether county in 1833, and in that sparsely settled community enjoyed but limited educational opportunities. He enlisted in 1862 in the company commanded by Capt. Bragg, and was in the battle of Atlanta, and was present at the surrender at Savannah. Mr. Tigner began life for himself with little means, but with a character combining energy and perseverance, and by resolute endeavor and arduous work has accumulated a large property, has a beautiful home, and over a thousand acres of choice land in a fine state of cultivation, and enjoys the high esteem of all who know him. In 1858 Mr. Tigner married Miss Martha Stinson, a daughter of Dr. J. W. and Martha (Jackson) Stinson, the former for many years a leading physician of this section, with a widely extended and very lucrative practice, and a man of wealth and influence and great liberality. Mrs. Tigner was born in Meriwether county in 1836, and her union with Mr. Tigner has been blessed with seven children: Frank C., Mattie G., George S., Edward A., James H., Carrie O. and Julia B. Mr. and Mrs. Tigner are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church south, in the work of which they are very active. Mr. Tigner is a member of the board of trustees of the church and also of the school, and bears the same responsibility in relation to the camp ground, a beautiful tract of land in Meriwether county which for sixty-four years has been held for religious purposes. It was chartered by the legislature of 1832.

JOHN J. TUCKER, farmer, Meriwether county (P. O. Chipley, Harris county), Ga., son of Humphrey and Eda (Grant) Tucker, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1826. His paternal grandparents, Ethrel and Rebecca Tucker, were natives of North Carolina, and Virginia, respectively, migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county about the beginning of this century. Mr. Tucker's father was born in North Carolina, came with the family to Elbert county, whence, in 1833, he moved to Meriwether county, where he settled permanently. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. His maternal grandfather, Daniel Grant, was a native of Virginia, who, early in life, left that state and settled in Georgia. Mr. Tucker was raised on the farm, and like most farmers' boys at the time of his boyhood received only a limited education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, Second North Carolina battalion, of one of whose companies he was made lieutenant. The latter part of the year he was commissioned as captain of the company. He saw much and arduous service, and with his command was in many important battles. At the battle of Gettysburg he was captured and kept as a prisoner for twenty-two months. He came out of the war without a dollar; his capital being a piece of land, bought but not paid for, a stout heart and a resolute will. As a result he has paid for the original tract, and now has an 800-acre paid-for tract, enjoys a competency, and the respect and esteem of all who know him. Capt. Tucker was married in 1853 to Miss Louisa Kilpatrick, daughter of Richard and Elizabeth Kilpatrick, an old Georgia family. Of the children born to them five are living: Sarah F.; Oscar; Benjamin; John, and James Robert. The mother of these children having died, in 1874 he married Ollie Crawford—born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1840—daughter of P. Crawford, a native of North Carolina, who early in life left that state and came to Georgia. Capt. Tucker is a master Mason, and himself and wife are active and influential members of the Methodist church.

J. W. TRAMMEL, one of Meriwether county's active and intelligent farmers, is a native of Clarke county, born June 29, 1829, the son of John and Jane (Harris) Trammel; the former, born in 1779, was a soldier in the war of 1812; the latter was a daughter of William Harris, a revolutionary soldier, and his wife, Sarah Harris. J. W. Trammel was reared in Meriwether county, receiving such education as could be obtained in an old log school house of unusually restricted dimensions—only eight logs high—which gave shelter to the youth of that district, and stood them in lieu of the temple of knowledge. In 1862 Mr. Trammel enlisted in Company B, First Georgia cavalry, under Capt. Strickland. He was in many severe contests, both battles of Manassas, Chickamauga and Atlanta; he was in the same battle in which Gen. Pope was killed, and also assisted in the capture of Gen. Stoneman. Mr. Trammel at the close of the war returned home penniless to make a new beginning, working on a farm for a few years for himself. He is a man of fine business talent, to which, in addition to his persistent devotion to his chosen pursuit, as well as thrift and economy, his continued and increasing success is chiefly due, and for these and his other admirable traits of character he is highly respected by all. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and he and Mrs. Trammel are both members of the Baptist church. The latter was Miss Nancy Hindsman, daughter of William and Sallie (Cotton) Hindsman. Their union took place in 1853 and has been blessed with four children, three of whom are living: John W., Mattie and Robert T.

JOHN H. WILLIAMS, a prosperous farmer and leading citizen of Meriwether county, was born Jan. 9, 1834, his parents, Clark T. and Harriet (Jossey) Williams, being natives of the state in which his grandparents were early pioneers. His father's parents, John and Lily (Taylor) Williams, were among the early settlers of Clark county, the former being a native of Virginia, the latter born in Wilkes county, Ga., a daughter of Virginian parents, Henry and Huldah (Pope) Jossey, who came to Georgia among the earliest settlers. Clark T. Williams was reared in the pioneer home, and bravely endured the accompanying hardships and privations. His son, John H., was also reared upon the farm, and enjoyed the limited educational privileges of the early schools in those sparsely settled districts. In 1861 he enlisted in Company D, Eighth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Columbus Howard, after whose death Capt. Hugh E. Malone was put in command. During the first part of the war Mr. Williams took part in many of the fiercest engagements of that period: First battle of Manassas, Malvern Hill—that fearful seven days' fight, Mechanicsville, the siege of Yorktown, and many others. He served valorously through them all, but in 1862, having procured a substitute, he returned home to recruit. In 1864 he again entered the field under Col. James Blount, and served with ardor to the end of the war. He then returned home without a dollar to begin life anew, but by his steady application to business has been able to make continued increase of his property, and is now the owner of a fine farm in an excellent state of cultivation, and has won a position of influence in the community. He is a member of the masonic order, and he and his wife are both faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church. She was Miss Martha S. Robertson, born in Luthersville, in October, 1844, a daughter of J. M. C. and Mary (Kindall) Robertson, natives of Virginia, who were among the early settlers of Georgia. Mr. and Mrs. Williams were married in 1862 and have been blessed with eleven children: Mary L., Howard R., Albert C., Gustavus, James H., Harriet J., Mattie L., Minnie C., and Eliza K. are living. Henry C. and Sallie P. are gone from earth.

S. R. WILLIAMS, one of the prosperous farmers of Meriwether county, of which he is a native, was born in 1842, and is a son of James N. and Bathsheba (O'Neal) Williams; the former served in the state militia during the late war, and was a native of Putnam county, of which his parents, natives of North Carolina, were early pioneers. Mrs. Williams' parents were also North Carolinians, and early settlers of Georgia. Young Williams, who had passed the years of his childhood and youth on the Meriwether county farm, with such limited schooling as was there obtainable, ere he was fairly out of his teens—in 1861—enlisted in Company K, of the Fifty-fifth Georgia regiment. In 1863, September 9, he was captured at Cumberland Gap, and kept a prisoner at Chicago until the close of the war. From this long imprisonment the young man returned penniless to his home to begin life anew. He worked for a season for Atley O'Neal and then rented a farm from M. A. Thrash; after four years on this rented land he purchased a small farm to which he has added at intervals until he now owns a large and well-cultivated farm. In 1866 he married Miss Mary E. Thrash, the daughter of M. A. and Martha (Lassiter) Thrash, old settlers of Meriwether county; in May, 1890, Mrs. Williams died. In August, 1890, Mr. Williams married her sister, Miss Sarah Thrash, born in this county, in 1849, who is a member of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. and Mrs. Williams have one child, Lillie E.

A. W. N. WILSON, one of the most successful farmers of this region, belongs to one of the oldest families in the state, his grandfather, George Wilson, having settled in Georgia in 1781. He was a native of Maryland, and had served through the revolutionary war, in which he was badly wounded; but his native vigor of constitution and wonderful vitality were such that he lived to the remarkable age of one hundred and ten years. His wife was Miss Rhoda Spence, and their son, George A., was born in Walton county in 1800. He married Miss Apsila Newsome, a daughter of Nathaniel and Elizabeth (Hinyard) Newsome, old settlers of the state. The son, A. W. N. Wilson, was born in Coweta county, July 6, 1833, and reared on a farm near Moreland. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment, and was soon made lieutenant of the company, with which he went through many important engagements. But in the siege of Vicksburg he lost an arm and was obliged to return home. Although Mr. Wilson had been deprived of much schooling, having only about three months in all, he is of that determined nature which overcomes every difficulty and thrusts aside all obstacles in the way of success. He "never attempts anything but what it goes through," is what he truthfully says of himself, and it is simply indicative of that persistence which always wins success. He is one of the most progressive farmers in the south, and has acquired a considerable fortune, and is widely known and respected. He is a member of the masonic fraternity. In 1855 Mr. Wilson married Miss Matilda J. West, who died the same year, leaving one child, Hattie, wife of Dr. W. T. Brown. A year later he married Miss Susan Hindsman, and their union has been blessed with seven children, six of whom are living: Thomas C., George, John C., Annie, Newsome B., and Jennie. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson are devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

A. W. N. WILSON.

MILLER COUNTY.

BUSH. This is one of the pioneer, as well as one of the most enterprising and influential families in southwestern Georgia, its founder, James Bush, having settled on Colomokee creek, in Early county, not far from Fort Gaines, in 1818, being one of the four white men then in the county. The grandparents of James Bush came from Germany some years before the revolutionary war and settled on Trent river in North Carolina. Here two sons, John and William, were born. While quite young their father died and their mother married a Mr. Blackshear, by whom she had seven children: Brig.-Gen. David E. Blackshear, who gained distinction in the war of 1812, being one of them. In the latter part of the last century the family came to Georgia and settled in Laurens county. Here William Bush reared his family of children, one of whom was James Bush, father of Judge Isaac and Dr. Elijah B. Bush, of Miller county, Ga. Judge Bush, born in 1794, was married to Miss Nellie Glass, in Laurens county, who bore him three children: William J., David V., and James C., all of whom died. Bereaved of these and of his wife he removed to Early county in 1818, where he married Miss Mary Caraway, who bore him twelve children: Mourning, Mrs. Charles Roberts; Isaac; Charles W.; Rebecca, Mrs. William Battle; Arkansas, Mrs. A. C. Sheffield; Usual J.; Mary V.; Missouri D.; Thomas J.; Amanda K.; Burden B., and an infant, all of whom are dead except Isaac. Losing his second wife by death Mr. Bush contracted, April 25, 1844, a third marriage with Nancy Grantham, by whom he had five children: Nancy, Mrs. George Tabb, Arcola, Miss.; Monterey S., and Robert E., both deceased; Elijah B., M. D., Colquitt, Ga., and Edith, deceased. The mother of these children having died, Mr. Bush married Mrs. Effie Tennent, who survives him, he having died Nov. 10, 1869, and is living in Miller county. Mr. Bush was a man of great energy of character and did much to advance the material interests of his section.

JUDGE ISAAC BUSH, son of James Bush by his second wife, Mary Caraway, was born Sept. 21, 1821, and was reared in and around Blakely, Early Co., remaining at home until legally free (the only one of the children who did so), receiving an ordinary academic education. Having long cherished the ambition to be a lawyer, he bought some law books in 1846 and studied by himself at home, and practiced without a certificate until 1858, when, often finding himself at a disadvantage, he concluded to apply for regular admission to the bar, which he did and was admitted at Colquitt, Judge David Kiddoo presiding. Mr. Bush continued to practice until 1890, when he retired to his farm, seven miles east of Colquitt, where he is enjoying to the full the quiet and pleasures of a model country home. As might be inferred, Judge Bush was always much interested in politics. When the county of Miller was organized, in the spring of 1857, he was elected ordinary, but resigned the ensuing fall to take his seat in the state senate, serving during the sessions of 1857-58. Sympathizing with Hon. A. H. Stephens, he opposed secession, but when hostilities began, he enlisted in the Twenty-ninth Georgia cavalry, Col. Hood commanding, and served to the close of the war, chiefly on scouting duty. In 1865 Judge Bush was elected to represent Miller county in the constitutional convention, and the same year was elected to represent Miller county in the general assembly, serving during the sessions of 1865-66. To him is due the credit of securing the enactment of the law requiring "wild-land" taxes to be paid in the counties in which the land lies, instead of, as had previously been the case, being paid in the county in which the owner resided. Also for securing legislation making the property of married women non-available for the payment of the debt of the husband. Prior to the passage of this act the property of the wife was subject to the debts of the husband contracted before marriage. Judge Bush ended his honorable and useful public life by four years' service as chairman of the board of county commissioners, 1890-93 inclusive. Judge Bush was married Feb. 5, 1845, to Temperance, daughter of Drewry and Chloe (Golgightly) Roberts. Mrs. Bush was born in Early county, Feb. 4, 1825, and died Oct. 15, 1893. The bereaved husband tenderly cherished her memory as a woman of remarkable endearing qualities, a faithful and affectionate wife, a devoted mother, and as one overflowing with Christian charity and neighborly kindness, the loss of whose companionship is the sorest affliction of his life. Ten children were the offspring of this happy union, of whom the following named survive: James Smiley, merchant, Colquitt; Isaac A., lawyer, Camilla; Charles C., lawyer, Colquitt; Mary J., at home; Chloe, Mrs. William E. Hunter, Colquitt, and Emma, Mrs. C. M. Jones, Miller county. Judge Bush is now enjoying the well-earned fruit of a somewhat lengthy, busy and honorable (because useful) career, quiet, domestic comfort, thousands of broad acres of land, hundreds of bales of cotton and thousands of head of cattle and other valuable stock, and, better than all, the heartfelt esteem of the thousands of his fellow-citizens whom for more than forty years he has alternately counseled, led, and served. Politically Mr. Bush is an uncompromising democrat, religiously a devout and zealous Baptist.

ELIJAH B. BUSH, physician and surgeon, Colquitt, Miller Co., Ga., was born in Early county, Ga., Nov. 20, 1850, and is the half-brother of Isaac Bush, being the nineteenth child of James Bush, and the fourth by his third wife. His maternal grandfather, William Grantham, was killed by the Indians in the 20's in Early county. The body was gallantly rescued from the Indians by his son William, who lashed the corpse to a pony and carried it home, killing seven Indians while on the way. Dr. Bush was reared and remained on his father's farm until he was twenty-one, receiving, in the meantime, an academic education. In the spring of 1864, when only thirteen years of age, he ran away from home to join the Confederate forces. He was overtaken by his father, who sent him home. The next year he was employed in the quartermaster's department, handling stock, provisions, etc., to feed prisoners at Andersonville, Ga. On Nov. 19, 1868, when only eighteen years of age, he was united in marriage, in Miller county, with Miss Susan, daughter of James E. Scarborough, by whom he had ten children: James S., deceased; Oliver B., physician, Miller county; Virginia D., Mrs. A. D. McNair, Colquitt; an infant, deceased; Eldridge E.; John R.; Julia; Elijah B., Jr.; Susan C., deceased, and Thomas W. Dr. Bush began the study of medicine by himself at home in 1871, and soon after went to Atlanta and studied under Dr. W. C. Asher. In the winter of 1872-73 he attended the session of the Savannah Medical college, after which he underwent an examination by the state medical board at Milledgeville, Ga., and practiced medicine under a certificate from that body until 1889, when with his son Oliver he entered the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in the spring of 1890. The wide-awake, progressive spirit of Dr. Bush, together with his family connections, naturally caused him to participate actively in public affairs, and to become an important political factor. In 1877 he was a candidate for the general assembly, but was defeated by Henry C. Sheffield by a majority of forty-three votes. In 1882 he received the democratic nomination for senator from the Eighth senatorial district and defeated O. G. Gurley, independent democrat. In his capacity as senator Dr. Bush influentially served on the following committees: Corporations, academy for the blind, petitions, engrossing, and the academy for the deaf and dumb, of which he was chairman. He was also made chairman of a special committee to investigate the management of the academy for the deaf and dumb. A searching investigation disclosed much crookedness in its conduct, which was promptly remedied by legislation recommended by the committee; commended by his well-earned, wide professional reputation and his experience as a painstaking legislator, he was appointed by Gov. Atkinson in August, 1895, a principal physician of the penitentiary. Dr. Bush is an ardent democrat, a member of the State Medical association, a member of the Masonic fraternity, and a member of the Primitive Baptist church. His fine business capacity and commanding professional and social position have won for him a well-deserved influence in the county, which honored itself by honoring him.

BENJAMIN F. JONES, eldest son of Alexander and Priscilla (Gibson) Jones, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., Sept. 8, 1836. His brother, and the only other child of his parents, died when only ten years old. His father, also a native of Wilkes, was a mechanic, and conducted a small farm while working at his trade. Both parents died at the home of this son, the mother Sept. 2, 1865, aged sixty-five years, and the father, Aug. 4, 1881. Mr. Jones remained with his parents until Aug. 8, 1858, the date of his marriage to his third cousin, Navey F., daughter of Benjamin F. and Susan (Bussey) Jones, of Lincoln county, Ga. Her grandparents were named Weathers. Mr. Jones and wife have had six children born to them: Charles M., Miller county; Hattie E., Mrs. W. J. Roberts, Colquitt; Ellen F., Mrs. C. B. Mathis, Miller county; and Benjamin A., Emma L., and Nora E., all three deceased. About a year after his marriage Mr. Jones moved from Wilkes county, and in 1860 established his present cozy home in the piney woods of Miller county, about eleven miles east of Colquitt, the county seat, where he owns a fine large tract of productive land. In 1862 he enlisted in the Tenth Georgia cavalry as a private, with which he remained throughout the war, mainly a foragemaster. Feeling and taking always much interest in public matters, Mr. Jones has been almost continuously in some public position since the war, plainly indicating the high esteem in which he is held by his fellow-citizens. He was elected to represent Miller county in the Georgia house of representatives in 1884-85, and is now chairman of the board of county commissioners. Mr. Jones is a democrat, a member of the Baptist church, and a master Mason. He is a worker wherever employed, in private or public life, and is a very useful citizen.

MILTON COUNTY.

WILLIAM BUICE, farmer, Ocee, Milton Co., Ga., son of William and Mary A. (Mathis) Buice, was born in Spartanburg, S. C., Nov. 22, 1836. His parents were natives of South Carolina, descendants of early settlers—the father of English and the mother of Irish extraction. He was born in 1804, was an excellent, well-to-do farmer, came to Georgia in 1857, and settled in Forsyth county, where he died in 1884; his wife having died in 1879. They had sixteen children born to them: Adaline, wife of Moses Thompson; Betty, widow of William Staple; William, the subject of this sketch; Amanda, widow of Reuben Matthews; Susan, wife of John Williams; Marcena, wife of Robert Buice; Joshua; Emily, wife of Francis Thompson; and John, all living. Those deceased are: Merriman, Henderson, Marcellus, Harriet, Elisha, Samuel, and an infant. Mr. Buice was raised on the farm, and was educated at the common schools of the county. He came to Georgia with his parents in 1857, and in 1858 he went to Gwinnett county, Ga., where he lived until 1862, and then returned to Milton county. That same year he enlisted in Company H, Capt. Whaley, Second Georgia cavalry, and was a participant in the following among other battles: Murfreesboro, Munfordville, Perryville, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, New Town Church and the siege of Atlanta. He was wounded near Marietta, and sent home. At the end of three months he rejoined his command at Griffin, Ga., and continued in the service until the surrender. He saw much arduous and dangerous service, and relates many thrilling incidents connected with his soldier life. After receiving his discharge at Kinston, N. C., he returned to his farm and went to work, giving his undivided attention to the same until 1870, when he was elected sheriff and was consecutively re-elected five terms. He was then appointed deputy United States marshal and served seven years. About that time he moved to Forsyth county, where he lived until October, 1894, when he came back to Milton county and settled in Ocee. During his residence in Forsyth county he served two years as deputy sheriff. Mr. Buice owns a fine farm, is a progressive and successful farmer, and is well fixed for making abundant crops, and enjoying an easy, pleasant old age, and the esteem of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Buice has been twice married. He was first married in 1854 to Miss Adaline, daughter of Sherod and Elizabeth Webb, who bore him ten children: Sherod; Letitia, wife of Adolphus Webb; Hampton; Robert; William; Ida, wife of Roane E. Johnson—all living, and the following deceased: Tallulah, Kitty, Dora, and William A. The mother of these died June 2, 1894, and on October 7 following, he married Matilda E. Martin, daughter of Jackson and Elizabeth Webb. Mr. Buice is a strong democrat, and a consistent member of the Baptist church.

THOMAS F. CHANDLER, physician and surgeon, Alpharetta, Milton Co., Ga., son of John and Saphronia (Turner) Chandler, was born July 17, 1854. His parents were native Georgians—the father of German and the mother of Scotch-Irish descent. His father, a prosperous farmer of Cobb county, is still living, and a very large land-owner. Dr. Chandler was reared on his father's farm, and after receiving a good English education engaged in farming. Deciding to adopt a professional life he began the study of medicine in 1875 under the preceptorship of Dr. Cleland of Marietta, Ga., and pursued the study three years. He then attended lectures at the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1880, and soon afterward entered upon the practice in Marietta. In 1883 he located in Alpharetta, where he has remained since. He has established an excellent reputation in his profession, and upon it built a very large and remunerative practice, extending over the surrounding country, and into adjoining counties. He is popular and prosperous and stands well with his fellow-citizens. Dr. Chandler was married May 3, 1875, to Miss Georgia—born April 22, 1854—daughter of Lewis and Martha (Murdock) Grover. Six children have been born to them: Chessie R., born July 11, 1877; Annie Pauline, born June 8, 1884; Leo, born Sept. 29, 1889; and Thomas C., born June 7, 1892, and two died in infancy. Dr. Chandler is a democrat and a master Mason; and himself and wife are active members of the Methodist church.

ARTHUR C. MAXWELL, farmer, Alpharetta, Milton Co., Ga., son of William P. and Sarepta (Rucker) Maxwell, was born in what is now Milton county, Feb. 4, 1840. His grandparents were natives of Virginia, but his parents were born in Georgia. The Maxwells were of Scotch descent. Mr. Maxwell's father was a good and an extensive farmer, and owned 480 acres of excellent land in Milton county on which he died in 1885—his wife having died ten years previously. They were the parents of fourteen children: Mary, wife of Singleton A. Maxwell; Martha, wife of John H. Turner; Arthur C., the subject of this sketch; Edna E. (deceased); William B.; Frances, wife of Elisha Buice; Samantha, wife of Robert Hembree; John E.; Caroline E., wife of Robert Cobb; Sophia, wife of Martin Ball; Nancy (deceased); Amanda (deceased); Jane R., wife of Scott Turner; and one which died in infancy. Mr. Maxwell was raised on the farm and received a limited education at the near-by country schools. In 1862 he enlisted in Company A, Twenty-second Georgia regiment, which was ordered to Richmond. The first battle in which his regiment took part was White Oak Swamp, and then, among others, the following: Malvern Hill, Second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Wilderness, Front Royal, Spottsylvania Court House, Cold Harbor, Turkey Bend, and Petersburg. He served through the war and received an honorable discharge at Appomattox Court House after the surrender. After his return he farmed on his father's land until 1874, when he went to farming on his own account. He has worked hard and managed well, is considered a good farmer, owns a fine 200-acre farm and is a stockholder in the Alpharetta creamery. He is one of the reliable, substantial citizens of Milton county. Mr. Maxwell was married March 22, 1885, to Miss Emily F. Maxwell, by whom he has three children: William J., born in 1886; Robert W., born in 1889; and an infant child deceased. Mr. Maxwell is a democrat and is a member of the Methodist church.

DAVID R. MORRIS, farmer-merchant, Alpharetta, Milton Co., Ga., son of Shadrach and Elizabeth (Pierce) Morris, was born in Jackson county, Ga., Aug. 24, 1824. His parents were born, raised and married in North Carolina, whence they came to Georgia and settled in Jackson county in the early years of this century. Subsequently he removed to Fayette county, Ga., where he stayed until 1837, the year before the Indians were removed, when he moved to and permanently settled in Cherokee county. He followed farming all his life—accumulating considerable property, and died May 18, 1862. His wife died Nov. 28, 1856. Nine children were born to them, three of whom are living: William, born May 4, 1805; David R., the subject of this sketch; and Mary. The following are deceased: Sarah, Nancy, James, Joseph, Eliza, and Cynthia. Mr. Morris grew to manhood on the farm. He had to help in raising the crop, school-houses being far apart, and the schools not the best. Twenty-one days schooling were all he had, but he says it gave him a good start, and he finished it at the family fireside by the flickering light of burning pine-knots. His mind is strong, and his memory bright and clear as to interesting incidents and important events of the past, while he is wide-awake and keeps fully abreast with the leading political and other matters of the present time. In 1846 he bought eighty acres of land, to which he has gradually added until now he has 320 acres of as good land as there is in Milton county, and it was paid for by money made by working early and late—and hard, and good management. In 1880 he and his son-in-law commenced a general merchandising business in Alpharetta, which was successfully run until 1886, when he bought his partner's interest, and has since conducted it alone. He is one of the pioneer settlers of the county north of the Chattahoochee, and has much to tell—and loves to tell it—about frontier life and experiences. There are few men in the county better liked or more highly respected—or to whom more deference is paid. Mr. Morris was happily married Sept. 3, 1844, to Miss Dorcas, daughter of William and Nancy Thompson, native North Carolinians. The following children blessed this union: William J., born June 15, 1845; Mary A., born July 4, 1846, wife of Lowery Segers; John O., born Dec. 19, 1849; Joseph (deceased); Lewis T., married Mary Davis; Nancy A., wife of Joseph Rainwater; Martha, wife of George W. T. Grant; Sarah I., wife of William Blackstock. The mother of these, a faithful helpmeet, and an exemplary member of the Baptist church, was born March 28, 1819, and died May 16, 1894. Mr. Morris is an ardent and uncompromising republican, a master Mason, and a revered member of the Baptist church.

GIDEON B. THOMASON, physician and surgeon, Alpharetta, Milton Co., Ga., son of James and Susan (Thomason) Thomason, was born in Laurens district, S. C., May 19, 1842. Although his parents bore the same surname, they were not related, he being a native of Georgia, of English descent, and she a native of South Carolina, of Scotch-Irish extraction. When a young man his father went to South Carolina, where he remained until after his marriage, when he came back to Georgia, settled in Milton county, and engaged in farming, which he followed until his death in 1862. His widow died in 1889. They were the parents of four children: Joseph M., Gideon B., the subject of this sketch, George S., deceased, and Elizabeth, wife of James Taylor. Dr. Thomason grew to manhood on the farm, helping in the work on it according to his ability. He received his primary education at the common schools of the county, which was fairly good. In 1862 he enlisted as a private in Company C (Capt. Parris), Fifty-second Georgia regiment. He was commissioned orderly sergeant of his company, which was ordered to Knoxville, Tenn., and thence to Vicksburg, where he was during the siege—forty days and nights. With his command he was in the battle at Baker's creek, and subsequently those of Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, between there and Atlanta, and around the city during the siege of the city. Thence he went to North Carolina, and at Smithfield, in that state, was wounded and sent to the hospital at Raleigh, and after remaining there about six weeks was transferred to Greensboro, where he was at the time of the surrender. He took the oath of allegiance at Washington, Ga., and then returned to his home. In 1866 he began the study of medicine under Dr. R. B. Anderson, and then attended lectures at Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1867. He located immediately afterward about three miles from Alpharetta, where he remained until 1881, when he moved to Alpharetta and located permanently. He has been satisfactorily successful as a physician and enjoys the confidence of the community to the fullest extent as to his professional skill. He owns and has in a fine state of cultivation and improvement an excellent 140-acre farm near Alpharetta, and thirty acres of eligibly situated property in the town, and is also a stockholder in the Alpharetta creamery. He is enterprising and progressive in all lines of professional and business activity. Dr. Thomason was married Nov. 22, 1882, to Miss Jemima A.—born in 1862—daughter of James and Angelina E. (Polly) McCullun, by whom he has had one child, Willie G., born Dec. 23, 1883. He is a democrat and a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

MITCHELL COUNTY.

ROBERT J. BACON, planter, Baconton, Mitchell Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Sarah (Holcombe) Bacon, was born in Liberty county, Ga., Dec. 6, 1830. His paternal grandfather, Thomas Bacon, was a native of South Carolina, and came to Georgia when a boy with his father's family with a company composed of Puritans and some cavaliers from Dorchester and Beach Hill, S. C., and settled at Medway and Newport, St. John's parish (now Liberty county), Ga., in 1752. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Bacon's father was born in Liberty county, Ga., in October, 1775, and was the first-born of the children, and was reared and lived and died in the county. He was a man of great energy and activity, very influential, and as a Jeffersonian democrat represented the county in the general assembly. He was a very prominent member of the Baptist church, of which he was for many years a deacon. He died in 1834 in Philadelphia while on a visit to that city. He raised nine children, of whom the subject of this sketch, and the only daughter—Mrs. Joshua H. Foster, Tuscaloosa, Ala.—are the sole survivors. Mr. Bacon was reared and received his preparatory education in Liberty county, and then entered the university of Georgia, Athens, from which he was graduated in 1851. He afterward settled in Troup county, Ga., and engaged in planting until 1858, when he moved to Mitchell county, and settled at what is now known as Baconton—a town founded by himself. With the exception of a few years spent in the mercantile business in Albany, Ga., he has lived here and given his time and attention exclusively to his planting interests. He is a gentleman of culture, of extensive and varied information, prominent and influential in politics, and in all matters bearing on the development of his county and section. No citizen is better known; few, if any, more popular. From 1861 to 1865 he represented the county in the general assembly. He owns and conducts a large plantation at Baconton, under a high state of cultivation. Mr. Bacon has been twice married. By his first marriage he had four children: Cornelia, wife of Rev. R. J. Wilingham, D. D., Richmond, Va., corresponding secretary Foreign Missionary board, Baptist church; Isabella, wife of W. G. Cooper, editor "Tribune," Rome, Ga.; Ella and Laura, at home. By his second marriage he has had one child—Robert J., Jr. Himself and wife are exemplary and leading members of the Baptist church.

GEORGE M. BACON, manager De Witt Farming company, De Witt, Mitchell Co., Ga., son of Thomas J. and Georgia (Meriwether) Bacon, was born in Troup county, Ga., Sept. 7, 1847. Thomas Bacon, his grandfather, was an early settler and a wealthy and prominent planter in Liberty county, Ga. Mr. Bacon's father was born and raised and prepared for college in Liberty county, then attended the university of Georgia at Athens. He married Miss Georgia, only child of George Meriwether, a wealthy planter and influential citizen of Clarke county, Ga. Not long after his marriage, in 1845, he settled in La Grange, Troup Co., Ga., where for awhile he edited "The Chattahoochee," a newspaper. Subsequently he entered upon the practice of law, which continued with increasing success until 1861. During this period he was mayor of La Grange a number of years. He was an "old line whig" until 1860, when he voted for Breckinridge. Soon after the war between the states begun he enlisted in the Twenty-seventh Georgia regiment, of which he was made commissary, with rank of captain. At the battle of Seven Pines, near Richmond, in 1862, he volunteered as aide to Gen. Anderson, and was killed early in the fight. His wife remained a widow and died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Baker, in Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., in 1890. They had five children: George Meriwether, the subject of this sketch; Sumner Winn, Atlanta, Ga.; Jeannie Beatrice (Mrs. J. A. Baker, now of Guthrie, Oklahoma); Lucy Anderson (Mrs. Thomas Fulton, deceased, Decatur, near Atlanta), and Thomas J., deceased at six years. Mr. Bacon's boyhood was passed in La Grange, and he was about thirteen years of age when his father entered the Confederate service. The last year of the war he enlisted in Company B, Gen. Tyler's brigade, state troops, was elected third lieutenant, afterward promoted to first lieutenant when only seventeen years of age, and was in command of his company at the time of Lee's surrender. In 1868 he entered into the management of the large farming interests of his uncle, Robert J. Bacon, in Mitchell county, Ga. Continuing in this capacity until 1877, when his uncle and himself formed a partnership, and engaged in merchandising and farming, making from 300 to 400 bales of cotton per year. In 1883 he moved to and settled on the present site of De Witt, then an old dilapidated place that had been run as an old cotton plantation until considered worn out and almost valueless. By thrift and untiring energy the lands have been brought up to their present high state of cultivation, and the general improvements are the best in southwestern Georgia. In December, 1893, he became associated with D. C. Bacon in the De Witt Farming company, with D. C. Bacon president, and engaged extensively in raising cotton, grain, hay, stock, etc., and they have now, also, 300 acres in fruits, nuts and grapes. The company owns 2,000 acres of land in a body. The S., F. & W. railway passes through, near the center of the plantation (and on this is located the little town of De Witt), and Flint river borders the west. On the east side of the railroad can be seen from the car windows the fine young orchard of 20,000 peach trees. On the west side pears and pecans, and the broad avenue of oaks and elms that lead up to "The Park." Mr. Bacon married Miss Julia Holcombe, daughter of Thomas Holcombe, of Savannah, Ga. Mr. Bacon is a K. of P., a Knight of Honor and a member of the A. O. U. W. Mrs. Bacon is a devout Episcopalian and their little daughter has been christened Cleland Nelson, for the bishop of Georgia. Mrs. Bacon possesses a loveliness of character and disposition which makes her a social favorite among a very extensive acquaintance. Her beautiful home is noted for its hospitality and many social gatherings. Her sister, Mrs. D. C. Bacon, and her mother, Mrs. Holcombe, each own cozy cottages and winter homes on either side—all in the same enclosure, known as "The Park." Happier homes or more pleasant surroundings cannot be found in the south.

REV. THOMAS A. BARROW, farmer and minister, Pelham, Mitchell county, Ga., son of David C. and Sarah (Pope) Barrow, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., in 1843. His paternal great-great-grandfather, Thomas Barrow, was born in England in 1640, came to America and settled in Southampton county, Va., where he died in 1730, aged ninety years. His great-grandfather, of same name, was born on the Nottoway river, Southampton county, Va., where he was raised, and afterward moved to North Carolina. James Barrow, son of Thomas, and grandfather of our subject, was born in North Carolina, Jan. 31, 1757, and served as a drummer boy in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. At the battle of Cowpens, S. C., he had his head split open with a saber. He was married three times, his third wife being a Miss Lewis, a native of Georgia, who died a few years later, leaving two children: David C. and Patience. He was an ardent member of the Baptist church, of which he was a deacon, and lived to be quite old. Patience, the daughter, married William McKinley and settled on the old homestead at Milledgeville, where they lived until they died. David C., Mr. Barrows' father, was born in Milledgeville, July, 26, 1815, and his mother in Oglethorpe county. The Pope family were early settlers of Oglethorpe (then Wilkes) county; and Mr. Barrow's maternal grandfather, Middleton Pope, was a wealthy planter, living a few miles south of Lexington. To this union nine children were born, of whom four are living: Pope, lawyer, and ex-United States senator, Savannah, Ga.; David C., professor university of Georgia; Mrs. Spalding, Sapelo Island, Ga., and Thomas A., the subject of this sketch. The mother of these children having died, Mr. Barrow contracted a second marriage, but had no children. Rev. Barrow was reared on the farm, and attended subscription schools until he was fifteen years old—1858—when he entered the university of Georgia, where he remained until 1861, when he enlisted in the Troup artillery, the first company organized in Athens, and entered the Confederate service. He served through the war, participating in many important battles, among them: Savage Station, Crompton Gap, Md., and Fredericksburg. Entering the army as a private he was gradually promoted, until at the close he was an adjutant, and having served through the war was paroled May 19, 1865, at Waynesboro, Ga. After the surrender he went to Decatur county, Ga., and settled on a farm, and remained on it until 1891. That year he removed to Pelham, which has since been his home, and where he has been extensively engaged in farming. In 1890 he was ordained a minister of the Baptist church, and since then has been serving Meigs and Hopeful churches as pastor. Mr. Barrow was married in 1872 to Miss Jennie Turner, daughter of Rev. Thomas Turner of Illinois. In 1879 she died, a consistent member of the Methodist church, leaving two children: David C., now in the junior class at the university of Georgia, and Clara Elizabeth, in the junior class at the Lucy Cobb institute, at Athens, Ga. Mr. Barrow's second marriage was to Miss Alice, daughter of Columbus W. and Columbia A. (Bower) Hand, by whom he has had two children: Thomas A., Jr., and Frances Cuthbert. Rev. Barrow manages his extensive planting interests with marked ability and success, and is devoted in his service to the churches under his pastorate and the Baptist church generally. In politics he is a democrat, and is a member of the masonic fraternity.

WILLIAM L. BENNETT, farmer, Camilla, Mitchell Co., Ga., son of Lemuel D. and Jane (Little) Bennett, was born in Anson county, N. C., in 1833. His paternal grandfather, William Bennett, was a native of North Carolina, was a planter, and lived and died in that state. He married a Miss Susan Dunn, whose mother lived to be 106 years old. Her family were ardent patriots during the revolutionary war, and lost everything they had except one feather bed. His maternal grandfather, William Little, was a native of England, came to the United States when young and settled in North Carolina, where he married and followed farming, living to extreme old age. Mr. Bennett's father was born in North Carolina, April 15, 1805, and died in the county in which he was born Oct. 26, 1879. He was a consistent member of the Methodist church. His mother was born Oct. 20, 1811, and died a devout Episcopalian, Dec. 10, 1873. They were the parents of ten children, of whom seven are yet living: John W., in North Carolina; William L., the subject of this sketch; Thomas R., Camilla; Mrs. A. E. Townsend, Mitchell county; Mrs. Mary J. Smith; Frank and Mrs. Charlotte Dunlap, Anson county, N. C. The other children died in childhood. Mr. Bennett was reared and assisted on the farm in Anson county, and was educated in the common schools of that locality and time. In 1854, with no capital except a good constitution, a strong resolution, and integrity of character, he started out in life for himself. By way of Camden, S. C., he went to Pulaski county, Ark. From there he went by railway to Nashville, Tenn., and thence by water to Napoleon, Ark., at the mouth of the Arkansas river. From there he went to Aberdeen, Ark., and thence by private conveyance to Little Rock, Ark., settling finally on a tract of land twelve miles below Little Rock, on the Arkansas river. He remained there until 1870, when he came to Georgia, and, in 1873, settled permanently in Mitchell county, where he has a large and magnificent body of land under the very best of cultivation. Starting poor and among strangers, he has by untiring industry, close attention to business, well-directed energy and enterprise, and economy, acquired a large and valuable property. He continues to be a hard worker, is modest, unambitious of any distinction save that of being a good citizen and neighbor. He is considered to be one of the solidest and most substantial citizens of Mitchell county, and entirely reliable in every respect. His home is a delightful and attractive one, four miles west of Camilla, where amidst appreciative neighbors and friends he dispenses an open-handed hospitality. During the war between the states he served in the commissary department of Arkansas. Mr. Bennett was happily married in Arkansas, Jan. 12, 1858, to Miss P. A. Adams, daughter of Dudley and Sarah (Townsend) Adams.
